The young person here mentioned was a person of great decency and amiableness in his moral character, and had serious thoughts about religion. He came 'sunning,' and kneeling down, (Mark 10: 17.) and inquired, 'What good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?' The question at first sight may seem equivalent to the inquiry of the trembling jailer, 'What must I do to be saved?' (Marg. Ref. 1. g.—see Luke 10: 25-29. Acts 16: 29-34, v. 31.) But our Lord said: that his judgment was erroneous, and his heart unhumblid and carnal: He therefore first objected to his giving Him, whom he supposed to be a mere man, the title of good: as all mere men are evil in themselves. The remark was the more needful, as the rabbi affected this title; and it intimated, that the inquirer was not properly sensible of the depravity of his own heart, or of the dignity of the person whom he thus addressed. He then directed him to keep the commandments of God, if he purposed 'to enter into life,' by the good things which he should do. The knowledge of the holy and spiritual law of God is the proper cure of a self-justifying spirit, as it tends to discover the deficiencies and defeilements of all human obedience: (Marg. Ref. 1.—Notes, Rom. 3: 19, 20. 7: 9-12. Gal. 2: 17-21, v. 19.) but probably he expected some external observances and austerities to have been superadded by our Lord, in order to complete his righteousness. (Notes, Rom. 9: 30-33, v. 32. 10: 1-4, v. 3.) He therefore ignorantly repelled, by inquiring, which of the commandments he was to keep; whereas, a perfect obedience to all of them is the indispensable condition of life, according to the covenant of works; (Gen. 2: 10-14.) In order therefore to his conviction, or detection, our Lord pointed out to him the commandments of the second table, and summed them up in the rule of 'loving his neighbor as himself.' But he, regardless of the first table, and ignorant of the spiritual import of the precepts adduced, answered, that 'he had kept them all from his youth.' He could mean the letter alone, and that he was free from the grosser violations of it: for doubtless he had infringed several of them, even in his outward conduct; and he certainly was very far from 'loving his neighbor as himself.' On his further asking 'What lack I yet?' our Lord, to discover to him and others, the evil which lay concealed under these plausible appearances, told him, that he yet lacked one thing. (Marg. Ref. 1. g.—see also Mark 10: 17-31, v. 17, 19, 21. Luke 18: 18-30.) This was acting like a skilful physician, who was aware of the patient's disorder, and determined to apply the medicine directly to it. It served at once to prove him far distant from the righteousness of the law, and from the state of mind and heart required by the Gospel. Not to enlarge on the love of God with all the heart and soul: had he 'loved his neighbor as himself,' and believed Jesus to speak with divine authority, he would readily have disposed of his wealth, at his command, in relieving the afflicted, when at the same time it would have insured his own felicity: and had he been a humbled sinner, earnestly seeking ence to Christ is the appointed way to it, Heb. 5:9. [4.] That he was, or at least thought himself, willing to do what was to be done to obtain this eternal life. Those that know what it is to have eternal life, and what it is to come short of it, will be glad to accept of it on any terms. Such a holy violence does the kingdom of heaven suffer. Note, While there are many that say, Who will show us any good? our great inquiry should be, What shall we do, that we may have eternal life? What shall we do, to be forever happy in another world? For this world has not that in it, that will make us happy.

2. The encouragement that Christ gave to this address. It is not his manner to send any away without an answer, that come to Him on such an errand, for nothing pleases Him more, p. 17. In his answer,

(1.) He tenderly assists his faith; for, doubtless, He did not mean it for a reproof, when He said, Why callest thou Me good? But He would seem to find that faith in what he said, when he called Him good Master, which he perhaps was not conscious of to himself; he intended no more than to own and honor Him as a good man, but Christ would lead him to own and honor Him as a good God; for there is none good, but one, that is God. Christ will have this young man either to know Him to be God, or not call Him good; to teach us to transfer to God all the praise that is at any time given to us. Do any call us good? Let us tell them all goodness is from God; and therefore not to us, but to Him give glory. All crowns must lie before his throne. Note, God only is good, and there is none essentially, originally, and unchangeably good, but God only. His goodness is of and from Himself, and all the goodness in the creature is from Him; He is the Fountain; whatever the streams are, all the springs are in Him, Jam. 1:17. He is the great Pattern and Sample, by Him all goodness is to be measured; that is good, which is like Him, and agreeable to his mind; we in our language call Him God, because He is good. In this, as in other things, our Lord Jesus was the brightness of his glory, (and his goodness is his glory,) and the express Image of his person, and therefore fitly called good Master.

(2.) He plainly directs his practice, in answer to his question. He started that thought of his being good, and therefore God, but did not stay on it, lest He should seem to divert from the main question, as many do in needless disputes and strifes of words. Now Christ's answer is, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.

[1.] The end proposed is, entering into life. The young man spake of eternal life; but Christ speaks of life, to teach us, that eternal life is the only true life. The words concerning that are the words of this life, Acts 5:20. The present life scarcely deserves the name of life, for in the midst of life we are in death. Or, into life, that spiritual life which is the beginning and earnest of eternal life: we have it by the merit of Christ, a mystery which was not as yet fully revealed, and therefore Christ waives that; but the way of entering into it, is, by obedience, and Christ directs us in that. By the former, we mercy and eternal life, as the gift of God through the divine Savior, he would readily have left all to follow Him. But the event proved, that his wealth was more valued by him, than either God or his neighbor; than Christ, a heavenly treasure, or even his own soul. Doubtless it was his duty to yield a prompt obedience to his command: yet our Lord knew that he would not, and it is evident He intended it as a touchstone, by which to discover him to himself. For when he heard that saying, all his pleasing prospects at once vanished, and he departed sorrowful, for he had great possessions. Though reluctant to give up the hope of eternal life, yet he would not at that time renounce his riches for the sake of it. (Marg. Ref. t. u.) We cannot decide what he afterwards did; he might at length be brought to a more spiritual frame of mind. Certainly, all that Christ said to him was suited to humble and convince him; and some would infer his subsequent convince our title; by this, we prove it; it is by adding to faith virtue, that an entrance (the word here used) is ministered to us into the everlasting kingdom, 2 Pet. 1:5, 11. Christ, who is our Life, is the way to the Father, the only Way; but duty, and the obedience of faith, are the way to Christ. There is an entrance into life hereafter, at death, at the great day, and those only shall then enter into life that do their duty; it is the diligent, faithful servant that shall then enter into the joy of his Lord. There is an entrance into life now; we who have believed, do enter into rest, Heb. 4:3. We have peace, and comfort, and joy, in believing, and to this also sincere obedience is indispensably necessary.

[2.] The way prescribed is, keeping the commandments. Note, Keeping the commandments of God, is the only way to life and salvation; and sincerity herein is accepted through Christ as our gospel-perfection, provision being made for pardon, on repentance, wherein we come short. Through Christ we are delivered from the condemning power of the law, but the commanding power of it is lodged in the hand of the Mediator, and we still are under the law to Christ, (1 Cor. 9:12.) under it as a rule, though not as a covenant. Keeping the commandments includes faith in Jesus Christ, for that is the great commandment, (1 John 3:23.) and it was one of the laws of Moyses, that, when the great Prophet should be raised up, they should hear Him. Observe, In order to our happiness here and forever, it is not enough for us to know the commandments of God, but we must keep them.

[3.] At his further request, He mentions some particular commandments which he must keep, (p. 18, 19.) The young man saith unto Him, Which? Note, Those that would do the commandments of God, must seek them diligently, and inquire after them, what they are. Ezra set himself to seek the law, and to do it, Ezra 7:10.

In answer to this, Christ specifies several, especially the commandments of the second table, p. 18, 19. 1st, That which concerns our own and our neighbor's life; 2^d, Our own and our neighbor's chastity, which should be as dear to us as life itself; 3^d, Our own and our neighbor's wealth and outward estate; 4th, That which concerns truth, and our own and our neighbor's good name; neither for thyself nor against thy neighbor; for so it is here left at large. 5th, That which concerns the duties of particular relations; 6th, That comprehensive law of love, which is the spring and summary of all these duties; (Gal. 5:14. Rom. 13:9.) that royal law, Jam. 2:8. Some think this comes in here, not as the sum of the second table, but as the particular import of the tenth commandment; Thou shalt not covet, which, in Mark, is, De fraud not; intimating that it is not lawful for me to design advantage to myself by the loss of another; for that is to covet, and to love myself better than my neighbor, whom I ought to love as myself, and to treat as I would myself be treated.

Our Savior here specifies second-table duties only, 1. Because they that now sat in Moses' seat, either wholly neglected, or greatly corrupted them, ch. 23:23. Their preaching ran out all in rituals, and nothing in morals; and therefore Christ pressed that most, which they least insisted on. As one truth, so one duty must not justify another; but equity requires that that he helped up, which is most in danger of being thrust out. That is the truth we are version from the words of St. Mark, who says that Jesus loved him: though this may only mean, that He saw a natural amiableness, which excited in Him, as man, a peculiar regard. (See Mark 10:17-31, p. 21, 22.) The reference to the ten commandments accords both to the Hebrew and the LXX; except as the fifth commandment is placed last, and part of it omitted.

(16.) What good thing? The Pharisees divided the precepts of the law into the weighty and the slight; and thought that many of them might be neglected and violated. Those laws which respected external rites they almost solely referred to the number of the weighty.

(17.) Callest thou Me good? 'Some MSS. and versions have, "Questionest Me concerning that good thing?" Dr. A. CLARKE

19 "Honor thy father and thy mother; and, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

20 The young man saith unto him, "All these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?"

21 Jesus said unto him, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me.

22 But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16-22. It is necessary that we inculcate, not only a decency of moral conduct, and an external regard to religion, but an attention to the Gospel as the only remedy for lost sinners: otherwise those we instruct, though very amiable, serious, and earnest about eternal life, will never know their need of salvation. Many abstain from gross vices, and rest in the outward letter of the commandments, and are ready to say, 'All these have I kept from my youth;' when ten thousand instances of disobedience, in thought, word, and deed, are marked against them in the book of God, to be produced to their conviction and confusion at the day of judgment. Indeed, no man can enter into life, who does not habitually aim to keep the commandments of God; and wilful, customary transgression will prove many professors of the Gospel to be further from the kingdom of heaven, than even this ruler. But 'there is none righteous, no, not one;' it is therefore proper sometimes to task self-sufficient inquirers; and when they proudly ask, 'What lack I yet?' to point out to them their duty, according to the spiritual and extensive law of God. This may lead them into an acquaintance with their own weakness and depravity, and detect the secret pride and worldliness of their hearts; and so prepare 'he way for their understanding and welcoming the Gospel of free salvation. Not only does the law require us (if Provicalled to bear our testimony to, which is opposed or neglected. 2. Because He would teach all, that moral honesty is a necessary branch of true Christianity, and to be minded accordingly. Though a mere moral man comes short of being a complete Christian, yet an immoral man is certainly no true Christian; for the grace of God teaches us to live soberly and righteously, as well as godly. Nay, though first-table duties have in them more of the essence of religion, yet second-table duties have in them more of the evidence of it. Our light burns in love to God, but shines in love to our neighbor.

1. See here how he came short.

II. By pride, and a vain conceit of his own merit and strength; this is the ruin of thousands. When Christ told him what commandments he must keep, he answered very scornfully, v. 20.

Now; (1.) According as he understood the law, as prohibiting only the outward acts of sin, I think he said true, and Christ knew it, for He did not contradict him; nay, it is said in Mark, He loved him; so far was very good and pleasing to Christ. Paul reckons it a privilege, not contemptible in itself, though dross in comparison with Christ, that he was, as touching the righteousness that is in the law, blameless, Phil. 3:6. His observance of these commands was universal; All these have I kept; it was early and constant; from my youth up. Note, A man may be free from gross sin, and yet come short of grace and glory. His hands may be clean from external pollutions, and yet he may perish eternally in his heart-wickedness. What shall we think then of those whose fraud and injustice, drunkenness and uncleanness, witness against them, that all these they have broken from their youth up, though they have named the name of Christ? Well, it is said to come short of those that come short of heaven.

It was commendable also, that he desired to know further what his duty was; What lack I yet? Having not yet attained, he thus seemed to press forward. And he applied himself to law in its spiritual sense, no doubt he had offended against all these commands. Had he been acquainted with the extent and spiritual meaning of the law, instead of saying, All these have I kept; what lack I yet? he would have said, with shame and sorrow, 'All these have I broken, what shall I do to get my sins pardoned?' Take it how you will, what he said savored of pride and vain-glory, and had in it too much of that boasting which is excluded by the law of faith, (Rom. 3:27,) and which excludes from justification, Luke 18:14, 14. What lack I yet? perhaps was not so much a desire of further instruction, as a demand of the praise of his present fancied perfection, and a challenge to Christ Himself to show him any one instance wherein he was deficient.

2. By an inordinate love of the world, and his enjoyments in it. This was the fatal rock on which he split. Observe,

(1.) How he was tried in this matter; v. 21. Christ waived the matter of his boasted obedience to the law, because this would be a more effectual way of discovering him than a dispute of the extent of the law: and what Christ here prescribes, is not a thing of supererogation, or a perfection we may be saved without, but necessary and indispensable duty. What Christ said to him, He thus far said to us all, that, if we will approve ourselves Christians indeed, and would be found at last the heirs of eternal life, we must do these two things:

[1.] We must practically prefer the heavenly treasures before all the wealth and riches in this world. No thanks to us to prefer heaven before hell; the worst man in the world would be glad of that for a refuge, when he can stay no longer here; but to make it our choice, and to prefer it before this earth—that is to be a Christian indeed. Now, as an evidence of this, 1st, We must dispose of what we have in this world, for the honor of God, and in his service; 'Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor;' as the first Christians did, with an eye to this precept; (Acts 4:34.) sit loose to it, be willing to part with it. A gracious contempt of the world, and compassion of the poor and afflicted, are a necessary condition of salvation; and giving of alms as necessary an evidence of that contempt of the world, and compassion to our dence call us to it,) to part with our substance, or even our lives, for the glory of God, and the good of our neighbors: but except a man be ready to forsake all that he has for Christ's sake, he cannot be his disciple, or be saved according to the Gospel. No unregenerate man will comply either with the precept of the law, or the requisition of Christ, when he is fairly put to the trial. In this manner, numbers forsake Him, loving this present world; they have their convictions and desires, but the sacrifice insisted on is too valuable; therefore they depart sorrowful, perhaps trembling. This is peculiarly the case with those who have great possessions, and who live in trying times. Few, in comparison of the numbers of those who call Christ, Lord, Lord, seem prepared for obedience, should He require them to 'sell all and give to the poor, and come and follow Him, that they may have a treasure in heaven.' Many refuse, at his express command, to part with the most trivial interest or indulgence; many will not give even a moderate proportion of their goods to the poor, notwithstanding all the promises made to those, who do this out of faith, and love to Christ. It behoves us then to try ourselves in these matters, for the Lord will ere long put us to the trial; and then, if found wanting, we must abide the eternal and awful consequences.

SCOTT

(19.) As thyself. 'Self-love, as it is generally called, has been declaimed against, even by religious people, as a pernicious and dreadful evil. But they have denominated that intense propensity which unregenerate men feel to gratify their carnal appetites and vicious passions self-love; whereas it might more properly be termed self-hatred, or self-murder. If I am to love my neighbor as myself, and this is 'love your neighbor as ill to its neighbor,' then self-love, in the sense in which our Lord uses it, is something excellent. It is properly a disposition essential to our nature, and inseparable from our being, by which we desire to be happy, seek the happiness we have not, and rejoice in it when possessed. In a word, it is a uniform wish of the soul to avoid all evil, and to enjoy all good. Therefore, he who is wholly governed by self-love, properly and scripturally speaking, will devote his whole soul to God, and earnestly and constantly seek all his peace, happiness and salvation in the enjoyment of God. But self-love cannot make me happy. I am only the subject which receives the happiness, not the object that constitutes it; for it is that object, properly speaking, that I love, and love not only for its own sake, but also for the happiness I enjoy through it. "No man," saith the apostle, "ever hated his own flesh." But he that sinneth against God wrongeth his own soul, both of present and eternal salvation; and is so far from being governed by self-love, that he is the enemy of his best interests in both worlds. (1 Pet. 3:10, 11.)

(21.) When Christ calls it "perfection" to sell all and give to the poor,—he speaks according to the idiom of the nation, which thought so; not that hence He either devoted Christians to voluntary poverty, or that He exhorted this man to rest ultimately in a Pharisaical perfection.

LIGHTFOOT.

(22.) Went away sorrowful. Men undergo great agony of mind while they are in suspense between the love of the world and the love of their souls. When the first absolutely predominates, they enjoy a factitious rest through a false peace: when the latter, then they possess true tranquillity of mind, through that peace of God that passeth knowledge.

DR A. CLARKE.

23 Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.

and recompense for all we have left, or lost, or laid out, for God in this world; Thou shalt have treasure in heaven. The precept sounded hard and harsh; 'Sell that thou hast, and give it away;' and the objection against it would soon arise, that 'Charity begins at home;' therefore Christ immediately annexes this assurance of a treasure in heaven. Note, Christ's promises make his precepts easy, and his yoke not only tolerable but pleasant, sweet, and very comfortable; yet this promise was as much a trial of this young man's faith, as the precept was of his charity, and contempt of the world.

[2.] We must devote ourselves entirely to the conduct and government of our Lord Jesus; Come, and follow Me. It seems here to be meant of a close and constant attendance on his person, such as the selling of what he had in the world was as necessary to, as it was to the other disciples to quit their callings; but of us it is required that we duly attend on his ordinances, strictly conform to his pattern, and cheerfully submit to his disposals, and by upright, universal obedience observe his statutes, and keep his laws; and all this from a principle of love to Him, and dependance on Him, and with a holy contempt of every thing else in comparison of Him, and much more in competition with Him. This is to follow Christ fully. To sell all and give to the poor, will not serve, unless we come, and follow Christ. If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, it profits me nothing. Well, on these terms, and on no lower, is salvation to be had; and they are very easy and reasonable terms, and will appear so to those who are brought to be glad of it o. any terms.

(1.) See how he was discovered. This touched him in a tender part; v. 22. [1.] He was a rich man, and loved his riches, and therefore went away. He did not like eternal life on these terms. Note, 1st, Those who have much in the world, are in the greatest temptation to love it, and to set their hearts on it. Such is the bewitching nature of worldly wealth, that those who want it least, desire it most; when riches increase, then is the danger of setting the heart on them, Ps. 62: 10. If he had had but two mites in all the world, and had been commanded to give them to the poor, or but one handful of meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruse, and had been bidden to make a cake of that for a poor prophet, the trial, one would think, had been much greater, and yet those trials have been overcome; (Luke 21: 4. and 1 Kings 17: 14.) which shows that the love of the world draws stronger than the most pressing necessities. 2dly, The reigning love of this world keeps many from Christ, who seem to have some good desires toward Him. A great estate, as to those who are got above it, is a great furtherance; so to those who are entangled in the love of it, it is a great hindrance, in the way to heaven.

Yet something of honesty there was in it, that when he did not like the terms, he went away, and would not, as Demas did, pretend to that which he could not find in his heart, to come up to the strictness of; since he could not be a complete Christian, he would not be a hypocrite.

[2.] Yet he was a thinking man, and well inclined, and therefore went away sorrowful. He had a leaning toward Christ, and was loath to part with Him. Note, Many a one is ruined by the sin he commits with reluctance; leaves Christ sorrowfully, and yet is never truly sorry for leaving Him, for if he were, he would return to Him. Thus this man's sorrow was recreation of spirit to him, then when it was his temptation. What then would the sorrow be afterward, when his possessions would be gone, and all hopes of eternal life gone too?

V. 23-30. We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon occasion of the rich man's breaking with Christ.

1. Christ took occasion from hence to show the difficulty of the salvation of rich people; v. 23, 26.

1. It is a hard thing for a rich man, such as this here, to get to heaven. Note, From the harms and falls of others, it is good for us to infer that which will be of caution to us.

Now, (1.) This is vehemently asserted by our Savior, v. 23, 24. He said this to his poor disciples, that the less they had of worldly wealth, the less hindrance they had in the way to heaven. Note, It should be a satisfaction to them who are in a low condition, that they are not exposed to the temptations of a high and prosperous condition: if they live more hardly in this world than the rich, yet, if withal they get more easily to a better world, they have no reason to complain. This saying is ratified, v. 23., Verily I say unto you. He that has reason to know what the way to heaven is, tells us, that this is one of the greatest difficulties in that way. It is repeated, v. 24. Again I say unto you. Thus He speaks once, yea, twice that which man is loath to perceive, and more loath to believe.

[1.] He saith that it is a hard thing for a rich man to be a good Christian, and to be saved. More duties are expected from rich people than from others, which they can hardly do; and more sins easily beset them, which they can hardly avoid. Rich people have great temptations, and such as are very insinuating; it is hard not to be charmed with a smiling world; very hard, when we are filled with these hid treasures, not to take up with them for a portion. Rich people have a great account to make up for their estates, their interest, their time, and their opportunities of doing and getting good, above others. It must be a great measure of divine grace, that will enable a man to break through these difficulties.

[2.] He saith that the conversion and salvation of a rich man is extremely difficult, v. 24. He uses a proverbial expression, denoting a difficulty altogether unconquerable by the art and power of man; only the almighty grace of God will enable a rich man to get over this difficulty. The difficulty of the salvation of apostates, (Heb. 6: 4.) and of old sinners, (Jer. 13: 23,) is thus represented as an impossibility. The salvation of any is so very difficult, (even the righteous scarcely are saved,) that where there is a peculiar difficulty, it is fitly set forth thus. It is very rare for a man to be rich, and not to set his heart on his riches; and it is utterly impossible for a man that sets his heart on his riches to get to heaven; for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him, 1 John 2: 15. James 4: 4. First, The way to heaven is very fitly compared to a needle's eye, which it is hard to hit, and hard to get through. Secondly, A rich man is fitly compared to a camel, a beast of burden, for he has riches, as a camel has his load; he carries it, but it is another's, he has it from others, spends it for others, and must shortly leave it to others; it is a burden, for men load themselves with thick clay, Hab. 2: 26. A camel is a large creature, but unwieldy.

(2.) This truth is very much wondered at, and scarcely credited by the disciples, v. 25. Many surprising truths Christ told them; this was one, but their weakness was the cause of their wonder. It was not in contradiction to Christ, but for awakening to themselves, that they said, Who then can be saved? Note, Considering the many difficulties that are in the way of salvation, it is really strange that any are saved. When we think how good God is, it may seem a wonder that so few are his; but when we think how bad man is, it is more a wonder that so many are, and Christ will be eternally admired in them. Who then can be saved? Since so many are rich, and so many more would be rich, who can be saved? If riches are a hindrance to rich people, are not them He did not mean that all rich persons must be lost, but to warn them against the desire of such dangerous distinctions, assured them, that 'with men indeed it was impossible, but with God all things were possible.'

SCOTT.
(23.) A rich man shall hardly enter, &c. 'By the kingdom of heaven is sometimes understood the Christian church, then soon to be erected, and sometimes the state of the blessed in heaven, after the resurrection. I take this to hold true, in which way soever the kingdom be understood. Opuient and voluptuous men, who had so much to lose, and so much to fear, would not, among the hearers of the Gospel, be easily persuaded. As little can the justness of the sentiment be doubted, in relation to the state of the blessed hereafter, when the deceitfulness of riches and the snare into which it so often inveigles men, are duly considered. So close an analogy runs through all the divine dispensations, that, in more instances than this, it may be affirmed with truth, that the declarations of Scripture are susceptible of either interpretation.'

CAMPBELL.

Verses 23-26.

Some would read a camel, instead of a camel; but it seems to have been a proverbial expression, signifying extreme difficulty, or apparent impossibility. Riches powerfully tend to increase pride, covetousness, and self-indulgence: they purchase flatterers, and exclude faithful reprovers. They prejudice the mind against the humbling truths and self-denying precepts of Christ; and they increase the number and force of these obstacles which must be broken through, and the supposed value of those objects which must be renounced, if a man would become a disciple of Christ. Far more, in proportion, of the poor, than of the rich, are converted, and enter the kingdom of grace and of glory and the conversion of a very wealthy man seems the peculiar triumph of almighty grace. (See Luke 12: 15-21. 16: 9-15, 19-23. 19: 1-10. 1 Tim. 6: 6-10, v. 9, 10, 17-19. Jam. 1: 9-11. 2: 5-7.) The disciples, however, who were poor and felt their own difficulties, and probably thought that the rich had more advantages for religion than themselves, were exceedingly astonished at this saying, and exclaimed, 'Who then can be saved?' But Jesus, to allow what are the characters of those that shall be saved, it concerns us to inquire whether we, through grace, answer those characters. Now Peter hopes that, as to the main scope of the condition, they had come up to it, for God had wrought in them a holy contempt of the world, in comparison with Christ; pride and luxury to those that are not rich: and who then can get to heaven?

2. Though it be hard, yet it is not impossible, for the rich to be saved; v. 26. This is a great truth in general, that nothing is too hard for God, Gen. 18: 14. Num. 11: 23. When men are at a loss, God is not, for his power is infinite and irresistible; but this truth is here applied, (1.) To the salvation of any. Who can be saved? say the disciples. None, saith Christ, by any created power. With men, this is impossible: the wisdom of man would soon be non-plussed in contriving, and the power of man baffled in effecting, the salvation of a soul. No creature can work the change that is necessary to the salvation of a soul, either in itself or in any one else. It is a creation, it is a resurrection; but with God all things are possible. Note, The beginning, progress, and perfection of the work of salvation, depend entirely upon the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible. Faith is wrought by that power, (Eph. 1: 19.) and is kept by it, 1 Pet. 1: 5. Job's experience of God's convincing, humbling grace, made him acknowledge, more than any thing else, I know Thou canst do every thing, Job 42: 2. (2.) To the salvation of rich people especially; it is impossible with men that such should be saved, but with God even this is possible: not that they should be saved in their worldliness, but from it. Note, The sanctification and salvation of such as are surrounded with the temptations of this world are not to be despaired of; it may be brought about by the all-sufficiency of the divine grace; and when such are brought to heaven, they will be there everlasting monuments of the power of God. I am willing to think that in this there is an intimation of mercy Christ had yet in store for this young gentleman, who was now gone away sorrowful; it was not impossible to God yet to recover him, aid bring him to a better mind.

II. Peter took occasion hence to inquire what they should get by it, who had come up to the terms, and had left all to follow Him, v. 27. &c. We have here the disciples' expectations from Christ, and his promises to them.

1. We have their expectations from Christ; Peter, in the name of the rest, signifies that they depended on Him for something considerable in lieu of what they had left for Him, v. 27. Christ had promised the young man, that, if he would sell all, and come and follow Him, he should have treasure in heaven: Now Peter desires to know,

(1.) Whether they had sufficiently come up to those terms: they had not sold all, (for they had many of them wives and families to provide for,) but they had forsaken all; they had not given it to the poor, but they had renounced it as far as it might be any way a hindrance to them in serving Christ. Note, When we hear and how this must be evidenced, no certain rule can be given, but according as we are called.

Lord, saith Peter, we have forsaken all. Alas! it was a poor all: one of them had indeed quitted a place in the custom-house, but Peter, and the most of them, had only left a few boats and nets, and the appurtenances of a poor fishing-trade; and yet observe how Peter there speaks of it, as if it had been some mighty thing; Behold, we have forsaken all. Note We are too apt to make the most of our services and sufferings for Christ, and to think we have made Him much our debtor. However, Christ does not upbraid them, though it was but little that they had forsaken, yet it was their all, like the widow's two mites, and was as dear to them as if it had been more, and therefore Christ took it kindly that they left it to follow Him; for He accepts according to what a man hath.

(2.) Whether therefore they might expect that treasure which the young man shall have if he will sell all. 'Lord,' saith Peter, 'shall we have it, who have left all?' All people are for what they can get; and Christ's followers are allowed to consult their own true interest, and to ask, What shall we have? Christ looked at the joy set before Him, and Moses at the recompense of reward. For this end it is set before us, that by a patient continuance in well-doing we might seek for it. Christ encourages us to ask what we shall gain by leaving all to follow Him; that we may see He doth not call us to our prejudice, but unspeakably to our advantage. As it is the language of an obedient faith to ask, 'What shall we do?' with an eye to the precepts; so it is of a hoping, trusting faith, to ask, 'What shall we have?' with an eye to the promises. But observe, the disciples had long since left all to engage themselves in the service of Christ, and yet never till now asked, What shall we have? Though there was no visible prospect of advantage by it, they were so well assured of his goodness, that they knew they should not lose by Him at last, and therefore referred themselves to Him, in what way He would make up their losses to them; minded their work, and asked not what should be their wages. Note, It honors Christ, to trust Him and serve Him, and not to indent with Him. Now that this young man was gone from Christ to his possessions, it was time for them to think what they should trust to. When we see what others keep by their hypocrisy and apostasy, it is proper for us to consider what we hope, through grace, to gain not for, but by, our sincerity and constancy, and then we shall see more reason to pity them than to envy them.

2. We have here Christ's promises to them, and to all others that tread in the steps of their faith and obedience.

(1.) To his immediate followers, v. 28. They had signalized their respect to Him, as the first that followed Him, and to them He promises not only treasure, but honor, in heaven; and (24.) A camel. 'Six manuscripts, by the changing of a letter, read camel, a mere gloss inserted by some who did not know that the word was a proverb, common enough in the East. So the Koran, Surat 7: 37. "Gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter there till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." &c.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(25.) Who then can be saved? 'A rich man, in our Lord's sense of it, is not one who has so many hundreds or thousands more than some of his neighbors; but is one who gets more than is necessary to supply all his own wants, and those of his household, and keeps the residue still to himself; though the poor are starving through lack of the necessities of life. In a word, he is a man who gets all he can, serves all he can, and keeps all he has gotten.' Id.

It has been said, 'The love of gain is the most formidable of all enemies to the law of neighborly love. Men brought up under the influence of the spirit of trade, generally endeavor by every means in their power to evade the commands of natural morality.' In view of these reflections, we need not wonder at the expressions of our Lord. Ep.

Verse 27.

'To forsake all, without following Christ, is the virtue of a philosopher. To follow Christ in profession, without forsaking all, is the state of the generality of Christians. But, to follow Christ and forsake all, is the perfection of a Christian.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 28.

If we join the expression, 'in the regeneration,' to the preceding clause, it may mean the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, disposing them to obey his call. But it may, and probably should, be joined to the subsequent clause; and then it refers to the time, when the apostles would receive their full recompense, even when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory.' Some reference may perhaps be had to the establishment of the Christian church, and the condemnation of the Jewish nation in consequence of their ministry: but the day of judgment seems immediately intended.—Judas was at this time one of the number; but he had never truly left all and followed Christ: when 'he by transgression fell,' then another was appointed in his place, and the number of twelve was continued, with reference to the twelve tribes of which Israel was originally constituted.—In the day of the great restoration of all things, when the elect shall enter on a new life of unspeakable glory, even in that great and dreadful day, when 'the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of majesty, to judge the quick and the dead,' then shall ye, my apostles, who are now despisable and mean, have the honor to sit up on several thrones, to second and assist this awful act of final judgment, on the rebellious tribes of Israel.' Ep. Hall.

[Scott.] 'Regeneration.' 'Renovation.' we are accustomed to apply the term regeneration to the conversion of individuals; whereas its relation here is to the general state of things. The return of the Israelites, after the Babylonish captivity, is so named by Josephus. The principal completion will be at the general resurrection, when there will be, in the most important sense, a renovation, or regeneration of heaven and earth, when all things shall become new; yet in a subordinate sense it may be said to have been accomplished when God came to visit, in judgement, that guilty land, when the old dispensation was utterly abolished, and succeeded by the Christian dispensation. CAMPBELL.

29 And 'every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life.

here they have a grant for it from Him who is the Fountain of honor in that kingdom, v. 28. Observe.

[1.] The preamble or consideration of the grant, which, as usual, is a recital of their services; 'You have followed me in the regeneration, and therefore this will I do for you.' The time of Christ's appearing in this world was a time of regeneration, of reformation, Heb. 9: 10. The disciples had followed Christ when the church was yet in embryo, the gospel-temple but in the framing, when they had more work and service than dignity and power. Now, therefore, he will put particular marks of honor on them. Note, Christ hath special favor for those who begin early with Him, who trust Him, as they did, who followed Him in the regeneration. Observe, Peter spake of their forsaking all, to follow Him; Christ only speaks of their following Him, which was the main matter.

[2.] The date of their honor. It should commence, not immediately from the date of these presents, but when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory; and to this some refer that, in the regeneration; 'You who now have followed me, shall, in the regeneration, be thus dignified.'

Christ's second coming will be a regeneration, when there shall be new heavens, and a new earth, and the restitution of all things. All that partake of the regeneration in grace, (John 3: 3.) shall partake of the regeneration in glory; for as grace is the first resurrection, (Rev. 20: 6.) so glory is the second regeneration.

Now their honor being adjourned till the Son of man's sitting in the throne of his glory, intimates, 1st, That they must stay for their advancement till then. Note, As long as our Master's glory is delayed, it is fit that ours should be so too, and that we should wait for it with an earnest expectation, as of a hope not seen, Rom. 8: 19. We must live, and work, and suffer, in faith, and hope, and patience, which therefore must be tried by these delays. 2dly, That they must share with Christ in his advancement. They, having suffered with a suffering Jesus, must reign with a reigning Jesus, for both here and hereafter Christ will be all in all; we must be where He is, (John 12: 26.) must appear with Him; (Col. 3: 4.) and when our Lord comes, we shall receive not only our own, but our own with usury. The longest voyages make the richest returns.

[3.] The honor itself hereby granted; Ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. It is hard to determine the particular sense of this promise, and I see no harm in admitting it to have many accomplishments. 1st, When Christ is ascended to the right hand of the Father, and sits on the throne of his glory, then the apostles shall receive power by the Holy Ghost; (Acts 1: 8.) shall be advanced as on thrones, in promoting the Gospel; shall deliver it with authority, as a judge from the bench; shall have their commission enlarged, and shall publish the laws of Christ, by which the church (Gal. 6: 16.) shall be governed, and Israel according to the flesh, that continues in infidelity, with all others that do likewise, shall be condemned. The honor and power given them may be explained by Jer. 1: 10. See, I have set thee over the nations; and Ezek. 20: 4. With thou judge them? and Dan. 7: 18. The saints shall take the kingdom; and Rev. 12: 11. where the doctrine of Christ is called a crown of twelve stars. 2dly, When Christ appears for the destruction of Jerusalem, (ch. 24: 31.) then shall He send the apostles to judge the Jewish nation, because in that their predictions would be accomplished. 3dly, Some think it has reference to the conversion of the Jews, yet to come, at the latter end of the world, after the fall of antichrist; so Whitby; and that 'it respects the apostles' government of the twelve tribes of Israel, by a reviviscence of that Spirit which resided in them, and of that purity and knowledge which they delivered to the world, and chiefly by admission of their Gospel to be the standard of their faith, and the direction of their lives.' 4thly, It is certainly to have its full accomplishment at the second coming of Jesus Christ, when the saints in general shall judge the world, and the twelve apostles especially, as assessors with Christ, in the judgment of the great day, when all the world shall receive their final doom, and they shall ratify and applaud the sentence. But the tribes of Israel are named, partly because the number of the apostles was designedly the same with the number of the tribes; partly because the apostles were Jews, befriended them most, but were most spitefully persecuted by them; and it intimates that the saints will judge their acquaintance and kindred according to the flesh, and will, in the great day, judge those they had a kindness for; will judge their persecutors, who in this world judged them.

But the general intendment of this promise is, to show the glory and dignity reserved for the saints in heaven. The apostles in this world were hurried and tossed, there they shall sit down at rest and ease; here they were in bonds, afflictions, and deaths, there they shall sit on thrones of glory; here they were dragged to the bar, there they shall be advanced to the bench; here the twelve tribes of Israel trampled on them, there they shall tremble before them. And will not this be recompense enough to make up all their losses and expenses for Christ? Luke 22: 29.

[4.] The ratification of this grant; it is firm, inviolably, immutably sure; for Christ hath said, 'Verily I say unto you, I the Amen, the faithful Witness, who am empowered to make this grant, I have said it, and it cannot be disannulled.'

[2.] Here is a promise to all others that should in like manner leave all to follow Christ. It was not peculiar to the apostles, but this honor have all his saints. Christ will take care they shall none of them lose by Him; (v. 29.) Every one that has forsaken any thing for Christ, shall receive.

[1.] Losses for Christ are here supposed. Christ had told them, that his disciples must deny themselves in all that is done to them in this world; now here He specifies particulars. If they have not forsaken all, as the apostles did, yet they have forsaken a great deal, houses, suppose, or dear relations, that would not go with them; these are particularly mentioned, as hardest for a tender, gracious spirit to part with; brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children; and lands are added in the close, the profits of which were the support of the family.

Now, 1st, The loss of these things is supposed to be for Christ's name's sake; else He doth not oblige himself to make it up. Many forsake brethren, and wife, and children, in humor and passion, as the bird that wanders from her nest; that is a sinful desertion. But if we forsake them for Christ's sake, because we cannot keep them, and keep a good conscience; if we do not quit our concern for them, or our duty to them, but our comfort in them, and will do it rather than deny Christ, and this with an eye to Him and to his will and glory; this is that which shall be thus recompensed. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes both the martyr and the confessor.

2dly, It is supposed to be a great loss; and yet Christ undertakes to make it up, be it ever so great.

[2.] A recompense of these losses is here secured. Thousands have dealt with Christ, and have trusted Him far; but never any one lost by Him, never any one but was an unspeakable gainer by Him, when the account came to be balanced. Christ here gives his word for it, that He will not only indemnify his suffering servants, and save them harmless, but will abundantly reward them. Let them make a sche-

Verses 29, 30.

This must be understood especially of divine consolations, which commonly most abound when great sacrifices are made, or great hardships endured, for conscience's sake; and which are a hundred-fold better, than all earthly comforts and possessions; as they best know who have most experienced them. But those providential interpositions may also be included, by which the Lord often makes up, in outward comforts, of a far more valuable nature, all the losses and privations voluntarily incurred by his true disciples, in adhering to Him, and obeying his commandments; for evidently the promise has respect to all times and places. 'A full content of mind, the comforts of an upright conscience; the joys of the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and hopes of glory; and shall have God for their Father, and be rich towards God, and have Christ for their Spouse, and all good Christians bearing that warm affection to them, which will render them more closely united to, and more affectionately concerned for them, than those who were allied to them by the strictest bonds of nature.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. 1.—n.—See Rom. 6: 3—5. 1 Cor. 3: 18—23, v. 21—23. 2 Cor. 1—7, v. 6—6. Phil. 1: 21—26. 1 Pet. 4: 12—16.) To this our Lord added,

'But many that are first shall be last, and the last first.' He doubtless referred to the moral and amiable young man, who was found on trial to be 'further from the kingdom of heaven,' than many publicans and harlots, who became 'first,' when he was cast behind; but the rule has reference to a variety of cases. Prodigals often repent, and get before decent moralists; the Gentile converts obtained the priority to the Jewish nation; splendid hypocrites apostatize, and open persecutors become preachers of the Gospel; and those, who have been the grief and reproach of families and neighborhoods, sometimes become their chief credit and blessing; whilst plausible characters are by this very circumstance rendered more inveterate against the truth. Marg. Ref. o.—See 20: 1—16. 21: 28—32.

(30.) 'This was doubtless a proverb. Most commentators think our Lord had the apostles in view, which I think most probable. Gratius and Theophylact take it to refer to the Jews and Gentiles. I think we are not warranted in limiting the application, which seems to reach to all whom it may concern; though doubtless it was intended for the warning and edification of all Christians, as Luke 13: 30.'

CHAP. X.

Jesus speaks a parable of laborers sent at different hours into a vineyard, and applies it, 1-16. ¹⁷⁻¹⁹ foretells his own death and resurrection; ²⁰⁻²³ rejects the request of the mother of James and John in behalf of her sons; and represents the indignation and annihilation of the other apostles, 24-28; and gives sight to two blind men, 29-34.

FOR the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his vineyard.

2 And when he had agreed with the laborers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard.

3 And he went out due of their losses for Christ, and they shall be sure to receive.

1st. A hundred-fold in this life: sometimes in kind, in the things themselves which they have parted with. God will raise up more friends, that will be so for Christ's sake, than they have left that were so for their own sakes. The apostles, wherever they came, met with those that were kind to them, and entertained them, and opened their hearts and doors to them. However, they shall receive a hundred fold in kindness, in those things that are abundantly better and more valuable. Their graces shall increase, their comforts abound, they shall have tokens of God's love, more free communion with Him, more full communications from Him, clearer foresights, and sweeter foretastes, of the glory to be revealed; and then they may truly say, they have received a hundred times more comfort in God and Christ, than they could have had in wife or children.

2dly. Eternal life at last. The former is reward enough, if there were no more; cent. per cent. is great profit; what then is a hundred to one? But this comes in over and above, as it were, into the bargain. The life here promised includes in it all the comforts of life in the highest degree, and all eternal. Now if we could mix faith with the promise, and trust Christ for the performance of it, surely we should think nothing too much to do, nothing too hard to suffer, nothing too dear to part with, for Him.

Our Savior, in the last verse, obviates a mistake of some, as if pre-eminence in glory went by precedence in time, rather than the measure and degree of grace, v. 30. No; God will cross hands; will reveal that to babes, which He hid from the wise and prudent; will reject unbelieving Jews, and receive believing Gentiles. The heavenly inheritance is not given as earthly inheritances commonly are, but according to God's pleasure. This is the text of another sermon, which we shall meet with in the next chapter.

CHAP. XX. v. 1-16. This parable of the laborers in the vineyard is intended to represent to us, I. The kingdom of heaven, (v. f.) that is, the way and method of the Gospel dispensation, and, II. That concerning it which He had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, that many that are first shall be last, and the last first; that truth, having in it a seeming contradiction, which needed further explication.

Nothing was more a mystery in the Gospel dispensation than the rejection of the Jews and the calling in of the Gentiles; so the apostle speaks of it: (Eph. 3: 3-6.) nor was any thing more provoking to the Jews than the intimation of it. Now this seems to be the principal scope of this parable, to show that the Jews should be first called, but that at length, the Gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, and they be admitted to equal privileges and advantages with the Jews; which the Jews, even those of them that believed, would be very much disgusted at, but without reason.

But the parable may be applied more generally, and shows us, 1. A great truth, that God is debtor to no man. 2. That many who begin last, and promise little in religion, sometimes arrive at greater attainments, than others whose entrance was more early, and who promised

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23-30. Nothing more fully proves men's want of true faith, than their eagerness to be rich. Yet how few are there who do not labor to be rich, and to enrich their children! Who does not associate the idea of wealth with that of felicity? Who that has riches does not confide in them as a substantial advantage? And who that is not so tempted to envy the wealthy? But experience fatally confirms the declarations of Christ; and proves that this earnestness is like toiling to build a high wall, to shut themselves and their children out of heaven: for in this manner, many that will be rich, fall into fatal snares, and involve their families in every kind of ruinous temptation, to their everlasting perdition. (See 1 Tim. 6: 6-10.) Such assertions will not only offend unbelievers; even disciples will be astonished at them, and be ready to think that none then can be saved. Indeed, not many of the rich and honorable of the earth are called, but the people of God are generally found among the poor: and the difficulties in the way of the wealthy sinner's conversion are so many, and so insurmountable by man, that we should have no hope of him, except as we know that with God all things are possible. And, blessed be his name, He surprises us with some demonstrations of the omnipotence of his grace, even in these degenerate days: here and there, a very wealthy person is brought forth, and appears eminent for humility, simplicity, spirituality, and fruitfulness: some of this kind are even found among those, who are growing rich from inferior circumstances; but none among those, that will be rich, or who trust, idolize, or love riches. What we here read, however, should surely make us willing to be poor, to beware of covetousness, and to pity and pray for the rich; as we would for men at sea in a violent storm, whom nothing but an extraordinary interposition of God could save from being swallowed up by the tempestuous waves; and in all our labors of love, we may still apply this rule, even to the most abandoned and hardened, that with God all things are possible. But whether a man have a kingdom or only a fishing-boat; if he be duly bumbled as a sinner, and earnestly seek eternal life from the Savior, he will, at his call, leave all and follow Him; and if he be allowed to keep his substance, he will learn to use it in his service. Indeed, mixtures of self-preference often tarnish our conscious integrity, and our gratitude to Him, 'who hath made us to differ': yet our gracious Lord accepts his own work, and pardons our evil; and if we here follow Him with simplicity, He will at length cause us to inherit 'a crown of glory that fadeth not away.' Nay, He has promised most abundantly to recompense us, for all that we give up for his sake; so that it is only like sowing seed, with the assurance, even in this world, of reaping a hundred-fold, as well as of eternal life in that which is to come. May He then give us faith to lay hold of his promise, and rest our hope on Him; and then we shall be prepared for every service or sacrifice. But let us neither trust in promising appearances, or in outward profession, nor despair of such as are fallen the deepest into immorality, impiety, or infidelity; seeing many of the first shall be last, and the last first, and the chief of sinners may, for what we know, become most eminent in faith and holiness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. v. 1-16. In interpreting the parable, the grand scope ought principally to be adverted to. The church, as represented by a vineyard, the employment of the servants, and their wages, with several other particulars, are only circumstances: (Marg. Ref. a-f.) the main scope of the parable respects the dealings of God with men according to the Gospel, and vindicates Him from the charge of injustice and partiality. Some expositors refer the different hours of the day, to several periods in the history of the church from the beginning; and others, to the times when a remnant of the Jews, and afterwards the Gentiles, were brought into the Christian church: but it is very difficult, at least, to make the circumstances of the parable in any measure accord to these events. With more plausibility and utility, they may be applied to the conversion of sinners, at the earlier and later stages of human life: for thus indeed one man does serve the Lord longer than another does. (Marg. Ref. g-o.) Yet this must not be strained too far: for it would be absurd to suppose, that any real Christians, at the great day of account, will murmur at the appointments of the Judge, or boast of their own services. It is, therefore, rather a description of the state of the visible church; and an illustration of the maxim, 'The last shall be first, and the first last,' in all its bearings. The concluding sentence evidently shows, that professors of religion in general were especially intended, and that they were addressed according to their own opinion of themselves, and not according to the real state of their souls. (Marg. Ref. u-d.) There is a possible, not wholly dissimilar, in the Jewish Talmud; and some Christian expositors seem to think, that our Lord took this from what was then extant of it: but omitted some things, which they seem to think ought to be added in order to a right understanding of the subject! especially, that the laborers, who came late into the vineyard, were so diligent, that in a short time they performed as much, as the others had done in the whole day; and were 'chosen,' because known to be men of remarkable industry. This is supposed to be necessary in order to make the parable consist with every man being rewarded according to his works. But Dr. Doddridge has very justly called the parable of the Talmudists, 'an insipid imitation;' and we may add, that it is a perversion of the parable before us, in opposition to the grand principles of the Gospel. The nature and motives of our works, and not merely the quantity, must be taken into the account at the great day; and the reward be made accordingly: (See 25: 34-40. Rom. 2: 4-11. 1 Cor. 5: 10-12.) but this is not the immediate subject of the parable, which has above been fully shown.

(1.) Early. The day's work began with the rising of the sun, and ended at the appearance of the stars. Lightfoot. In this simile, as in others, some things are dissimilar, which may only respect the ornament, and do not affect the scope of the parable: as the laborers waiting to be hired, and the murmurers, &c. of the laborers after the distribution of the wages. The main point of similarity is the rejection of those who were first, and the admission of those who seemed last.

The soul of man stands ready to be hired into some service or other; it was (as all the creatures were) created to work, and is a servant to iniquity, or to righteousness, Rom. 6:19. The devil, by his temptations, is hiring laborers into his field, to feed swine; God, by his Gospel, is hiring laborers into his vineyard, to dress it, and keep it. We are put to our choice; for hired we must be; (Josh. 24:15.) Choose ye this day whom you will serve. Secondly, Till hired into the service of God, we are standing all the day idle; a sinful state, though a state of drudgery to Satan, may really be called a state of idleness; sinners are doing nothing of the great work they were sent into the world about, or that will pass well in the account. Thirdly, The gospel call is given to those that stand idle in the marketplace. The marketplace is a place of concourse, and there wisdom cries: (Prov. 1:20, 21.) a place of sport, there the children are playing; (ch. 11:16.) and the Gospel calls us from vanity to seriousness; a place of business, of noise and hurry; and from that we are called to retire.

[3.] What are they ailed to do? To labor in his vineyard. Note, First, The church is God's vineyard; and the fruits of it must be to his honor and praise. Secondly, We are all called to be laborers in this vineyard. The work of religion is vineyard-work, pruning, dressing, digging, watering, fencing, weeding. We have each of us our own vineyard to keep, our own soul; and it is God's, and to be kept and dressed for Him. In this work we must not be slothful, not loiterers, but laborers, working, and working out our own salvation. Work for God will not admit of trifling. A man may go idle to hell; but he that will go to heaven, must be busy.

[4.] What shall be their wages? He promises, First, A penny, (v. 2.) the value of seven pence halfpenny, a day's wages for a day's work, and the wages sufficient for the day's maintenance. This doth not prove that the reward of our obedience is of works, or of debt; (Rom. 4:4.) or that there is any proportion between our services and heaven's glories; but it is to signify that there is a reward set before us, and a sufficient one. Secondly, Whatsoever is right, v. 4, 7. Note, God will be sure not to be behindhand with any for the service they do Him: never any lost by working for God. The crown set be-

In the marketplace.] 'I have often seen laborers standing in the marketplace of large towns in these countries, waiting to be employed.'

In Hanna Jan is 'Nasjid Jumrah, a large mosque, and before it a maidan fairer. Paul was as one born out of due time, yet came not behind the chiefest of the apostles, and outdid those that were in Christ before him. Thus many that are last, shall be first. Some make it a caution to the disciples, who had boasted of their timely and zealous embrace of Christ; they had left all to follow Him; but let them look to it, that they press forward and persevere; else their good beginnings will avail them little; they that seemed to be first, would be last. Something of affinity there is between this parable and that of the prodigal son, where he that returned from his wandering, was as dear to his father as he that never went astray; first and last alike. 3. That the recompense of reward will be given to the saints, not according to the time of their conversion, but according to the preparations for it by grace in this world; not according to the seniority, (as Gen. 43:33.) but according to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Christ had promised the apostles, who followed Him in the regeneration, at the beginning of the gospel dispensation, great glory; (ch. 19:28.) but He now tells them that those who are in like manner faithful to Him, even in the latter end of the world, shall have the same reward, Rev. 2:26. 3:21. Sufferers for Christ in the latter days shall have the same reward with the martyrs and confessors of the primitive times, though they are more celebrated; and faithful ministers now, the same with the first fathers.

We have two things in the parable; the agreement with the laborers, and the account with them.

(1.) The agreement with the laborers; (v. 1-7.) and here it will be asked, as usual,

[1.] Who hires them? A man that is a householder. God is the great Householder; who, as a householder, has work to be done, and servants to do it; a great family in heaven and earth, which is named from Jesus Christ, Eph. 3:16. God hires laborers, not because He needs them, (for, if we be righteous, what do we unto Him?) but as some charitable, generous householders, in kindness to the poor, to save them from idleness and poverty; and pay them for working for themselves.

[2.] Whence they are hired? Out of the marketplace, where, till hired into God's service, they stand idle, v. 3, 6. Note, First, fore as is a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give.

Secondly, Others are hired in old age, at the eleventh hour, when the day of life is far spent. None are hired at the twelfth hour; when life is done, opportunity is done; but, while there is life, there is hope, 1. for old sinners; if, in sincerity, they turn to God, they shall doubtless be accepted: true repentance is never too late. 2. of old sinners; nothing is too hard for almighty grace to do. Nicodemus may be born again when he is old, and the old man be put off, who is corrupt.

Yet let none, on this presumption, put off their repentance till they are old. These were sent into the vineyard, it is true, at the eleventh hour; but nobody had hired them, or offered to hire them, before. Those that have had gospel-offers made them at the third, or sixth hour, and have resisted and refused them, will not have that to say for themselves at the eleventh hour, that these had; No man has hired us; nor can they be sure that any man will hire them at the ninth or eleventh hour; and therefore not to discourage any, but to awaken all, be it remembered, that none is the accepted time; if we will, hear his voice, it must be to-day.

(2.) The account with the laborers. Observe, [1.] When it was taken; when the evening was come. Note, evening-time is the reckoning time; the particular account must be given up in the evening of our life; for after death cometh the judgment. Faithful laborers shall re-fore as is a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give.

[5.] For what term are they hired? For a day. It is a short time; the reward is for eternity, the work but for a day; man is sent, to accomplish, as a hireling, his day, Job 14:6. This should quicken us to expedition and diligence in our work; it our great work be not done when our day is done, we are undone forever. It should also encourage us in reference to the hardships and difficulties of our work; the approaching shadow, which the servant earnestly desireth, will bring with it both rest, and the reward of our work, Job 7:2. Hold out, faith and patience, yet a little while.

[6.] Notice is taken of the several hours of the day, at which the laborers were hired. The apostles were sent forth at the first and third hour of the gospel-day; they had a first and a second mission, while Christ was on earth, and their business was to call in the Jews; after Christ's ascension, about the sixth and ninth hour, they went out again on the same errand preaching the Gospel to the Jews only, to them in Judea first, and afterward to them of the dispersion; but, at length, as it were about the eleventh hour, they called the Gentiles, and told them, that in Christ Jesus there should be no difference made between Jew and Greek.

But this may be, and commonly is, applied to the several ages of life, in which souls are converted to Christ. The common call is promiscuous, but the effectual, particular, and it is then effectual when we come at the call.

1st, Some are effectually called when very young; early in the morning. John the Baptist was sanctified from the womb, and therefore great; (Luke 1:15.) Timothy from a child; (2 Tim. 3:15.) Obadiah feared the Lord from his youth.

2dly, Others are savingly wrought upon in middle age; Go work in the vineyard, at the third, sixth, or ninth hour. The power of divine grace is magnified in the conversion of some, when in the midst of their pleasures and worldly pursuits, as Paul. God has work for all ages; no time amiss to turn to God; whatever hour of the day it is with us, the time past of our life may suffice that we have served sin; Go ye also into the vineyard. God turns away none that are willing to be hired, for yet there is room.

3dly, Others are hired in old age, at the eleventh hour, when the day of life is far spent. None are hired at the twelfth hour; when life is done, opportunity is done; but, while there is life, there is hope, 1. for old sinners; if, in sincerity, they turn to God, they shall doubtless be accepted: true repentance is never too late. 2. of old sinners; nothing is too hard for almighty grace to do. Nicodemus may be born again when he is old, and the old man be put off, who is corrupt.

Yet let none, on this presumption, put off their repentance till they are old. These were sent into the vineyard, it is true, at the eleventh hour; but nobody had hired them, or offered to hire them, before. Those that have had gospel-offers made them at the third, or sixth hour, and have resisted and refused them, will not have that to say for themselves at the eleventh hour, that these had; No man has hired us; nor can they be sure that any man will hire them at the ninth or eleventh hour; and therefore not to discourage any, but to awaken all, be it remembered, that none is the accepted time; if we will, hear his voice, it must be to-day.

(2.) The account with the laborers. Observe, [1.] When it was taken; when the evening was come. Note, evening-time is the reckoning time; the particular account must be given up in the evening of our life; for after death cometh the judgment. Faithful laborers shall re-or square, which serves as a market-place. Here we observed every morning before the sun rose, that a numerous band of peasants were collected with spades in their hands, waiting, as they informed us, to be hired for the day to work in the surrounding fields. When passing by the same place, late in the day, we still found others standing idle: on asking them, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" they answered us, "Because no man hath hired us."

8 So 'when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith 'unto his steward, Call the laborers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first.

9 And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny.

10 But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny.

11 And when they had received it, they murmured against the good-man of the house, 12 Saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day.

13 But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny?

not only be accepted, but by free grace richly rewarded. Compare Luke 17:7, 8, with Luke 12:37.

2dly, The particular pleading with those who were offended with this distribution in gavel-kind.* We have here,

1. The offence taken; v. 11, 12. Not that there is, or can be, any discontent or murmuring in heaven; but there may be, and often are, discontent and murmuring concerning heaven, while in prospect and promise in this world. This signifies the jealousy which the Jews were provoked to by the admission of the Gentiles into the kingdom of heaven. As the elder brother, in the parable of the prodigal, repined at the reception of his younger brother, and complained of his father's generosity to him; so these laborers quarrelled with their master, not so much because they had not enough, as because others were made equal with them. They boast, as the prodigal's elder brother did, of their good services, v. 12. Sinners are said to labor in the very fire, (Hab. 2:13.) but God's servants, at the worst, do but labor in the heat of the day, not in the heat of the iron furnace. The Gentiles, newly called in, have as much of the privileges of the kingdom of the Messiah as the Jews, have, who have so long been laboring in the vineyard of the Old-Testament church, in expectation of that kingdom. Note, There is a great proneness in us to think that we have too few, and others too many, of the tokens of God's favor; and that we do too much, and others too little, in the work of God. Very apt we all are to undervalue the deserts of others, and to overvalue our own. Perhaps, Christ here gives an intimation to Peter, not to boast too much, as he seemed to do, of his having left all to follow Christ. It is hard for those that do or suffer more than ordinary for God, not to be elevated too much with the thought of it, and to expect to merit by it. Blessed Paul guarded ceive their reward when they die; it is deferred till then, that they may wait with patience for it, but no longer; for God will observe his own rule, The hire of the laborers shall not abide with thee all night, until the morning. See Deut. 24:15. When Paul, that faithful laborer, departs, he is with Christ presently. The payment shall not be wholly deferred; but then, in the evening of the world will be the general account, when every one shall receive according to the things done in the body. When time ends, retribution commences; then call the laborers, and give them their hire. Ministers call them into the vineyard, to do their work; death calls them out of it to receive their penny; and to those to whom the call into the vineyard is effectual, the call out of it will be joyful. Observe, They did not come for their pay till they were called; we must with patience wait God's time for our rest and recompense; go by our Master's clock. The last trump, at the great day, shall call the laborers, 1 Thess. 4:16. Then shall thou call, saith the good and faithful servant, and I will answer. In calling the laborers, they must begin from the last, and so to the first. Let not those that come in at the eleventh hour, be put behind the rest, but, lest they should be discouraged, call them first. At the great day, though the dead in Christ shall rise first, yet they which are alive and remain, on whom the ends of the world (the eleventh hour of its day) come, shall be caught up together with them, in the clouds; no preference shall be given to seniority, but every man shall stand in his own lot at the end of the days.

[2.] What it was; and here observe, 1st. The general pay; v. 9, 10. Note, All that by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honor, and immortality, shall undoubtedly obtain eternal life, (Rom. 2:7.) not as wages, but as the gift of God. Though there be degrees of glory in heaven, yet it will be to all a complete happiness. They that come from the east and west, and are picked up out of the highways and the hedges, shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, at the same feast, ch. 8:11. In heaven, every vessel will be full, though not alike capacious. In the distributions of future joys, as it was in the gathering of the manna, he that shall gather much, will have nothing over, and he that shall gather little will have no lack, Exod. 16:18.

The giving of a whole day's wages to those that had not done the tenth part of a day's work, is designed to show that God distributes his rewards by grace and sovereignty, and not of debt. The best and earliest of the laborers may truly be said to labor in the vineyard scarcely one hour of their twelve; but even such defective services, done in sincerity, shall not only be accepted, but by free grace richly rewarded. Compare Luke 17:7, 8, with Luke 12:37.

2dly, The particular pleading with those who were offended with this distribution in gavel-kind.* We have here,

Very apt we all are to undervalue the deserts of others, and to overvalue our own. Perhaps, Christ here gives an intimation to Peter, not to boast too much, as he seemed to do, of his having left all to follow Christ. It is hard for those that do or suffer more than ordinary for God, not to be elevated too much with the thought of it, and to expect to merit by it. Blessed Paul guarded against this, when, though the chief of the apostles, he owned himself to be nothing, to be less than the least of all saints.

2. The offence removed. Three things the master of the house urges, in answer to this ill-natured surmise.

(1.) That the complainant had no reason at all to say, he had any wrong done to him, v. 13, 14. Here he asserts his own justice; Friend, I do thee no wrong. He calls him friend, for in reasoning with others we should use soft words and hard arguments; if our inferiors are peevish and provoking, yet we should not thereby be put into a passion, but speak calmly to them. [1.] It is uncontestedly true, that God can do no wrong. This is the prerogative of the King of kings. Is there unrighteousness with God? The apostle startles at the thought of it; God forbid! Rom. 3:5, 6. His word should silence all our murmurings, that, whatever God doth, he doth no wrong. [2.] If God gives that grace to others, which He denies to us, it is kindness to them, but no injustice to us; and we ought not to find fault with bounty to another, while it is no injustice to us. Because it is free grace, that is given to those that have it, boasting is forever excluded; and because it is free grace, that is withheld from those that have it not, murmuring is forever excluded. Thus shall every mouth be stopped, and all flesh be silent before God.

To convince the murmurer that he did no wrong, he refers him to the bargain, 'Didst not thou agree with me for a penny?' And if thou hast what thou didst agree for, thou hast no reason to cry out of wrong; thou shalt have what we agreed for. Though God is a debtor to none, yet He is graciously pleased to make himself a debtor by his own promise. Note, It is good for us often to consider what it was that we agreed with God for. First, Carnal worldlings agree with God for their penny in this world; they choose their portion in this life; (Ps. 17:14.) in these things they are willing to have their reward, (ch. 6:2, 5.) their consolation, (Luke 6:24.) their good things; (Luke 16:25.) and with these they shall be put off, and cut off from spiritual and eternal blessings; and herein God doeth them no wrong; they have what they agreed for. Secondly, Obedient believers agree with God for their penny in the other world, and they must remember that they have so agreed. Didst not thou agree to take up with heaven as thy portion, thy all, and to take up with nothing short of it? And wilt thou seek for a happiness in the creature, or think from thence to make up the deficiencies of thy happiness in God?

He therefore, 1. Ties him to his bargain; (v. 14.) Take that thine is, and go thy way. If we understand it of that which is ours by debt or absolute propriety, it would be a dreadful word; but if we understand it of that which is ours by gift, the free gift of God; it teaches us to be content with such things as we have. Instead of repining that we have no more, let us take what we have, and be thankful. If God be better in any respect to others than to us, yet we have no reason to complain while He is so much better to us than we deserve. 2. He tells him that those he envied should fare as well as he did; 'I will give unto this last, even as unto thee; I am resolved I will.' Note, The unchangeableness of God's purposes in dispensing his gifts, should silence our murmurings. If He will do it, it is not for us to gainsay; for He is in one mind, and who can turn Him? Neither grieveth He an account of any of his matters; nor is it fit He should.

(2.) He had no reason to quarrel with the master; for what he gave, was absolutely his own, v. 15. As before he asserted his justice, so here his sovereignty. Note, [1.] God is the Owner of all good; his propriety in it is absolute, sovereign, and unlimited. [2.] He may therefore give or withhold his blessings, as He pleases. What we have, is not our own, and others, and desires their hurt. What can have more evil in it? It is grief to ourselves, anger to God, and ill-will to our neighbor; and it is a sin that has neither pleasure, profit, nor honor, in it; it is an evil, an only evil.

[2.] The aggravation of it: 'It is because I am good.' Envy is unlike-ness to God, who is good, and doeth good, and delighteth in doing good; nay, it is an opposition and contradiction to God; it is a dislike of His proceedings, and a displeasure at what He doeth, and is pleased with. It is a direct violation of both the two great commandments at once; both that of love to God, in whose will we should acquiesce, and love to our neighbor, in whose welfare we should rejoice. Thus man's badness takes occasion from God's goodness to be more exceeding sinful.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. The pride of the human heart, and its enmity to the sovereignty of God, render it very difficult to convince men of the justice and goodness of his dispensations: yet nothing can be more certain, than that 'He is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.' This may be evidently proved, in respect of those parts of his plan, with which we are acquainted; if we impartially judge of them, according to the rules established in human society, for the conduct of men towards subjects, servants, and dependents, and for the disposal of their property. Let us then remember, that we are all condemned: criminals; and that our wise and righteous Sovereign does no more any injustice, and that He dispenses his unmerited favors as He sees good: let us forego every proud claim, and seek salvation as a free gift: and let us never envy or grudge; but always rejoice, and praise God, for every display of his mercy to the vilest of our fellow sinners. SCOTT. 'May we by divine grace appear in the happy number of those who are not only called, but chosen too! If we are first in privileges and opportunities, let us be careful that our improvement be proportionable; otherwise we shall be last, and see ourselves another day exceeded, and perhaps condemned, by those who stood in a rank much below us. We are called to a course of holy labor, even to work in our Lord's vineyard, or in every station, whether public or private, to do our utmost to promote the glory of God and the happiness of mankind. Let us not, with so many calls and so many advantages, stand all the day idle; but let us be active and patient, and cheerfully willing to bear all the burden and heat of the day in so good a cause; knowing that ere long the evening will come, and that He who employs us saith, Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be. Rev. 22:12. Let such as have long neglected the great business of life, be encouraged with this thought, that some were called at the eleventh hour; but let none presume on their having such a call, nor strain the parable so far as to imagine, that an equal reward awaits all, without any regard to their characters or improvements; which is most contrary to the reason of things, to the Word of God, and to the great intent of that day which is to render to every man according to his deeds. Rom. 2:6.

(16.) Called, &c. Called sometimes means invited, or favored with the means of grace; and at others, effectual vocation. (Marg. Ref.) See 2:1-14. Rom. 8:28-31. 2 Thes. 2:13. 1 Cor. 1:9. Multitudes are called in the former sense, who will at last appear to have been, at best, only plausible hypocrites. 'But they who are endued with so excellent a gift' (as predestination to life) 'be called according to God's purpose by His Spirit in due season, they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely, they be made the children of God by adoption; they be made like the image of His only begotten Son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works; and at length by God's mercy they attain to everlasting felicity.' 17th Article.—Chosen. 'The elect are few.'

Many are called, &c.] The word translated 'call,' which is used of God and Christ in the N. T. not only denotes to destine a benefit for, and offer it to, but to bestow it upon, any one. Now, since the Jews were the people of God, as it were selected from the other nations, since they had the true religion, and had many excellent benefits conferred on them, they were called 'the called' and also 'the chosen.' But Christ and the apostles were accustomed to apply the common forms of expression used in the Jewish ceremonies to Christians; and by them Christians were termed 'the called,' as being distinguished with particular favors by God. The difference between 'called' and 'chosen' is this: by 'the called' must be understood those who took upon them the Christian religion, and by 'the chosen' those who so received it, as to be Christians properly disposed and approved of God. 'The chosen' also denotes those who excel others, especially as applied to military affairs, (2 Sam. 6:1. 21:6. Ps. 89:3. 56:13) and the cognate word denotes all that is superior, and excellent in its kind, and to that account approved and loved. Gen. 23:26, where by the Sept. it is rendered by the same word here translated 'chosen,' and in Matt. 12:18. 'whom I have chosen' is explained 'my beloved.'

KUNDEL.

Grotius has a very learned and ingenious note on this text; but no genius or learning can be sufficient to prove what he seems to intend, that persons are called the chosen of God, merely with respect to the divine complacency in them on account of some distinguished virtue and excellence. Compare Deut. 7:6-8. 9:6. John 15:16. Acts 9:13, 15. Rom. 11:5, 6. and 1 John 4:19.

DODDRIIDGE.

Dr. A. Clarke supposes an allusion here to the ancient Roman custom of recruiting their armies by choosing from the citizens presented by the several tribes (summoned by the consuls for the purpose) those who were most proper to serve in war.

21. 17:22, 23. This intimates that He not only saw clearly what troubles lay before Him, but that his heart was on them. Note, It is good for us to be often thinking and speaking of our death, and of the sufferings which, it is likely, we may meet with betwixt this and the grave; and thus, by making them more familiar, they would become less formidable. This is one way of dying daily, and of taking up our cross daily; which would come neither the sooner nor the surer, but much the better, for our thoughts and discourses of them.

2. He is more particular here in foretelling his sufferings than any time before. He had said, (ch. 16:21.) that He should suffer many things, and be killed; and (ch. 17:22.) that He should be betrayed into the hands of men, and they should kill Him; but here He adds, that He shall be condemned and delivered to the Gentiles, that they shall mock Him, and scourge Him, and crucify Him: for the chief priests and scribes had no power to put Him to death, nor was crucifying a manner of death in use among the Jews. Christ suffered from the malice both of Jews and Gentiles, because He was to suffer for the salvation of both, and to reconcile both by his cross, Eph. 2:16.

3. Here, as before, He mentions his resurrection and glory, with his death and sufferings, v. 19. He still brings this in, (1.) To encourage Himself in his sufferings, and to carry Him cheerfully through them. He endured the cross for the joy set before Him; He foresaw He should rise again, and rise quickly. He shall be straightway glorified, John 13:32. (2.) To encourage his disciples, and comfort them, who would be overwhelmed and greatly terrified by his sufferings. (3.) To direct us, under all the sufferings of this present time, to keep up a believing prospect of the glory to be revealed, to look at the things that are not seen, that are eternal, which would enable us to call the present afflictions light, and but for a moment.

Y. 20-28. Here is, first, the request of James and John, and the rectifying of the mistake on which it was grounded; v. 20, 23. They were the sons of Zebedee, and two of the first three of Christ's disciples; Peter and they were his favorites; yet none were so often reproved as they; whom Christ loves best He reproves most, Rev. 3:19.

I. Here is the ambitious address they made to Christ, v. 20, 21. It was a great degree of faith, that they were confident of his kingdom though now He appeared in meanness; but a great degree of ignorance, that they still expected a temporal kingdom with worldly pomp and power, when He had so often told them of sufferings and self-denial. They expected to be grandees. They ask not for employment, but for honor only; and no place would serve them, but the highest, next to Christ. It is probable, that the last word in Christ's foregoing discourse gave occasion to this request, that the third day He should rise again. They concluded that his resurrection would be his entrance on his kingdom, and therefore resolved to put in their claims for the best place. What Christ said to comfort them, they thus abused, and were puffed up with. Some cannot bear comforts, but turn them to a wrong purpose; as sweetmeats in a foul stomach produce bile. Now observe,

1. Their policy in the management of this address; they put their mother on to present it. Though proud people think well of themselves, they would not be thought to do so, and therefore affect nothing more than a show of humility, (Col. 2:18.) and others must be put on to court that honor for them, which they are ashamed to court for themselves. The mother of James and John was Salome, as appears by comparing ch. 27:61 with Mark 15:40. Some think she was daughter of Cleophas or Alphaeus, and sister or cousin german to Mary, the mother of our Lord. She was one of those women that attended Christ, and ministered to Him; and they thought she had such an interest in Him, that He could deny her nothing, and therefore they make her their advocate. Thus, when Adonijah had an unreasonable request to make to Solomon, he put Bathsheba on to speak for him. It was their mother's weakness thus to become the tool of their ambition, which she should have given a check to. In gracious requests, we should learn this wisdom, to desire the prayers of those that have an interest at the throne of grace; we should beg of our praying friends to pray for us, and reckon it a real kindness.

It was likewise policy to ask first for a general grant, that He would do a certain thing for them, not in faith, but in presumption on that general promise; Ask, and it shall be given you; in which is implied this qualification of our request, that it be according to the revealed will of God, otherwise we ask and have not, if we ask to consume it on our lusts, Jam. 4:3.

2. There was pride at the bottom of it, a proud conceit of their own merit, a proud contempt of their brethren, and a proud desire of honor and preferment; pride is a sin that most easily besets us, and which it is hard to get clear of. It is a holy ambition, to strive to excel others in grace and holiness; but a sinful ambition to covet to exceed others in pomp and

Perhaps Zebedee, the father of James and John, was dead before this time, or he was not so constant a follower of Christ as his wife was; so that she is mentioned as 'the mother of Zebedee's children.' (Note, v. 18-22, v. 21, 22.) At their desire, in their name, and with them, she prostrated herself before Christ, and besought Him to grant her one request; seeming to expect, that He would engage his word before the petition was made. (Notes, 1 Kings 2:14-20, 3:5-14, Esth. 6:1-3.) They were however continually expecting that He would appear in his glory; and probably she had respect to the twelve thrones [200] which He had promised to the apostles; (19:28.) the two principal of which she wished to engage for her sons; being emboldened to make such a request, by the special favor which our Lord had shown to them. Either they did not duly attend to the meaning of the question, or they had too great a confidence in themselves, when they answered, that 'they were able.' He assured them, however, that they would be called thus to follow Him, through sufferings and persecutions and that they would be enabled to endure them for his sake. The words in Italics, 'it shall be given,' rather obscure the meaning, and may well be spared. Our Lord might indeed, by a strong figure of speech, be said to have been immersed in sufferings, when He endured the wrath of God as the propitiation for our sins; but the lighter afflictions of the apostles, connected with abundant joys and consolation, must be allowed, in this sense, to have been another and a far milder kind of baptism than his. (Marg. Ref. a-d.—See on 3:6.—also, 26:42-46, v. 42. Mark 10:35-45, v. 35-40. Luke 12:49-53, v. 50. John 18:10-14, v. 11. Col. 1:24.) They dream of being

to boast as though we had put it off. [2.] We know not what we ask, when we ask for the glory of wearing the crown, and ask not for grace to bear the cross in our way to it.

2. How He repressed the vanity and ambition of their request. They were boasting themselves with the fancy of sitting on his right hand, and on his left, in great state; to check this, he leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, and leaves them in the dark about their glory.

(1.) He leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, which they were not so mindful of as they ought to have been. They looked so earnestly on the crown, the prize, that they were ready to plunge headlong and unprepared into the foul way that led to it; therefore he thinks it necessary to put them in mind of the hardships that were before them, that they might be no surprise or terror to them.

Observe, [1.] How fairly he puts the matter to them, v. 22. 'You would stand candidates for the first post of honor in the kingdom; but are you able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of?' These same two disciples once knew not what manner of spirit they were of, when they were disturbed with anger; (Luke 9:55.) and now they were not aware what was amiss in their spirits, when they were lifted up with ambition. Christ sees that pride in us, which we discern not in ourselves.

Note, 1st. That to suffer for Christ, is to drink of a cup, and to be baptized with a baptism. In this description of sufferings, 1. Affliction abounds. It is supposed to be a bitter cup, wormwood and gall, those waters of a full cup, that are wrung out to God's people; (Ps. 73:10.) a cup of trembling indeed, but not of fire and brimstone, the cup of the wicked men, Ps. 11:6. It is supposed to be a baptism, a washing with the waters of affliction; some are dipped in them, the waters compass them about even to the soul; (Jonah 2:5.) others have but a sprinkling of them; both are baptisms. But, 2. Even in this, con- solation doth more abound. It is but a cup, not an ocean; a draught, hither perhaps, but we shall see the bottom of it; a cup in the hand of a Father;

(John 13:11.) and full of mixture, Ps. 75:8. It is but a baptism; if dipped, not drowned; perplexed, but not in despair. Baptism is an ordinance by which we join ourselves to the Lord in covenant and communion; and so is suffering for Christ, Ezek. 20:37. Isa. 49:10. Baptism is 'an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace;' and so is suffering for Christ, for unto us it is given, Phil. 1:29.

2dly. It is to drink of the same cup that Christ drank of, and to be baptized with the same baptism. Christ is before us in suffering, and left us an example. 1. It bespeaks the condescension of a suffering Christ, that He would drink of such a cup, (John 13:11.) nay, such a brook, (Ps. 110:7.) drink so deep, and yet so cheerfully; that He would be baptized with such a baptism, and was so forward to it, Luke 12:50. It was much that He would be grandeur. Seekest thou great things for thyself, when thou hast just now heard of thy Master's being mocked, and scourged, and crucified? For shame! Seek them not, Jer. 45:5.

II. Christ's answer to this address, (v. 22, 23.) directed not to the mother, but to the sons that set her on; they were overtaken in the fault of ambition, but Christ restored them with the spirit of meekness. Observe,

1. How he reproved the ignorance and error of their petition; Ye know not what ye ask.

(1.) They dreamed of a temporal kingdom, but Christ's kingdom is not of this world. They knew not what it was to sit on his right hand, and on his left; they talked of it as blind men do of colors. Our apprehensions of that glory which is yet to be revealed, are like the apprehensions which a child has of the preferences of grown men. If at length, through grace, we arrive at perfection, we shall then put away such childish fancies; when we come to see face to face, we shall know what we enjoy; but, now, alas, we know not what we ask; we can but ask for the good as it lies in the promise,

Tit. 1:2. What it will be in the performance, eye has not seen, nor ear heard. (2.) They were much in the dark concerning the way to that kingdom. They know not what they ask, who ask for the end, but overlook the means. The disciples thought, when they had left what little all they had for Christ, and had gone about the country a while, preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, all their service and suffering were over, and it was now time to ask, What shall we have? As if nothing were now to be looked for but crowns and garlands; whereas there were far greater hardships and difficulties before them than they had yet met with. They dream of being in Canaan presently, and consider not what they shall do in the swellings of

to boast as though we had put it off. [2.] We know not what we ask, when

cross in our way to it.

2. How He repressed the vanity and ambition of their request. They were boasting themselves with the fancy of sitting on his right hand, and on

sufferings, and leaves them in the dark about their glory.

(1.) He leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, which they were

the crown, the prize, that they were ready to plunge headlong and unprepared

into the foul way that led to it; therefore he thinks it necessary to put them in mind of the hardships that were before them, that they might be no surprise or terror to them.

Observe, [1.] How fairly he puts the matter to them, v. 22. 'You would stand candidates for the first post of honor in the kingdom; but are you able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of?' These same two disciples once knew not what manner of spirit they were of, when they were disturbed with anger; (Luke 9:55.) and now they were not aware what was amiss in their spirits, when they were lifted up with ambition. Christ sees that pride in us, which we discern not in ourselves.

Note, 1st. That to suffer for Christ, is to drink of a cup, and to be baptized with a baptism. In this description of sufferings, 1. Affliction abounds. It is supposed to be a bitter cup, wormwood and gall, those waters of a full cup, that are wrung out to God's people; (Ps. 73:10.) a cup of trembling indeed, but not of fire and brimstone, the cup of the wicked men, Ps. 11:6. It is supposed

baptized with water as a common sinner, much more with blood as a malefactor. But in all this, He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and was made sin for us. 2. It bespeaks one consolation of suffering Christians, that they do but pledge Christ in the bitter cup, are partakers of his sufferings, and fill up that which is behind of them; we must therefore arm ourselves with the same mind, and go to Him without the camp.

3dly. It is good for us to be often asking ourselves, if we are able to drink of this cup, and be baptized with this baptism. We must expect suffering, and look on it as hard to suffer well, and as becomes us. Are we able to suffer cheerfully, and in the worst times still to hold fast our integrity? What can we part with for Christ? How far will we give Him credit? Could I find in my heart to drink of a bitter cup, and to be baptized with a bloody baptism, rather than let go my hold of Christ? The truth is, Religion, if it be worth any thing, is worth every thing; but it is worth little, if it be not worth suffering for. Now let us sit down, and count the cost of dying for Christ, rather than denying Him, and ask, Can we take Him on these terms?

[3.] See how plainly and positively their sufferings are here foretold; (v. 23.) Ye shall drink of my cup. Sufferings foreseen will be the more easily borne, especially if looked upon under a right notion. Christ began in suffering for us, and expects we should pledge Him, in suffering for Him. Christ will have us know the worst, that we may make the best of our way to heaven; Ye shall drink: that is, ye shall suffer. James drank the bloody cup, first of all the apostles, Acts 12:2. John, though at last he died in his bed, if we may credit the ecclesiastical historians, yet often drank of this bitter cup, as when he was banished into the isle of Patmos, (Rev. 1:9.) and when (as they say) at Ephesus he was put into a caldron of boiling oil, but was miraculously preserved. He was, as the rest of the apostles, in deaths often. He took the cup, offered himself to the baptism, and it was accepted.

(2.) He leaves them in the dark about the degrees of their glory; it was enough to be assured that they should have a place in his kingdom. The lowest seat in heaven is an abundant recompense for the greatest sufferings on earth. But as to the preferences there, it was not fit there should be any intimation given for whom they were intended; for the infirmity of their present state could not bear such a discovery with any evenness; 'To sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give, and therefore not for you to ask or to know; but it shall be given to them of whom it is prepared of my Father.' Note, [1.] It is very probable that there are degrees of glory in heaven; for our Savior seems to allow that there are some that shall sit on his right hand and on his left,

(21.) The one at thy right hand. 'As thy chief ministers of state. There may perhaps be an allusion in these words to a circumstance which the talmaudic writers relate concerning the sanhedrim, that there were two officers of peculiar distinction, who sat on each side of the Nasi, or president of the court: the one on the right called the father of the justiciary, the other called the sage, who sat on the left.'

'According to eastern custom, the degree of proximity to the throne denoted the degree of dignity.' (Comp. 1 Kings 2:19. Ps. 45:9. and

1 Kings 2:1. BLOOMFIELD.)

(22.) Drink of the cup. 'An image frequent among the Hebrews, and was so forward to it, Luke 12:50. It was much that He would be draws, who thus compared God's benefits to a liberal entertainment, and usually compared whatever is dealt out to men by the Almighty, (whether good or evil) to a cup of wine. Nor was this confined to the Hebrews; for, as Doddridge tells us, it was customary among the ancients in general, to assign to each guest at a feast a particular cup, as well as dish; and by the kind and quantity of the liquor contained in it, the respect of the entertainer was expressed. Hence cup came in general to signify a portion assigned. (Ps. 16:5. 23:5.) whether of pleasure or sorrow. But the expression was more frequently used of evil than good. So Matt. 26:39, 42. Apoc. 14:10, 16. 19:16. Ps. 65:9. Jas. 5:17. Jer. 25:15. [Ps. 75:8.]

23 And he saith unto them, 'Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with: but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them* for whom it is prepared of my Father.

in others, which they allow of and indulge in themselves. Nothing makes more mischief among brethren, nor is the cause of more indignation and contention, than ambition, and desire of greatness. We never find Christ's disciples quarrelling, but something of this was at the bottom of it.

2. The check that Christ gave them. He had reproved this very sin before, (ch. 13:3,) and told them they must be humble as little children; yet they relapsed into it, and yet He reproved them for it thus mildly.

He called them unto Him, which intimates great tenderness and familiarity: wherefore He is fit to teach, and we are invited to learn of Him, because He is meek and lowly in heart. What He had to say concerned both the two disciples and the ten, and therefore He will have them all together. And He tells them, that, whereas they were asking which of them should have dominion in temporal kingdom, there was really no such dominion reserved for any of them. For,

Observe, [1.] What is the way of the princes of the Gentiles; (v. 25.) to exercise dominion and authority over their subjects, and (if they can) over one another too. That which bears them up in it, is, that they are great, and in the highest places. [2.] As the future glory itself, so the degrees of it, are purposed and prepared in the eternal counsel of God; as the common salvation, so the more peculiar honors, are appointed, the whole affair is long since settled, and there is a certain measure of the stature, both in grace and glory, Eph. 4:13. [3.] Christ, in dispensing the fruits of his own purchase, goes exactly by the measures of his Father's purpose. It is not mine to give, save to them (so it may be read) for whom it is prepared. Christ has the sole power of giving eternal life, but then it is to as many as were given Him, John 17:2. It is not mine to give, that is, to promise now; that matter is already settled and concerted, and the Father and Son understand one another perfectly well in this matter. 'It is not mine to give to those that seek and are ambitious of it, but to those that by great humility and self-denial are prepared for it.'

III. Here are the reproof and instruction which Christ gave to the other ten disciples for their displeasure at the request of James and John. He had much to bear with in them all, they were so weak in knowledge and grace, yet he bore it.

1. The fret the ten disciples were in; (v. 24.) not because the two brethren were desirous to be preferred, which was their sin, and for which Christ was displeased with them, but because they were desirous to be preferred before them, which was a reflection on them. Many seem to have indignation at sin, not because it is sin, but because it touches them. They will inform against a man that swears; but it is only if he swear at them, not because he dishonors God. These disciples were angry at their brethren's ambition, though they themselves, nay because they themselves, were, as ambitious. Note, It is common for people to be angry at those sins in others, which they allow of and indulge in themselves. Nothing makes more mischief among brethren, nor is the cause of more indignation and contention, than ambition, and desire of greatness. We never find Christ's disciples quarrelling, but something of this was at the bottom of it.

2. The check that Christ gave them. He had reproved this very sin before, (ch. 13:3,) and told them they must be humble as little children; yet they relapsed into it, and yet He reproved them for it thus mildly.

He called them unto Him, which intimates great tenderness and familiarity: wherefore He is fit to teach, and we are invited to learn of Him, because He is meek and lowly in heart. What He had to say concerned both the two disciples and the ten, and therefore He will have them all together. And He tells them, that, whereas they were asking which of them should have dominion in temporal kingdom, there was really no such dominion reserved for any of them. For,

(1.) They must not be like the princes of the Gentiles. Principality no more becomes ministers than Gentilism doth Christians.

Observe, [1.] What is the way of the princes of the Gentiles; (v. 25.) to exercise dominion and authority over their subjects, and (if they can) over one another too. That which bears them up in it, is, that they are great, and great men think they may do any thing. Dominion and authority are the great things which they pursue, and pride themselves in.

[2.] What is the will of Christ concerning his apostles and ministers, in this matter.

First, It shall not be so among you. The constitution of the spiritual kingdom is quite different. 'You are to instruct and beseech, to counsel and comfort, to take pains with, and suffer with, not to exercise dominion or authority over the subjects of this kingdom; you are not to lord it over God's heritage, (1 Pet. 5:3.) but to labor in it.' This forbids not only tyranny, and abuse of power, but the claim or use of any such secular authority as the princes of the Gentiles lawfully exercise. So hard is it for 'vain men, even good men, to have such authority, and not to be puffed up, and do more hurt than good with it, that our Lord Jesus saw fit wholly to banish it out of his church. Paul himself disowns dominion over the faith of any, 2 Cor. 1:24. Now, if there were no such power and honor intended to be in the church, it was nonsense for them to be striving who should have it. They knew not what they asked.

Secondly, How then shall it be among the disciples of Christ? Something of greatness among them Christ Himself had intimated, and here He explains it; 'He that will be great among you, really so, and so at last, let him be your minister, your servant,' v. 26, 27. Here observe, 1. That it is the duty of Christ's disciples to serve one another, for mutual edification. This includes both humility and usefulness. The followers of Christ must be ready to stoop to the meanest offices of love for the good one of another, must submit one to another, (1 Pet. 5:5. Eph. 5:21.) and edify one another, (Rom. 14:19.) please one another for good, Rom. 15:2. The great apostle made himself every one's servant; see 1 Cor. 9:19. 2. It is the dignity of Christ's disciples faithfully to discharge this duty. The way to be great and chief is, to be humble and servicable. Those are to be best accounted of, and most respected, in the church, and will be so by all that understand things aright, who are most humble and self-denying and lay out themselves most to do good, though to the diminishing of themselves. These honor God most, and those He will honor. As he must become a fool, that would be wise, so he must become a servant, that would be chief. Paul was a great example of this. Do we not by consent call him the great apostle, though he called himself less than the least? And perhaps he it was for whom the first post of honor in Christ's kingdom was reserved and prepared of his Father, not for James who sought it; and therefore, just before Paul began to be famous as an apostle, Providence ordered

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-23. A believing view of our once crucified, and now glorified Redeemer, is the great antidote to a proud, self-justifying disposition. When we consider what need there was of the humiliation and sufferings of the Son of God, in order to the salvation of sinners; and when we recollect the willingness, meekness, constancy, and patience, with which the Redeemer endured the insults and cruelty of men and the wrath of God for us; we cannot but feel our self-sufficiency abate, and be sensible of the unspeakable freeness and richness of divine grace in our salvation. Yet with what strange indifference do even disciples sometimes read, hear, or speak of these interesting topics! especially when Satan tempts them to aspire after 'the honor that cometh from man.' If we ask such things as are truly good for us or others, God will not refuse our request: but when we pray, under the influence of pride, avarice, or any other passion, we 'know not what we ask;' we mistake poison for food or medicine; and if He loves us, He will withhold from us what we foolishly crave. If we would at last be conformed to our glorified Lord, we must be willing here to have fellowship with Him in his sufferings; we must pass through tribulations and reproach; we must drink in some measure of his bitter cup, and experience some degree of his afflictive baptism: yet how light, and mingled with comfort, are our sharpest trials, compared with the unmixed agony and anguish which He endured for us! Possessing a good hope of being admitted to the felicity of heaven, we shall be satisfied with the thought, that it will be 'according as it is prepared for us by our heavenly Father.' And, even in this world, it becomes us indeed to be earnest about growth in grace, and diligence and fruitfulness, the redemption of our time and the improvement of our talents, and usefulness in the lowest station in the church; but not about pre-eminence among our brethren.

SCOTT.

(23.) Baptism.] 'A metaphor expressive of deep affliction, very frequent among the Hebrew writers, and not unknown to the classical ones.'

Afflictions are ordinarily compared in Scripture to waters. Pools. Phrases like these, to be overwhelmed with grief, to be immersed in affliction, are common in most languages.

Verses 25-28.

This does not prove, that Christians must not be kings or rulers; but it fully demonstrates, that they must not be ambitious and tyrannical. Government and discipline are also necessary to the church: but worldly power, the pride of life, dominion over consciences, and the spirit of persecution, are not necessary to its rulers, under any form of government.

ment, nay, totally incompatible with the spirit of the Gospel, though, alas! too common in most ages and places.

(25.) 'The government of the church of Christ is widely different from secular governments. It is founded on humility and brotherly love; it is derived from Christ, the great Head of the church, and is ever conducted by his maxims and Spirit. When political matters are brought into the church of Christ, both are ruined. The church has more than once ruined the state; the state has often corrupted the church: it is certainly for the interests of both to be kept separate. This has already been abundantly exemplified in both cases, and will continue so to be, over the whole world, wherever the church and state are united in secular matters.'

seed, for which his soul travailed; and when they all come together, though now they appear but a little flock.

Now this is a good reason why we should not strive for precedence, because the cross is our banner, and our Master's death is our life. It is a good reason why we should study to do good, and, in consideration of the love of Christ in dying for us, not hesitate to lay down our lives for the brethren, 1 John 3:16. Ministers should be more forward than others to serve and suffer for the good of souls, as blessed Paul was, Acts 20:24, Phil. 2:17. The nearer we are all concerned in, and the more we are advantaged by, the humility and humiliation of Christ, the more ready and careful we should be to imitate it.

V. 29-34. We have here an account of the cure of two poor blind beggars; in which we may observe,

I. Their address to Christ, v. 29, 30. And in this,

(26, 27.) Your minister.] 'Or, deacon, whose office in the primitive church was to serve in the agape, or love feasts, to distribute the bread and wine to the communicants; to proclaim different parts and names of worship in the churches; and to take care of the widows, orphans, prisoners, and sick, who were provided for out of the revenues of the church. Thus we find it was the very lowest ecclesiastical office. Deacons were first appointed by the apostles, Acts 6:1-6. They had the care of the poor, and preached occasionally.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

The primitive sense of the original word is a servant, who attends his master, waits on him at table, and is always near his person, to obey his orders, which was accounted a more degradable kind of service.

Servant.] 'The lowest secular office; the original word is often put for slave.'

'We are to judge of the value of the words minister and servant, or servant and slave, from the import of those they are contrasted with. And, as desiring to be great is a more moderate ambition than desiring to be chief, we naturally conclude, that as the word opposed to the former should be expressive of some of the inferior stations in life, that opposed to the latter must be expressive of the lowest.' CAMPBELL.

so that James was cut off, (Acts 12:1,) that is, the college of the twelve, Paul might be substituted in his room.

(2.) They must be like the Master Himself; and it is very fit they should. To both, the present state is a state of humiliation; the crown and glory were reserved for both in the future state. Let them consider that the Son of man came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many, v. 28. Our Lord Jesus here sets Himself before his disciples, as a pattern of those two things before recommended, humility and usefulness.

[1.] Never was there such an example of humility and condescension, as in the life of Christ. When the Son of God came into the world, one would think He should have been ministered to; but He made no figure, had no pompous train of state-servants, nor was He clad in robes of honor, for He took on Him the form of a servant. He was indeed ministered to as a poor man, (Luke 8:2, 3.) but never as a great man; He never took state on Him, was not waited on at table; He once washed his disciples' feet, but we never read that they washed his feet. He came to minister, attended continually to this very thing, denying Himself both food and rest to attend to it.

[2.] Never was there such an example of beneficence and usefulness as in the death of Christ. He lived as a servant, but died as a sacrifice, and in that He did the greatest good of all. He came into the world on purpose to give his life a ransom; it was first in his intention. The aspiring princes of the Gentiles make the lives of many a ransom for their own honor, and perhaps a sacrifice to their own humor. Christ doth not so; his subjects' blood is precious to Him, and He is not prodigal of it; (Ps. 72:14.) but, on the contrary, gives his honor and life too, a ransom for his subjects.

Note, First, Jesus Christ laid down his life for a ransom. Our lives were forfeited into the hands of divine justice by sin. Christ, by parting with his life, made atonement for sin, and so rescued ours; He was made Sin and a Curse for us, and died, not only for our good, but in our stead, Acts 20:28. 1 Peter 1:18, 19. Secondly. It was a ransom for many, sufficient for all, effectual for many; and, if for many, then saith the poor doubting soul, 'Why not for me?' It was for many, that by Him many may be made righteous. These many were his

1. The circumstances of it are observable. It was as Christ and his disciples departed from Jericho; of that devoted place, which was rebuilt under a curse, Christ took his leave with this blessing, for He received gifts even for the rebellious. It was in the presence of a great multitude that followed Him: Christ had a numerous, though not a pompous, attendance, and did good to them, though He did not take state to Himself. This multitude was a mixed multitude. Some followed Him for loaves, and some for love, some for curiosity, and some in expectation of his temporal reign, very few with desire to be taught their duty; yet, for the sake of those few, He confirmed his doctrine by miracles wrought in the presence of great multitudes; who, if they were not convinced by them, would be the more inexcusable. Two blind men concurred in their request; for joint-prayer is pleasing to Christ, ch. 18:19. These joint-sufferers were joint-suitors. Note, It is good for those that are laboring under the same calamity, to join together in the same prayer for relief, that they may quicken one another's fervency, and encourage one another's faith. There is mercy enough in Christ for all the petitioners. These blind men were sitting by the way-side, as blind beggars used to do. Note, Those that would receive mercy from Christ, must place themselves where his out-goings are. It is good thus to way-lay Christ, to be in his road.

They heard that Jesus passed by. Though they were blind, they were not deaf. Seeing and hearing are the learning senses. It is a great calamity to want either; but the defect of one may be, and often is, made up in the acuteness of the other; and therefore it has been observed by some, as an instance of the goodness of Providence, that none were ever known to be born both blind and deaf; but that, one way or other, all are in a capacity of receiving knowledge. These blind men had heard of Christ by the hearing of the ear, but they desired that their eyes might see Him. Note, It is good to improve the present opportunity, because, if once let slip, it may never return; these blind men did so, and did wisely; for we do not find that Christ ever came to Jericho again. None is the accepted time.

2. The address itself is more observable; Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David, repeated again, v. 31. Four things are here recommended to us for an example.

(1.) Importunity in prayer. They cried out as men in earnest: men in want are earnest, of course. Cold desires do but beg denials. Those that would prevail in prayer, must stir up themselves to take hold on God in the duty. When they were discountenanced in it, they cried the more. The stream of fervency, if it be stopped, will rise and swell the higher. This is wrestling with God in prayer, and makes us the fitter to receive mercy; for, the more it is striven for, the more it will be prized and thankfully acknowledged.

(2.) Humility in prayer; in that word, Have mercy on us, not specifying the favor, or pre-

35:31, where a satisfaction (Hebrew, atonement,) for the life of a murderer is refused. The original Greek word is used by Lucian in exactly the same sense, who represents Ganymede promising to sacrifice a ram to Jupiter as "a ransom for himself," provided he would dismiss him. The whole Gentile world, as well as the Jews, believed in vicarious sacrifices. Virg. Æn. V. 815, has nearly the same words as those in the text "One man must be given for many." Jesus Christ laid down his life as a ransom for the lives and souls of the children of men.

Cried out.] 'Though God had deprived them, for wise reasons, of the use of their eyes. He left them the use of their speech. It is necessary to ill with us but it might be much worse: let us, therefore, be submissive and thankful.'

'Much has been said by some commentators, who endeavor to devise methods of reconciling the minute discrepancy which here subsists between the different evangelists. These variations arose from the diversity of oral narration; and such trifling discrepancies, which are perpetually found in the best historians, are of no moment, and it is not necessary anxiously to hunt after conjectures by which such diversities may be reconciled. As the credibility of historians is not diminished by such, but rather increased, so will not that of the evangelists be at all affected.'

multitude that followed Christ. Note, Sincere, serious beggars at Christ's door, commonly meet with the worst rebukes from those that follow Him in pretence only. ^aBut they would not be beaten off so. When they were in pursuit of such a mercy, it was no time to compliment, or to practise a timid delicacy; no, they cried the more. Note, Men ought always to pray and not to faint; to pray with all perseverance; (Luke 18: 1.) to continue in prayer with resolution, and not to yield to opposition.

II. Christ's answer. The multitude rebuked them; but Christ encouraged them. It were sad for us, if the Master were not more kind and tender than the multitude; but He will not suffer his humble supplicants to be run down, and put out of countenance.

1. He stood still and called them, v. 32. He was going to Jerusalem, and straitened till his work there was accomplished; yet He stood still to cure these blind men. Note, When we are ever so much in haste about any business, yet we should be willing to stand still, to do good. He called them, not because He could not cure them at a distance, but would do it in the most obliging and instructing way, and would countenance weak but willing patients and petitioners. Christ not only enjoins us to pray, but invites us; holds out the golden sceptre, and bids us come and touch the top.

2. He inquired further into their case; v. 32. This implies, (1.) A very fair offer; (Here I am; let Me know what you would have, and you shall have scribing what, much less pleading merit, but casting themselves on, and referring themselves cheerfully to, the Mediator's mercy, in what way He pleases; 'Only have mercy.' They ask not for silver nor gold, though they were poor, but mercy, mercy. This is that which our hearts must be upon, when we come to the throne of grace, that we may find mercy. Heb. 4: 16. Ps. 130: 7.

(3.) Faith in prayer; in the title they gave to Christ, which was in the nature of a plea; O Lord, Thou Son of David; they confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, and therefore had authority to command deliverance for them. Surely it was by the Holy Ghost that they called Christ Lord, 1 Cor. 12: 3. Thus they take their encouragement in prayer from his power, as, in calling Him the Son of David, they take encouragement from his goodness, as Messiah, of whom so many kind and tender things had been foretold, particularly his compassion to the poor and needy, Ps. 72: 12, 13. It is of excellent use, in prayer, to eye Christ in the grace and glory of his Messiahship; to remember that He is the Son of David, whose office it is to help and save, and plead it with Him.

(4.) Perseverance in prayer, notwithstanding discouragement. The multitude rebuked them, as noisy, clamorous, and impertinent, and bid them hold their peace, and not disturb the Master, who perhaps at first Himself seemed not to regard them. In following Christ with our prayers, we must expect to meet hindrances and discouragements from within and from without, something or other that bids us hold our peace. Such rebukes are permitted, that faith and fervency, patience and perseverance, may be tried. These poor blind men were rebuked by the

it. (2.) A condition annexed, which is very easy and reasonable—that they should tell Him what they would have Him do for them. One would think this a strange question; any one might tell what they would have. Christ knew but He would know it from them, whether they begged only for alms, as from a common person, or for a cure, as from the Messiah. Note, It is the will of God, that we make our requests known to Him by prayer and supplication; not to inform, or move Him, but to qualify ourselves for the mercy. The waterman in 'the boat, who with his hook takes hold of the snore, does not thereby pull the shore to the boat, but the boat to the shore. In prayer we do not draw the mercy to ourselves, but ourselves to the mercy.

They soon made known their request to Him, such as they never made to any one else; Lord, that our eyes may be opened. The wants and burthens of the body we are soon sensible of, and can readily relate. Oh that we were but as apprehensive of our spiritual maladies, and could as feelingly complain of them, especially our spiritual blindness! Lord, that the eyes of our mind may be opened! Many are spiritually blind, and yet say they see, John 9: 41. Were we but sensible of our darkness, we should soon apply to Him who alone has eye-salve, with this request, Lord, that our eyes may be opened!

3. He cured them; when He encouraged them to seek Him, He did not say, Seek in vain What He did was an instance,

(1.) Of his pity; He had compassion on them Misery is the object of mercy. It was the tender mercy of our God, that gave light and sight to them that sat in darkness, Luke 1: 78, 79 We cannot help those that are under such calamities, as Christ did; but we may and must pity them, as Christ did, and draw out our soul to them.

(2.) Of his power; He that formed the eye, can He not heal it? Yes, He can, He did it easily, He touched their eyes; He did it effectually, Immediately their eyes received sight. That He not only proved that He was sent of God, but showed on what errand He was sent—to give sight to those that are spiritually blind, to turn them from darkness to light.

Lastly, These blind men, when they had received sight, followed Him. Note, None follow Christ blindfold. He first, by his grace, opens men's eyes, and so draws their hearts after Him. They followed Christ, as his disciples, to learn of Him, and as his witnesses, to bear their testimony to Him, and to his power and goodness. The best evidence of spiritual illumination is a constant, inseparable adherence to Jesus Christ as our Lord and Leader.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—34. Alas! how have ambition and envy moved professed Christians to indignation against each other, and sown contentions among brethren, in every age! And what enormous mischiefs have arisen, from church-rulers and pastors exercising dominion after the manner of the kings, nay, tyrants of the nations; or indeed with more atrocious pride, cruelty, and iniquity! (P. O. Rev. 18: 9—19.) Carnal men thus seek to be the greatest; but those Christians and ministers are in reality the chief, and most honorable, and will be deemed so by all competent judges, who stoop the lowest, labor the most diligently, and suffer with most entire meekness and patience, in seeking to do good to their brethren, and to promote the salvation of souls. They most resemble Him, 'who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many;' and will be most honored by Him to all eternity. Yet so deceitful is the heart, that those who sincerely avow the determination of leaving all for Christ's sake, and in hope of an eternal and gracious recompense, and who have actually given up many things on these accounts, may yet have secret expectations of honor and importance among their brethren; which various circumstances detect, and which should always be watched against. But a humble sense of our own indigence, unworthiness, and misery, and exalted apprehensions of the Savior's power and grace, are in some respects the standard of human excellency, and the source of human felicity. However poor, ignorant, weak, and sinful that man may be, who thus humbly seeks to Christ for help, he will be earnest in proportion as his applications are discouraged; he will cry the more vehemently, when men would require him to 'hold his peace;' and the Lord will at length attend to him and answer his petitions; He will compassionate his sorrows, open his eyes, supply his wants, and forgive his sins; and thus enable him to join the number of his followers, and 'to show forth his praises, who hath called him out of darkness into his marvelous light.'

Rebuked them, because they should hold their peace. [Rather, chided them that they should be silent. The historian surely did not mean to blame the poor men for their importunity. Our Lord, on the contrary, commended such importunity, sometimes expressly in words, and always by making the application successful.] CAMPBELL.

The multitude rebuked them. [Whenever a soul begins to cry after Jesus for light and salvation, the world and the devil join to gether to drown its cries, or force it to be silent. But let all such remember, Jesus is now passing by; that their souls must perish eternally if not saved by Him, and they may never have so good an opportunity again. While there is a broken heart and a contrite spirit, let it sigh its complaints to God till He hear and answer. Reader, whenever thou art, act in behalf of thy soul as these blind men did in behalf of their sight, and thy salvation is sure. The Lord desires that earnestness and faith! Dr. A. A. A. A.

Some think He had herein an eye to the custom in Israel for the judges to ride on white asses, (Judg. 5:10.) and their sons on ass-colts, Judg. 12:14. And Christ would thus enter, not as a Conqueror, but as the Judge of Israel, who, for judgment came into this world.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI, v. 1-5. Several events, especially the resurrection of Lazarus from the dead, intervened before those recorded in this chapter. (See John 11:12, 1-11.) In his last journey to Jerusalem, he lodged at Bethany; and then proceeded on the road towards the city, to the extremity of that village, or rather to a part of the mount of Olives, which lay between it and Bethphage. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) From thence He sent two of his disciples to the village over against them, perhaps to Bethphage. The owners might have heard of Jesus nuder that title; but it undoubtedly implied a high claim of authority over them and their land. The kings of Israel and Judah were forbidden to multiply horses, or to use them in war; for this would make way for worldly confidences: it was therefore a proper characteristic of Zion's King, to come "riding on an ass," to denote the spiritual nature of his kingdom. Asses were then frequently used to ride on, though not so much as in preceding ages: yet this was an emblem of our Lord's external poverty and humiliation; and an open declaration, that He was Zion's predicted King and Savior. (Marg. Ref. f-1.—Note, Deut. 17:16.) The quotation is a more literal translation of the Hebrew text than the Septuagint is, in which the Greek word for an ass is not used, but more general terms, though two different words, both signifying an ass, or asses, or an ass, and a colt the son of asses, are found in the Hebrew. Perhaps they did not choose to state explicitly to the magnificent Grecians, famed for beautiful horses, that Zion's glorious King should come to his royal city riding on an ass's colt.

(1.) "Though Jesus was aware that his death was decreed by the Jewish rulers, yet He proceeded to Jerusalem." It cannot, however, be therefore concluded that He was prodigal of life. If in order to void

CHAP. XXI, v. 1-11. The death and resurrection of Jesus Christ are the two main hinges upon which the door of salvation turns. He came into the world on purpose to give his life a ransom; ch. 20:28. And therefore, the history of his sufferings, even unto death, and his rising again, is more particularly recorded by all the evangelists than any other part of his story; and to that, this evangelist now fastens apace. For at this chapter begins that which is called the passion-week. He had said to his disciples more than once, Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and there the Son of man must be betrayed. A great deal of good work He did by the way, and now at length He came up to Jerusalem.

All the four evangelists take notice of this event of Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, five days before his death. The Passover was on the fourteenth day of the month, and this was the tenth; on which day, the law appointed that the paschal lamb should be taken up, (Exod 12:3.) and set apart for that service; on that day therefore Christ, our Passover, who was to be sacrificed for us, was publicly showed. So that this was the prelude to his passion. He had lodged at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, for some time; and at a supper there, the night before, Mary had anointed his feet, John 12:2. Our Lord Jesus travelled much, and his custom was to travel on foot, which was both humbling and toilsome. How ill does it become Christians to be inordinately solicitous about their own ease and state, when their Master had so little of either! Yet once in his life He rode in triumph; and it was now when He went into Jerusalem, to suffer and die, as if that were the pleasure and premerment He courted.

Now, here we have, I. The provision made for this solemnity, which was very poor and ordinary. Here were no heralds at arms, no trumpet sounded before Him, no chariots of state, no liveries; such things were not agreeable to his present state of humiliation, but will be far outdone at his second coming, to which his magnificent appearance is reserved; when the last trumpet shall sound, the glorious angels shall be his heralds and attendants, and the clouds his chariots. But in his public appearance,

1. The preparation was sudden. For his glory in the other world, and ours with Him, preparation was made before the foundation of the world, his heart was on; his glory in this world He was dead to, and therefore did not forecast for it. They were come to Bethphage, a long scattering street that lay toward the mount of Olives; when He entered on that, He sent two of his disciples, some think Peter and John, to fetch Him an ass.

the sneers of his enemies, He had retired to some other country, not only would the Jews have striven to destroy Him by treachery, as a condemned criminal, but also in the promulgation of his doctrine He would have incurred the hatred and envy of the priests; and for the sake of preserving his life, He would have been compelled to deliver his doctrine to a few only, and those, disciples interioris admissionis. But then He could not have vindicated his claims to the dignity of Messiah. For it was in Judea that the Messiah was to come forward and erect his kingdom; nor would all those hopes and expectations of Jesus, as Messiah, which his followers nourished, (and which, when He returned to life, and ascended back to heaven, proved their strongest excitement to virtue and constancy,) have then had place." KINGSLEY.

"Some think Bethphage to have been a certain tract of mount Olive, so called from the fig-trees with which it was planted; the Hebrew word for fig, together with that for house or place, making the name by composition. For although the mount was remarkable for olives, and hence received its name, it produced also the fig and the palm, and different tracts of it were wont to be denominated accordingly." ROSENM.

(3.) The Lord, &c. The master. Campbell. It was no great injury done to the owner, to borrow an ass for a mile, and then doubtless to feed and return it. But the evangelists do not descend to such minute particulars; not to mention that it is highly probable, that Jesus and the disciples were well known to the owner. Bloomfield. There is no appearance of Christ's intending to show his sovereignty in transferring the property of these creatures; and though, no doubt, He had the power to do it, his usual prudence would direct Him to waive it, at a time when so many eyes were upon Him for evil."

His government is mild and gentle, and his laws not written in the blood of his subjects, but in his own. His yoke is easy.

(2.) As an evidence of this, his appearance is very mean, sitting upon an ass, a creature made not for state, but service, not for battles, but for burthens; slow in its motions, but sure, and safe, and constant. The foretelling of this so long before, and the care taken that it should be exactly fulfilled, intimate it to have a peculiar significance, for the encouragement of poor souls to apply themselves to Christ. Mention is made in the prophecy of a colt, the foal of an ass; and therefore Christ sent for the colt with the ass, that the Scripture might be fulfilled.

III. The procession itself, which was answerable to the preparation, both being destitute of worldly pomp, and yet both accompanied with a spiritual power.

Observe, 1. His equipage; The disciples did as Jesus commanded them; (v. 6) they went to fetch the ass and the colt, not doubting but to find them, and to find the owner willing to lend them. Note, Christ's commands must not be disputed, but obeyed; and those that sincerely obey them shall not be balked or baffled in it; They brought the ass and the colt. The meanness and contemptibleness of the beast might have been made up with the richness of the trappings; but those were, like all the rest, such as came next to hand. Note, We ought not to be nice or curious, or to affect exactness, in outward conveniences. A holy indifference and neglect will become us in these things: it will evidence that our heart is not on them, and that we have learned the apostle's rule, (Rom. 12:16. margin,) to be content with mean things.

(5.) 'God, that He might keep the people of Israel in a more sensible dependence on Himself, forbade the use of that strong, generous and majestic animal, the horse, (Job 39:19-25.) in their armies, and also of chariots, (Deut. 17:16. Compare Josh. 11:6. Judg. 5:15.) and the removal of them is spoken of as matter of promise in the days of the Messiah, Hos. 1:7. Mic. 5:10, 11. and Zech. 9:10. It is therefore with great propriety that Christ, in his most public triumph, chose, according to the prophecy before us, to ride on an ass. Nor are we to imagine there was any thing mean and ridiculous in it; for the eastern asses are a much larger and more beautiful animal than ours, and it plainly appears the patriarchs and judges of the Jewish nation thought it no disgrace to ride upon them; of which Abraham, (Gen. 22: 3.) Moses, (Ex. 4: 20.) and Jair's family, (Judg. 10: 4.) are instances. Nay, magistrates are spoken of by the general description of those that rode on white asses, Judg. 5: 10. Compare Num. 22: 21. 2 Sam. 16: 2. 17: 23. 19: 26. Doddridge. A colt on which never man sat. Yearlings, which have never borne the yoke, and have never been employed for common purposes, are reserved for sacred uses. See Deut. 21: 3. 1 Sam. 6: 7.

Daughter of Sion. 1. 'A city of Sion, i. e. Jerusalem, its inhabitants. Sion, as being the most celebrated part of Jerusalem, is put (by synecdoche) for Jerusalem. It is a poetical figure, usual with the oriental writers, to personify a country or city under a woman, girl, virgin, or daughter. Neither was this unknown to the Greek poets, especially the lyric ones. Pindar very frequently uses it.' BLOOMFIELD. The King cometh, &c. 'The rabbins expressly refer this prophecy to the Messiah.'

GREENFIELD.

The disciples went, and did as every circumstance accord to what which was written of Him, (Zech. 9: 9.) where it ushers in a large prediction of the kingdom of the Messiah, must be accomplished. Now observe here,

1. How the coming of Christ is foretold, v. 5. Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is the church's King, according to the law of the kingdom, (Deut. 17: 15.) appointed and (Ps. 2: 6.) accepted, and to whom the daughter of Zion swears allegiance, Hos. 1: 11. (2.) Christ, the King of his church, is Head over all things to the church. He came to Sion, (Rom. 11: 26.) that out of Sion the law might go forth; for the church and its interests were all in all with the Redeemer.

(3.) Notice was given to the church, beforehand, of the coming of her King; Tell the daughter of Sion. Note, Christ will have his coming looked for, and waited for, and his subjects big with expectation of it; Cant. 3: 11. Notices of Christ's coming are usually ushered in with a Behold! Behold, thy King cometh; behold and wonder at Him, behold and welcome Him. Pilate, like Caiaphas, said he knew not what, in that great word, (John 19: 14.) Behold your King.

2. How his coming is described. When a king comes, something great and magnificent is expected, especially when he comes to take possession of his kingdom. The King, the Lord of hosts, was seen upon a throne high and lifted up; (Isa. 6: 1.) but there is nothing of that here; Behold, He cometh to thee meek, and sitting upon an ass. When Christ would appear in his glory, it is in his meekness, not in his majesty.

(1.) His temper is very mild. He comes not in wrath to take vengeance, but in mercy to work salvation. He is meek to suffer the greatest injuries and indignities for Zion's cause. He is easy of access, easy to be entreated. He is meek, not only as a Teacher, but as a Ruler.

His government is mild and gentle, and his laws not written in the blood of Any thing will serve travellers; and there is a beauty in some sort of carelessness, a noble negligence; yet the disciples furnished Him with the best they had, and did not object the spoiling of their clothes, when the Lord hath need of them. Note, We must not think the clothes on our backs too dear to part with for the service of Christ, for the clothing of his poor, destitute and afflicted members. I was naked, and you clothed me, ch. 25: 36. Christ stript Himself for us.

2. His retinue; there was nothing in this stately or magnificent. Sion's King comes to Sion, and the daughter of Sion was told of his coming long before; yet he is not attended by the gentlemen of the country, nor met by the magistrates of the city: He should have had the keys of the city presented Him, and been conducted with all possible convenience to the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David; but here is nothing of all this; He has his attendants, a very great multitude; but they are only the common people; the chief priests and the elders afterward herded with the multitude that abused Him on the cross; but we find none of them here joining with the multitude that did Him honor. Ye see here your calling, brethren, not many mighty, or noble, but the foolish things of this world, and base things, which are despised, 1 Cor. 1: 26, 28. Note, Christ is honored by the multitude, more than by the magnificence of his followers; for He values men by their souls, not by their preferments, names, or titles.

Now, concerning this great multitude, we are here told,

(1.) What they did; according to the best of their capacity, they studied to do honor to Christ. [1.] They spread their garments in the way, that He might ride on them. When Jehu was proclaimed king, the captains put their garments under him; in token of their subjection to him. Note, Those that take Christ for their King, must lay their all under his feet. Some think that these garments were spread, not on the ground, but on the hedges or walls, to adorn the roads; as, to beautify a cavalcade, the balconies are hung with tapestry. This was but a poor piece of state, yet Christ accepted their good-will; and we are hereby taught to contrive how to make Christ welcome to our hearts and houses. How shall we express our respects to Christ? What honor and what dignity shall be done to Him? [2.] Others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way, as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles, in token of liberty, victory, and joy; for the mystery of that feast is particularly spoken of as belonging to gospel-times, Zech. 14: 16.

(2.) What they said, both those that gave notice of his coming, and those that attended Him with their applauses, v. 9. When they carried branches about at the feast of tabernacles, they were wont to cry Hosanna, and from thence their Lord had foretold; which could not fail to impress their minds with a conviction of his divine knowledge and power, and help to prepare them for what was about to open. He was pleased to be seated on the unbroken colt; and by his miraculous energy to render it tractable and steady, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, which were sufficient to render unruly even an animal, that had been accustomed to the road. This seems to have been an emblem of his power, in rendering the hearts of sinners submissive to his will in the midst of the temptations of this world; and notwithstanding their natural pride, obstinacy, and carnal affections. Thereon, or on them; that is, on the garments; for He rode on the colt only. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Mark 11: 11—12, v. 7.)

(7.) And put on them their clothes. [1.] 'Tucher, who made a pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre in the last half of the fifteenth century, advises a person who intends travelling in Palestine, to "have a coat made at Venice, of double cloth, as it is very convenient in the Holy Land. You spread it upon the ass, and ride on it."'

Verse 8. Spread their garments in the way. [The custom of reverently strewing vests, flowers, &c. for the great to walk upon, was always, and still is, prevalent in the East. With this honor Alexander was received, as also Agrippa, when he came to Jerusalem. Nor was it confined to the east.]

'So also Clytemnestra orders her servant to spread garments in the road, to grace and honor the return of Agamemnon. Eschyl'

BURDER.

Dr. A. C. LAMM.

9 And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David: 'blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna 'in the highest!

10 And when he was come into Jerusalem, 'all the city was moved, saying, 'Who is this?

11 And the multitude said, 'This is Jesus the prophet 'of Nazareth of Galilee.

[Practical Observations.]

12 And Jesus 'went into the temple of God, 'and cast out all them that sold and bought to call their bundles of branches their Hosannas. Hosanna signifies, Save now, we beseech thee; referring to Ps. 118: 25, 26, where the Messiah is prophesied of as the Head-stone of the corner, though the builders refused Him; and all his loyal subjects are brought in triumphing with Him, and attending Him with hearty good wishes to the prosperity of all his enterprises. Hosanna to the Son of David is, 'This we do in honor of the Son of David.'

The hosannas with which Christ was attended, bespeak two things, [1.] Their welcoming his kingdom. Hosanna is the same with, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. It was foretold concerning this Son of David, that all nations shall call Him blessed; (Ps. 72: 17.) and all true believers in all ages concur: it is the genuine language of faith. Note, First, Jesus Christ comes in the name of the Lord; He is sanctified, and sent into the world, as Mediator; Him hath God the Father sealed. Secondly, The coming of Christ, in the name of the Lord, is worthy of all acceptance; we all ought to say, Blessed is He that cometh; and be pleased in Him. Well may we say, Blessed is He; for it is in Him that we are blessed.

[2.] Their wishing well to his kingdom; intimated in their Hosanna; earnestly desiring that prosperity and success may attend it, and that it might be a victorious kingdom; 'Send now prosperity to that kingdom.' If they understood it of a temporal kingdom, it was their mistake, which a little time would rectify; however, their good-will was accepted. Note, It is our duty earnestly to desire and pray for the prosperity and success of Christ's kingdom. Thus prayer must be made for Him continually, (Ps. 72: 15.) that all happiness may attend his interest in the world, and that, though He may ride on an ass, yet in his majesty He may ride meekness, Ps. 45: 4. This we mean, when we

They add, Hosanna in the highest; let prosperity in the highest degree attend Him, let Him have a name above every name, a throne above every throne; or, Let us praise Him in the best manner, with exalted affections; or, Let our prayers for his church ascend to heaven, to the highest heavens, and fetch in peace and salvation from thence. See Ps. 20: 6. The Lord saveth his Anointed, and will hear from his high, his holy heaven.

[3.] We have here his entertainment in Jerusalem; (v. 10.) every one took notice of Him, some were moved with wonder; others with laughter; some, perhaps, were moved with joy, who waited for the Consolation of Israel; others, of the pharisaical class, were moved with envy and indignation. So various

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. We should cheerfully resign whatever we possess, if the Lord require it; for He has a right to dispose of us and ours as He sees best.—There is nothing so mean in itself, but He knows how to employ it in his service: we should not then despise men of weak abilities, or in obscure stations; and we have no ground for self-complacency, should He be pleased to 'have need of us,' or to use us as the instruments of his work: nor ought we to wonder, if He at one time employ us, and afterward lay us aside, having no further occasion for us.—As meekness and external poverty distinguished our King, and even marked his triumphal entrance into Jerusalem, how inconsistent must avarice, ambition, and 'the pride of life be with the character of his subjects, and especially of his ministers.—His servants must unreservedly obey his orders, however opposite to the opinions and fashions of the world; and in so doing, He will order every circumstance for their good, and give them continual experience of his foreknowledge, truth, and love. He has every heart in his hand, and He can, when He pleases, dispose the multitude to favor his cause, and to honor his ministers. But of how little value in general is popular applause! It is the way of the unstable multitude, in every are the motions in the minds of men on the approach of Christ's kingdom!

Upon this commotion, we are further told,
(1.) What the citizens said, v. 10. [1.] They were, it seems, ignorant concerning Christ. Though the Glory of his people Israel, distinguished by many miracles, yet the daughters of Jerusalem knew Him not, Cant. 6: 9. The Holy One unknown in the holy city! In places where the clearest light shines, and the greatest profession of religion is made, there is more ignorance than we are aware of. [2.] Yet they were inquisitive concerning Him. Who is this that is thus cried out, and comes with so much observation? Who is this King of glory? Ps. 24: 8. Isa. 63: 1.

(2.) How the multitude answered them, v. 11. The multitude were better acquainted with Christ than the great ones. The voice of the people, is sometimes the voice of God. Now, in the account they give of Him, [1.] They were right in calling Him the Prophet, that great Prophet. Hitherto He had been known as a prophet, teaching and working miracles; now they attend Him as a King; Christ's priestly office was, of all the three, last discovered. [2.] Yet they missed it, in saying He was of Nazareth; and it helped to confirm some in their prejudices against Him. Note, Some, that are willing to honor Christ, yet labor under mistakes concerning Him, which would be rectified, if they would take pains to inform themselves.

V. 12-17. When Christ came into Jerusalem, He went not to the court or the palace, but into the temple, for his kingdom is spiritual, and not of this world. Now, what did He do there?

I. Thence He drove the buyers and sellers. Abuses must first be purged out, before that which is right can be established. The great Redeemer appears as a great Reformer, that turns away ungodliness, Rom. 11: 26. Here we are told,

1. What He did; v. 12. He had done this once before, (John 2: 14, 15.) but there was occasion to do it again.

(1.) The abuse was, buying and selling, and changing money, in the temple. Note, Lawful things, ill timed and ill placed, may become sinful things. What was done, though rectified, yet had the pretence of being for spiritual pur-

Verses 9-11.
It was owing, in great measure, to the miracle of Lazarus's resurrection, which took place not long before, that the people came thus to meet Christ, and welcome Him to Jerusalem: (See John 12: 12-19.) and He was pressed to accede to it, both as a reward of his character, and in order to accelerate his crucifixion, now that 'his time was come.' Some of the multitude might use one expression, and some another; but all meaning the same for substance. Part of them were true disciples; numbers were far less disposed, and act under no immediate impulse; and many might scarcely advert to the meaning of their own words: only, in joint with the rest, as it is customary on such occasions. No wonder, therefore, that when his disciples and favorers were intimidated and retired, and persons of another character came to hear the multitude, they as loudly cried out, 'Crucify Him, crucify Him.' (See 27: 19-23.) They were perhaps likewise disappointed, as to their expectations of a temporal kingdom immediately to be set up; and they might be willing to atone to their rulers for their former offence, by joining them against Jesus. For it gave the latter great umbrage to see the city in such commotion, and every body inquiring who this was, and ready to receive 'Jesus of Nazareth, the prophet of Galilee,' as their promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref.—See Mark 11: 1-11, v. 10.) (9.) Hosanna.] Note, Ps. 118: 25, 26. SCOTT.

(9.) Hosanna.] Dr. A. Clarke considers this as an acknowledgment of Christ as King, and as equivalent to, 'Redress our grievances, and give us help from oppression!' and refers to 2 Sam. 14: 4. 2 Kings 6: 26, and Ps. 118: 25.

(10.) This entry into Jerusalem has been termed the triumph of Christ. It was, indeed, the triumph of humility over pride and worldly grandeur; of poverty over affluence; and of meekness and gentleness over rage and malice. He is coming now, meek, full of kindness, and compassion to those who were plotting his destruction! He comes to deliver up Himself into their hands: their King comes to be murdered by his subjects, and to make his death a ransom price for their souls! Dr. A. CLARKE.

[1.] He shows, from a Scripture prophecy, (Isa. 56:7.) what the temple should be, and was designed to be; v. 13. Note, All the ceremonial institutions were intended to be subservient to moral duties; the temple was in a special manner sanctified to be a house of prayer, so that the prayers made in or toward that house had a particular promise of acceptance, (2 Chron. 6:21,) as it was a type of Christ: therefore Daniel looked that way in prayer; and in this sense, no house or place is now, or can be, a house of prayer; for Christ is our Temple; yet in some sense the appointed places of our religious assemblies may be so called, as places where prayer is wont to be made, Acts 16:13.

[2.] He shows, from a Scripture reproof, how they had abused the temple, and perverted the intention of it, v. 13. Is this house become a den of robbers in your eyes? Jer. 7:11. When dissipated piety is made the cloak and cover of iniquity, it may be said that the house of prayer is become a den of thieves. Markets are too often dens of thieves, so many are the corrupt and cheating practices in buying and selling; but markets in the temple are certainly so, for they rob God of his honor, the worst of thieving, Mal. 3:8. The priests lived plentifully on the altar; but, not content with that, they found other ways and means to squeeze money out of the people; and therefore Christ here calls them thieves, for they exacted that which did not belong to them.

II. There, in the temple, He healed the blind and the lame, v. 14. Christ, in the temple, by his word there preached, and in answer to the prayers there made, heals those that are spiritually blind and lame. It is good coming to the

Verses 12, 13.

It appears from Mark, that Jesus went to the temple and surveyed it, the same day on which He rode into Jerusalem; yet He relates the exactions of the traders, as if it had occurred on the next day: hence some conclude that He expelled them on two days in succession; the mercenary dealers returning to their occupation as soon as He was departed. (Mark 11:15.) But this is not probable. He found some of the precincts, probably the court of the Gentiles, turned into a market for cattle, and such things as were used in their sacrifices; and in part occupied by money-changers, who gave the current coin in exchange for that of other countries, for the sake of a premium; or gave money for bills of exchange or letters of credit, from merchants or bankers in the several countries whence the people came to worship. It may be supposed, that the persons concerned exacted on strangers, and thus joined iniquity to profanation: whilst the priests encouraged these scandalous transactions, doubtless for a share of the booty! At the same time, He reminded them of the words which God had spoken by his prophets concerning his temple, that it should be rendered a house of prayer and holy worship, not only to the Jews, but to persons of all nations: whereas, instead of allowing the Gentiles a place to worship in, they had converted the court intended for that purpose into a place of merchandise. The quotation from Isaiah, is in the words of the Septuagint; which exactly render the original Hebrew. The words of Jeremiah seem rather referred to, than quoted.

(12.) Amorice, covered with the veil of religion, is one of those things on which Christ looks with the greatest indignation in his church. Merchandise of holy things, simoniacal presentations, fraudulent exchanges, a mercenary spirit in sacred functions; ecclesiastical employ-poses. They sold beasts for sacrifice, for the convenience of those that could more easily bring their money with them than their beast; and they changed money for those that wanted the half-shekel, which was their yearly poll, or redemption-money; or, on bills of return; so that this might pass for the outward business of the house of God; and yet Christ will not allow of it. Note, Great corruptions and abuses come into the church by the practices of those whose gain is godliness, that is, who make worldly gain the end of their godliness, and counterfeit godliness in their way to worldly gain; (1 Tim. 6:5.) from such turn away.

(2.) The purging out of this abuse. Christ cast them out that sold. He did it before with a scourge of small cords; (John 2:13.) now with a look, a frown, a word of command. Some reckon this none of the least of Christ's miracles, and it is an instance of his power over the spirits of men, and the hold He has of them: by their own consciences. This was the only act of regal authority and coercive power that Christ did in the days of his flesh. Tradition says, that his face shone, and beams of light darted from his blessed eyes, which astonished these market-people, and compelled them to yield to his command; if so, the Scripture was fulfilled, Prov. 8:20. The King that sitteth on the throne of judgment, scattereth away all evil with his eyes. He overthrew the tables of the money-changers; He did not take the money to Himself, but scattered it, threw it to the ground, the fittest place for it. The Jews, in Esther's time, on the spoil laid not their hand, Esther 9:10.

(3.) What He said to justify Himself, and to convict them; (v. 13.) It is written. Note, In the reformation of the church, the eye must be on the Scripture, and that must be adhered to as the rule. Reformation is then right, when corrupted ordinances are reduced to their primitive institution.

temple, when Christ is there, who, a. He shows Himself jealous for the honor of his temple, a. expelling those who profane it, shows Himself, gracious to those who humbly seek Him; the blind and lame must keep their distance from princes' palaces, (2 Sam. 5:8.) but from God's temple only the wicked and profane. The temple was profaned when made a market-place, but honored when made an hospital; to be doing good in God's house, better becomes it, than to be getting money there. Christ's healing was a real answer to that question, Who is this? His works testified of Him more than the hosannas; and his healing in the temple was the fulfilling of the promise, that the glory of the latter house should be greater than the glory of the former.

There also He silenced the offence of the chief priests and scribes at the acclamations with which He was attended, v. 15, 16. They that should have been most forward to give Him honor, were his worst enemies.

1. They were vexed at the wonderful things He did, (as Acts 4:16, 5:33.) for they could not deny them to be true miracles. The works that Christ did, recommended themselves to every man's conscience. If they had any sense, they could not but own the miracle of them; and, if any good nature, could not but love the mercy of them; yet, because they were resolved to oppose Him, for these they envied Him, and bore Him a grudge.

(2.) They openly quarrelled at the children's hosannas; they thought that hereby an honor was given Him, which did not belong to Him, and that it looked like ostentation. Proud men cannot bear that honor should be done to any but themselves, and are uneasy at nothing more than at the just praises of deserving men. Thus Saul envied David the women's songs; and 'who can stand before envy?' When Christ is most honored, his enemies are most displeased.

Just now we saw Christ preferring the blind and the lame before the buyers and sellers; now (v. 16.) He takes part with the children against priests and scribes.

Observe, (1.) The children were in the temple, perhaps playing there; no wonder, when the rulers make it a market-place, that the children make it a place of pastime; but we are willing to hope that many of them were worshipping there. Note, It is good to bring children betimes to the house of prayer, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Let children be taught to keep up the form of godliness, it will help to lead them to the power of it. Christ has a tenderness for the lambs of his flock.

(2.) They were there, crying, Hosanna to the Son of David. Thus they learned from those that were grown up. Little children say and do as they hear others say, and see others do; so easily do they imitate; and therefore great care must be taken to set them good examples, and no bad ones. Our intercourse with the young should be conducted with the most scrupulous ments obtained by flattery, service or attendance, or by any thing which is instead of money; collations, nominations, and elections made through any other motive than the glory of God; these are all fatal and damnable profanations, of which those in the temple were only a shadow.

Quensel, in CLARKE.

(13.) A den of thieves. Our Lord alludes here to those dens and caves in Judea, in which the public robbers either hid, or kept themselves fortified. They who were placed themselves in the church of Christ to serve souls, and do it not, and they who enjoy the revenues of the church, and neglect the service of it, are thieves and robbers in more senses than one.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Thieves. As those Jews who came from distant countries to worship, often wanted the sacrifices required by the law, the priests took the advantage of buying up all the beasts appointed for that purpose, sold them to those who wanted them, and received them again at their hands. And as some who came were too poor to purchase even the smaller offerings, such as doves, &c. the priests placed bankers in the courts of the temple to lend money on security; but finding that they could not do this without transgressing the law, they appointed a kind of pawn-brokers instead of bankers—these, for the advance of a small sum, took fruits, herbs, and other commodities, instead of interest money. Our Lord, therefore, not only expelled their agents, but arraigned them also as a band of thieves.

care. Children will learn of those that are with them, either to curse and swear, or to pray and praise. The Jews did sometimes teach their children to carry branches at the feast of tabernacles, and to cry hosanna; but God taught them here to apply it to Christ. Note, Hosanna to the Son of David well becomes the mouths of little children, who should learn young the language of Canaan.

(3.) Our Lord Jesus not only allowed, but was pleased with it, and quoted a scripture which was fulfilled in it, (Ps. 8: 2.) or, at least may be accommodated to it; Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise; which, some think, refers to the children's joining in the acclamations of the people and the women's songs, with which David was honored when he returned from the slaughter of the Philistine; and therefore is very fitly applied here to the hosannas with which the Son of David was saluted, now that He was entering on his conflict with Satan, that Goliath. Note, [1.] Christ takes particular notice of the services of little children, and is well pleased with them. If God may be honored by babes and sucklings, much more by children, who are grown up to maturity and some capacity. [2.] Praise is perfected out of the mouth of such; it has a peculiar tendency to the honor and glory of God, for little children to join in his praises; the praise would be accounted defective and imperfect, if they had not their share in it; which is an encouragement for children to be good sometimes, and to parents to teach them to be so; the labor neither of the one nor of the other shall be in vain. In this psalm it is, Thou hast ordained strength. Note, God perfectly praise, by ordaining strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. When great things are brought about by weak and unlikely instruments, God is thereby much honored, for his strength is perfected in weakness; and the infirmities of the babes and sucklings serve for a foil to the divine power. That which follows in the psalm, That Thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger, was very applicable to the priests and scribes, but Christ left it to them to apply it.

Lastly, Christ, having thus silenced them, forsook them, p. 17. He left them, in prudence, lest they should now have seized Him before his hour was come; in justice, because they had forfeited the favor of his presence. By repin-ing at Christ's praises, we drive Him from us. He left them as incorrigible, and He went out of the city to Bethany, which was a more quiet retired place; not so much that He might sleep undisturbed, as that He might pray undisturbed. Bethany was but two little miles from Jerusalem; thither He now went on foot, to show that, when He rode, it was only to fulfil the Scripture. He was not lifted up with the hosannas of the people; but, as having forgot them, soon returned to his mean and toilsome way of travelling.

V. 18-22. Observe,

I. Christ returned in the morning to Jerusalem, v. 18. Some think He went out of the city over night, because none of his friends there durst entertain Him, for fear of the great men; yet, having work to do there, He returned. Note, We must never be driven from duty, either by the malice of foes, or the unkindness of friends.

II. As He went, He hungered. He was a Man, and submitted to the infirmities of nature; an active Man, so intent on his work, that He neglected his food, and came out fasting; a poor Man, for He had no present supply; a Man that pleased not Himself, for He would willingly have taken up with green raw figs for his breakfast, when it was fit that He should have had something warm.

Christ therefore hungered, that He might have occasion to work this miracle, in cursing, and withering, the barren fig-tree, and so give us an instructive instance both of his justice and power

1. See his justice, v. 19. He went to it, expecting fruit, because it had leaves; but, finding none, He sentenced it to a perpetual barrenness. The miracle had its significance, as well as his other miracles. All Christ's miracles hitherto were wrought for the good of men, and proved the power of his grace and blessing; (the sending of the devils into the herd of swine was but a permission;) but, now, at last, to show that all judgment is committed to Him, and that He is able not only to save, but to destroy, He would give a specimen of the power of his wrath and curse; yet this is only an imitation tree, that is set forth for an example; Come, learn a parable of the fig-tree, ch. 24: 32. The scope of it is the same with the parable of the fig-tree, Luke 13: 6.

(1.) This cursing of the barren fig-tree, represents the state of hypocrites in general; and

v. 12-16. When Zion's King shall come to enlarge his kingdom, He will begin with purging the church. If Christ should come into many parts of the visible church, how many recesses of iniquity and avarice would He discover and cleanse! And how many things which are daily practised under the guise of religion, would He show to be more suitable for 'a den of robbers,' than for 'the house of prayer!' (P. O. Rev. 18: 9-19.) May the Lord then come and purify the church; and may He stir up the spirit of such as have influence and authority, to check the progress of sacrilegious profanations.—It is indeed to be feared, that buying and selling in every way, are often connected with great dishonesty: yet certainly no merchandising is so iniquitous as that, which is conducted within the precincts of the sanctuary.—No wisdom, holiness, or benevolence, can silence the clamors of interested men against those persons, who endeavor to put a stop so their iniquitous lucre: nor can we wonder at this, when we recollect, that even the miracles and holiness of the Son of God could procure Him no exemption; but, on the contrary, drew on Him the more desperate enmity. Those who hate his Gospel, because it interferes with their interests, reputation or authority, will be greatly displeased with such as show favor to it; but the Lord has often 'perfected his praise' out of the mouths of mere children, in age, abilities, learning, or estate, when chief priests and learned scribes, and rulers professing Christianity, have contradicted and blasphemed.

Verse 16.

Out of the mouth of babes. 'The eighth Psalm, out of which these words are quoted, is applied to Jesus Christ in three other places in the new covenant, (1 Cor. 13: 29. Eph. 1: 22. Heb. 2: 6.) which proves it to be merely a prophetic psalm, relating to the Messiah. It was a common thing among the Jews for the children to be employed in public acclamations; and thus they were accustomed to hail their celebrated rabbins. Some imagine that babes and sucklings in the prophecy have a much more extensive meaning, and refer also to the first preachers of the Gospel of Christ.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

Have ye not read? 'The discourse in the psalm (Ps. 8: 3.) referred to, relates to the existence and providence of God, which are so manifest from the works of nature, that all, not obtuse and stupid men merely, but even children, may easily understand and acknowledge them.' This Jesus applies to the subject in hand. Even children, says He, may perceive and know that I am the Messiah.'

Verse 17.

It does not appear, that any person in Jerusalem offered to entertain Christ on this occasion; at least, He chose to retire to Bethany. Accordingly, He spent the night there, probably at the house of Lazarus and his sisters; and in the morning, for the sake of retirement, and that He might be early at the temple, or that He might not disturb the family, He went away fasting.

Jerome states, from Jerusalem. This village is now small and poor, and the cultivation of the soil around it is much neglected; but it is a pleasant romantic spot, shaded by the mount of Olives, and abounding in vines and long grass. It consists of from thirty to forty dwellings, inhabited by about six hundred Mohammedans. Here they show the ruins of a sort of castle as the house of Lazarus, and a grotto as his tomb; and the house of Simon the leper, of Mary Magdalene, and of Martha, and the identical tree which our Lord cursed, are among the monkish curiosities of the place.'

The untimely fig, which puts forth at the vernal equinox, and comes to maturity about the latter part of June, and in relish surpasses the other kinds. 2. The summer or dry fig, which appears about the middle of June, and comes to maturity in August; and 3. The winter fig, which germinates in August, and does not ripen until the falling of the leaves about the end of November.' [See the notes on the parallel passage in Mark.]

fruit should grow upon them, or be gathered from them, from henceforward forever. Never any good came from them, (except the particular persons among them that believed,) after they rejected Christ; blindness and hardness grew upon them, till they were unchurched, unpeopled, and undone, and their place and nation rooted up; their beauty was defaced, their privileges and ornaments, their temple, and priesthood, and sacrifices, and festivals, and all the glories of their church and state, fell like leaves in autumn. How soon did their fig-tree wither away, after they said, His blood be on us, and on our children! And the Lord was righteous in it.

2. See the power of Christ; the former is wrapped up in the figure, but this more fully discoursed of; Christ intending thereby to direct his disciples in the use of their powers.

(1.) The disciples admired the effect of Christ's curse, v. 20. There was no visible cause of the fig-tree's withering, but it was a secret blast, a worm at the root; not only the leaves withered, but the body of the tree; it withered away in an instant, and became like a dry stick. Gospel curses are, on this account, the most dreadful—that they work insensibly and silently, by a fire not blown, but effectually. (2.) Christ empowered them by faith to do the like; (v. 21, 22,) as He said, (John 14:12,) Greater works than these shall ye do.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—22. It is best to shun needless allegations with malicious opposers, and to avoid all appearances of ostentation: and the genuine followers of Christ will cheerfully submit to the pinchings of poverty or the cravings of hunger, rather than be deprived of opportunities of usefulness; though their zeal and love will not prevent them from feeling the inconvenience as sensibly as other men.—But let us be peculiarly afraid of the doom denounced on 'the barren fig-tree.' The leaves of profession may impose on men: but the Lord will shortly come, and seek for fruit; and if to the last He finds none, the tree will fall under his curse of everlasting unfruitfulness: and how tremendous the sentence of being left to eternal unholiness and enmity against God! to be eternally contrary to Him, and the object of his holy abhorrence and indignation! Such considerations should excite us to more fervent prayer, and lead us to offer all our petitions in an unwavering reliance on the promises of God, and on the merits of our great Advocate, fully expecting that He will grant our requests, in every thing really good for us. In this way, no impediments need discourage us, for we may surmount or remove them all, by the power of faith and prayer. Thus we may go on with our Master's work, without regarding the objections of his enemies.—Those who are evidently destitute of faith and grace, will often demand of the Lord's servants, by what authority they act. As if men might do mischief in a variety of ways without asking leave of any one, or taking out any licence or commission; but might not Observe, [1.] The description of this working faith; If ye have faith, and doubt not. Note, Doubting of the power and promise of God, is the great thing that spoils the efficacy and success of faith. 'If you have faith, and dispute not,' (so some read it) 'dispute not with yourselves, dispute not with the promise of God; if you stagger not at the promise,' (Rom. 4:20) for, as far as we do, so our faith is deficient; as certain as the promise is, so confident our faith should be.

[2.] The power and prevalence of it expressed figuratively; If ye shall say to this mountain, (meaning the mount of Olives,) Be thou removed, it shall be done. There might be a particular reason for his saying so of this mountain, for there was a prophecy, that the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem, should cleave in the midst, and then remove, Zech. 14:4. But this is a proverbial expression, intimating that we are to believe that nothing is impossible with God, and therefore that what He has promised shall certainly be performed, though to us it seem impossible. It was among the Jews a usual commendation of their learned rabbins, that they were removers of mountains, that is, could solve the greatest difficulties, now this may be done by faith acted on the Word of God, which will bring great and strange things to pass.

[3.] The way and means of exercising this faith, and of doing that which is to be done; i. v. 22. Faith is the soul, prayer the body; both together make a complete man for any service. Faith, if it be right, will excite prayer; and prayer is not right, if it do not spring from faith. This is the condition of our receiving; we must ask in prayer, believing. We have many promises to this purport from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, and all to encourage faith, the principal grace, and prayer, the principal duty, of a Christian. It is but ask and have, believe and receive; and what would we more? Observe how comprehensive the promise is—all things, whatsoever ye shall ask; this is like all and every the premises in a conveyance. All things, is general; whatsoever, is particular; though generals include particulars, yet such is the folly of our unbelief, that, though we think we assent to promises in the general, yet we fly off, when it comes to particulars, and therefore, that we might have strong consolation, it is thus copiously expressed, All things whatsoever.

endeavor to do good, without obtaining the permission of the enemies of all goodness! No doubt, order and regularity are in general expedient: but even where the external order of the church was of undoubted divine original; when its regular teachers and rulers degenerated, or evidently neglected their duty, God raised up extraordinary persons, to expose their crimes, and to call sinners to repentance, faith, and holiness. It is true that the sanction of miracles is requisite for those, who would introduce any new revelation; but it cannot be proved from Scripture, that these credentials are necessary to authorize such as only call on their perishing fellow-sinners 'to repent and believe the Gospel;' and if God evidently honor men in this work, as instruments in reviving true religion, and promoting the salvation of many souls, who are they, that shall deem themselves authorized to call them to account, about the supposed irregularity of their useful labors? (See Mark 9:38—40.) Indeed there have been characters of this kind, in different ages, of whom it would greatly embarrass objectors to give a decided opinion, whether they were sent by God, or not, without being sent; as either conclusion would involve them in perplexing difficulties. Many more, however, will give the eminent servants of God a good word, especially after their death, than are disposed to believe their doctrine, or obey their call to repentance and faith in Christ, and the obedience of faith.

When Jesus observed the surprise of the disciples. He again showed them the energy of faith, with a special reference to the power of working miracles in his name. To this our Lord subjoined, that they ought not to doubt, but verily believe, that they should receive whatever they asked in prayer. This too specially refers to the case of miracles, but not exclusively. Whenever any person offers suitable petitions, in a right manner, and grounded on God's express promise, he ought not to doubt of his power or willingness to grant them, on account either of his own unworthiness, or of any difficulty in the way. 'If you 'have such a faith, as puts no difference between things you can, and things you cannot do, but makes you fully persuaded, you can do any thing which tends to the glory of God, and is requisite for the promotion of the Christian faith, you shall be able to perform the most difficult things: for that is the meaning of that phrase, to ask in mountains. (1 Cor. 13:2.)' as He was teaching, and said, ^bBy what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority?

24 And Jesus answered and said unto them, ^cI also will ask you one thing, which if ye tell me, I in like wise will tell you by what authority I do these things.

25 The ^dbaptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men? And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say unto us, ^eWhy did ye not then believe him?

26 But if we shall say, Of men; ^fwe fear the people: ^gfor all hold John as a prophet.

27 And they answered Jesus, and said, ^hWe cannot tell. And he said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

V. 23-27. Our Lord Jesus (like Paul after Him) preached his Gospel with much contention. In this sense, he was like Jeremiah, a man of contention; not striving, but stripen with. The great contenders with Him were, the chief priests and the elders, the judges of two distinct courts: the chief priests in the ecclesiastical, the elders in the civil. See an idea of both, 2 Chron. 19: 5, 8, 11. These joined to attack Christ, thinking they should find or make Him obnoxious to the one or the other. See how wofully degenerate that generation was, when the governors both in church and state, who should have been the great promoters of the Messiah's kingdom, were the great opposers of it! Here we have them disturbing Him when He was preaching, v. 23. They would neither receive his instructions themselves, nor let others receive them. Observe,

I. As soon as He came to Jerusalem, He went to the temple, for there He had a fairer opportunity of doing good to souls than any where else in Jerusalem. Though He came hungry to the city, and was disappointed of a breakfast at the barren fig-tree, yet, for aught that appears, He went straight to the temple, as one that esteemed the words of God's mouth, the preaching of them, more than his necessary food.

II. In the temple He was teaching; He had called it a house of prayer, (v. 13.) and here we have Him preaching there. Note, in the solemn assemblies of Christians, praying and preaching must go together. To make up communion with God, we must not only speak to Him in prayer, but hear what He has to say to us by his word; ministers must give themselves both to the word and to prayer, Acts 6: 4. Now that Christ taught in the temple, that scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 2: 3.) Let us go up to the house of the Lord, and He will teach us his ways. The priests of old often taught there the good knowledge of the Lord; but they never had such a teacher as this.

III. While He was teaching, the priests and elders came upon Him, and challenged Him to produce his orders; the hand of Satan was in it, to hinder Him in his work; yet good was brought out of this evil, for hereby occasion was given to Christ to dispel the objections that were advanced against Him, to the greater satisfaction of his followers; and, while his adversaries thought by their power to have silenced Him, He by his wisdom silenced them.

Now, in this dispute, observe,

1. How He was assaulted by their insolent demand; By what authority doest Thou these things, and who gave Thee this authority? Had they considered his miracles, they needed not to have asked this question. 'Thou ridest in triumph into Jerusalem, receivest the hosannas of the people, controllest in the temple, drivest out such as had licence to be there; Thou art here preaching a new doctrine; whence hadst Thou a commission to do all this? Was it from Cæsar, or from the high priest, or from God? Produce thy warrant, thy credentials. Dost not Thou take too much on Thee?' Note, It is good for all that take on them to act with authority, to put this question to themselves, 'Who gave us authority?' For unless a man be clear in his own conscience concerning that, he cannot act with any comfort or hope of success. They who run before their warrant, run without their blessing, Jer. 23: 21, 22.

Christ had often said and proved it, and Nicodemus, a master in Israel, had owned, that he was a Teacher sent of God; (John 3: 2.) yet, at this time of day, they came to Him with this question. (1.) In the ostentation of their own power, as chief priests and elders. How haughtily do they ask, Who gave Thee this authority? Intimating that He could have no authority, because He had none from them, 1 Kings 22: 24. Jer. 20: 1. Note, It is common for the greatest abusers of their power, to be the most rigorous asserters of it, and to take a pride and pleasure in any thing that looks like the exercise of it. (2.) To insnare and entangle Him. Should He refuse to answer, they would enter judgment against Him, and insinuate to the people, that his silence was a tacit confessing of Himself to be a usurper; should

He plead an authority from God, they would, as formerly, demand a sign from heaven, or accuse Him of blasphemy.

2. How He answered this demand. He declined a direct answer, lest they should take advantage against Him; but answers them with a question which would help them to answer it themselves; (v. 24, 25.) I also will ask you one thing. Those that are as sheep in the midst of wolves, have need to be wise as serpents: the heart of the wise studieth to answer. We must give a reason of the hope that is in us, not only with meekness, but with fear, (1 Pet. 3: 15.) with prudent caution, lest truth be damaged, or ourselves endangered.

Now this question is concerning John's baptism, here put for his whole ministry, preaching as well as baptizing; 'Was this from heaven, or of men?' One of the two it must be. Gamaliel's argument turned on this hinge: Acts 5: 38, 39. Either this counsel is of men, or of God. Though that which is manifestly bad, cannot be of God, yet that which is seemingly good, may be of men, nay, of Satan, when he transforms himself into an angel of light. This question was not at all shuffling, to evade theirs; but (1.) If they answered it, it would answer theirs: should they say, against their consciences, that John's baptism was of men, yet it would be easy to answer, John did no miracles, (John 10: 41.) Christ did many; but, should they say, as they could not but own, that John's baptism was from heaven, (which was supposed in the quest. a sent him, John 1: 21. Art thou Elias, or that prophet?) then their demand was answered, for he bare testimony to Christ.

(2.) If they refused to answer it, that would be a good reason why He should not offer proofs of his authority; it was but to cast pearls before swine. Thus He taketh the wise in their own craftiness; (1 Cor. 3: 19.) and those that would not be convinced of the plainest truths shall be convicted of the vilest malice, against John first, then against Christ, and in both against God.

3. How they were hereby baffled. Observe, (1.) How they reasoned with themselves. Not what proofs there were of the divine original of John's baptism; but how to make their part good against Christ. Two things they considered; their credit, and their safety.

(1.) Their credit, which they would encourage, if they should own John's baptism to be of God; for then Christ would ask them, before all the people, Why did ye not believe him? And to acknowledge that a doctrine is from God, and yet not to receive and entertain it, is the greatest absurdity and iniquity. Many that will not be kept by the fear of sin from neglecting and opposing that which they know to be true and good, are kept by the fear of shame from owning that to be true and good which they neglect and oppose. Thus they reject the counsel of God against themselves, in not submitting to John's baptism, and were left without excuse.

(2.) Their safety, that they would expose themselves to the resentments of the people, if they should say that John's baptism was of men; We fear the people, for all hold John as a prophet. It seems, then, 1st, That the people had truer sentiments of John than the chief priests and the elders had, or, at least, were more free and faithful in declaring their sentiments. This people, of whom they said in their pride, that they knew not the law, and were cursed, (John 7: 49.) it seems, knew the Gospel, which they had convinced. They therefore came to Him in a body, to demand ^aby what authority He did these things. He did not directly answer his divine prerogative, or appeal to his miracles, or reproach them with ^bcarelessness and hypocrisy; though He did the latter, on other occasions, in the character of the heart-searching Judge; but He left them on this occasion to condemn themselves. Being thus pressed on every hand, they were constrained to allow that they were incompetent to examine who was, and who was not, sent by God; that is, that they were 'blind guides,' who could only mislead those who depended on them. 'They could not own the baptism of John to be from heaven, but they must also own Christ to be the Son of God, and Him concerning whom God had testified by "a voice from heaven," and by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Him, that He was "the beloved Son, in whom He was well pleased;" whence these great doctors chose rather to pretend ignorance, than to confess that truth which would condemn them.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref.—See Luke 20: 1-8. John: 5. 31-33.) (25.) From heaven. (See Dan. 4: 24-26, v. 26.)

(27.) We cannot tell. 'Simplicity gives a wonderful confidence and peace of mind; but double dealing causes a thousand inquietudes and troubles. We cannot tell, said they; which, in the words of truth should be, We will not tell, for we will not have this man for the Messiah. Pharisaical pride, according to its different interests, either pretends to know every thing, or affects to know nothing.'

dropt the question. They fairly confessed, We cannot tell; that is, 'We will not';—We never knew. The more shame for them, while they pretended to be leaders of the people, and by their office were obliged to take cognizance of such things. And observe by the way, when they said, We cannot tell, they told a lie, for they knew that John's baptism was of God. Note; There are many who are more afraid of the shame of lying than of the sin, and therefore scruple not to speak that which they know to be false concerning their own thoughts and apprehensions, their affections and intentions, or their remembering or forgetting of things, because in those things they know nobody can disprove them.

Thus Christ avoided their snare, and justified Himself in refusing to gratify them; Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. If they be so wicked as either not to believe, or not to confess, that the baptism of John was from Heaven, they are not fit to be discoursed with concerning Christ's authority; for men of such a disposition could not be convinced of the truth, and therefore he that is thus ignorant, let him be ignorant still. Note, Those that imprison the truths they know, in unrighteousness, are justly denied the further truths they inquire after, Rom. 1:18, 19. Take away the talent from him that buried it; those that will not see, shall not see.

V. 23-32. The scope of this parable is to show, that they who knew not John's baptism to be of God, were shamed even by the publicans and harlots, who knew it, and owned it. Here is,

1. The parable itself, which represents two sorts of persons; some that prove better than they promise: others that promise better than they prove.

1. They had both the same father, which signifies that God is a common Father to all mankind; Have we not all one Father? Yes, and yet there is a vast difference between men's characters.

2. They had both the same command given them, v. 28, 30. Parents should not bring up their children in idleness; nothing is more pleasing, and yet nothing more pernicious, to youth than that, Lam. 3: 27. God sets his children to work, though they are all heirs. This command is given to every one of us. Note, (1.) The Gospel-call to work in the vineyard, requires present obedience; Son, go work to-day, while it is called to-day, because the night comes when no man can work. While we were not sent into the world to be idle, nor had we daylight given us to play by; therefore, if ever we mean to do any thing for God and our souls, why not now? Why not to-day? (2.) The exhortation to go work to-day in the vineyard, speaketh unto us as unto children; Heb. 12:5. Son, go work. It is the command of a Father, which carries with it both authority and affection, a Father that pities his children, and considers their frame, and will not overtask them, (Ps. 103:13, 14.) a Father that is very tender of his Son that serves Him, Mal. 3: 17. If we work in our Father's vineyard, we work for ourselves.

3. Their conduct was very different.

(1.) One of the sons proved better than he promised.

(1.) Here is the untoward answer he gave his father; he said, flat and plain, I will not. See to what a degree of impudence the corrupt nature of man rises, to say, I will not, to the command of a father! Those that will not bend, surely they cannot blush; if they had any modesty left them, they could not say, We will not, Jer. 2: 25. Excuses are bad, but downright denials are worse; yet such peremptory refusals do the calls of the Gospel often meet with. First, Some love their ease, and will not work; they would live in the world, as leviathan in the waters, to play therein; (Ps. 104: 26.) they do not love working. Secondly, Their hearts are so much on their own fields, that they are not for working in God's vineyard. They love the business of the world better than the business of their religion. Thus some by the delights of sense, and others by the employments of the world, are kept from doing that great work which they were sent into the world to do, and so stand all the day idle.

2.] Here is the happy change of his mind, and of his way, upon second thoughts; Afterward he repented, and went. Note, Many in their beginning are wicked and wilful, who afterward repent and mend, and come to something. Some, that God hath chosen, are suffered for a great while to run to a great excess of riot: Such were some of you, 1 Cor. 6: 11. These are set forth for patterns of long suffering, 1 Tim. 1: 16. Afterward he repented. Repentance is an after-act, and an after-care. Better late than never. Observe, When he repented, he went; that was the fruit meet for repentance. The only evidence of our repentance is, immediately to comply; and then what is past shall be pardoned, and all shall be well. See what a kind Father God is; He resents not the affront of our refusals, as justly He might. He that told his father to his face, that he would not do as he bid him, deserved to be turned out of doors, and disinherited; but our God wants to be gracious: blessed be God, we are under a covenant that leaves room for such a repentance.

(2.) The other son promised better than he proved. To him the father said likewise, v. 30. The Gospel-call, though very different, is, in effect, the same to all, and is carried on with an even tenor. We have all the same commands, engagements, encouragements, though to some they are a savor of life unto life, to others of death unto death. Observe,

[1.] How fairly this other son promised; He said, I go, sir. He gives his father a title of respect, go, sir. Note, It becomes children to speak respectfully to their parents. It is one branch of that honor which the fifth commandment requires. He professes a ready obedience I go; not, 'I will go by and by, but, 'Ready, sir, you may depend on it, I go just now.' This answer we should give from the heart heartily to all the calls and commands of the Word of God. See Jer. 3: 22. Ps. 27: 8.

[2.] How he failed in the performance; He went not. Note, Many give good words, and make fair promises, in religion, and those from some good motions for the present, that rest there, and go no further, and so come to nothing. Many there are that say, and do not; like the Pharisees, ch. 23: 3. Many with their mouths show much love, but their heart goes another way. They had a good mind to be religious, but they met with something to be done, that was too hard, or something to be parted with, that was too dear, and so their purposes are to no purpose.

II. A general appeal on the parable; Whether of them did the will of his father? v. 31. They both had their faults, one was rude, and the other false; such variety of excises parents sometimes have in the different humors of their children, and they have need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to know what is the best way of managing them. But the question is, Which was the better of the two, and the less faulty? And it was soon resolved; the first, because his actions were better than his words, and his latter end than his beginning. This they had learned from the common sense of mankind, who would much rather deal with one that will be better than his word, than with one that will be false to his word. And, in the intention of it, they had learned from the account God gives of the rule of his judgment, (Ezek. 18: 21, 22.) that if the sinner turn from his wickedness, he shall be pardoned; and if the righteous man turns from his righteousness, he shall be rejected. The tenor of the whole Scriptures gives us to understand, that those are accepted as doing their Father's will, who wherein they have missed it, are sorry for it, and do better.

III. A particular application of it to the matter in hand, v. 31, 32. The primary scope of the parable is, to show how the publicans and harlots, who never talked of the Messiah gate; and yet many of them were wrought upon by the ministry of John, Luke 7: 29. These fitly represented the Gentile world; for, as Whitby observes, the Jews generally ranked the publicans with the heathen; nay, and the heathen were represented by the Jews as harlots, and born of harlots, John 8: 41.

(2.) The scribes and Pharisees, the chief priests and elders, and indeed the Jewish nation in general, were like the other son that gave good words; they made a specious profession of religion, and yet, when the kingdom of the and his kingdom, yet entertained the doctrine, and submitted to the discipline, of John the Baptist, his forerunner, when the priests and elders, who were big with expectations of the Messiah, and seemed very ready to go into his measures, slighted John the Baptist, and run counter to the designs of his mission. But it has a further reach; the Gentiles were sometimes disobedient, like the other son; (Tit. 3: 3, 4.) yet, when the Gospel was preached to them, they became obedient to the faith; whereas the Jews, who said, I go, sir, promised fair, (Exod. 24: 7. Josh. 24: 24.) yet went not; they did but flatter God with their mouths, Ps. 78: 36.

In Christ's application of this parable, observe,

1. How He proves that John's baptism was from heaven, and not of men. 'If you cannot tell, you might tell.'

(1.) By the scope of his ministry; John came to you in the way of righteousness. Would you know whether John had his commission from heaven, remember the rule of trial, By their fruits ye shall know them; the fruits of their doctrines, the fruits of their doings. Now it was evident that John came in the way of righteousness. He taught people to repent, and to work the works of righteousness; he was a great example of strictness, and seriousness, and contempt of the world, denying himself, and doing good to every body else. Now, if John thus came in the way of righteousness, could they be ignorant that his baptism was from heaven, or make any doubt of it?

(2.) By the success of his ministry; The publicans and the harlots believed him; he did abundance of good among the worst sort of people. Paul proves his apostleship by the seals of his ministry, 1 Cor. 9: 2. If God had not sent John the Baptist, He would not have crowned his labors with such wonderful success, nor have made him so instrumental as he was for the conversion of souls. The people's profiting is the minister's best testimonial.

2. How he reproves them for their contempt of John's baptism. To shame them for it, He sets before them the faith, repentance, and obedience, of the publicans and harlots, which aggravated their unbelief and impenitence. As He shows, (ch. 11: 21) that the less likely would have repented, so here, that the less likely did repent.

(1.) The publicans and harlots were like the first son in the parable, from whom little religion was expected. Their disposition was generally rude, and their conversation profligate; and yet many of them were wrought upon by the ministry of John, Luke 7: 29. These fitly represented the Gentile world; for, as Whitby observes, the Jews generally ranked the publicans with the heathen; nay, and the heathen were represented by the Jews as harlots, and born of harlots, John 8: 41.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 29-32. The whole human race are like children, whom the Lord has brought up; but they have rebelled against Him: only some are more plausible and decent in disobedience, than others. It however often happens, that the daring rebel is brought to repentance, and becomes the servant of God, while the decent formalist is hardened in pride and enmity to the Gospel. It was by no means peculiar to the days of Christ, that publicans and harlots entered the kingdom of heaven, before proud Pharisees and learned scribes. But it exceedingly aggravates the guilt of such men, when the evident reformation of the vilest transgressors 'by the foolishness of preaching,' serves only to render them more outrageous in scorn and opposition. In these circumstances, it is peculiarly incumbent on those, who 'come in the way of righteousness,' to exemplify, as well as to explain, the holy tendency of their doctrine.

From time to time God sent prophets, to call the Jews to repentance, and to direct their attention to the promises of a Messiah who was to come: thus the fruits were demanded in their season. But the rulers and teachers, in every age, had been exasperated by these faithful monitors. In applying the parable, it is not needful to inquire how far such a measure would have been prudent in a householder; for it was faultless in infinite wisdom, as well as love, that 'the Father sent his Son, to be the Savior of the world.' On the other hand, He certainly did so, to expect, that the Jews would 'reverence Him,' for He had, for ages before, predicted how they would reject, abhor, and persecute Him.

They, however, ought to have adored Him and submitted to Him, and their usage of one so excellent and honorable, and manifested to us by all his miracles, his words and conduct, formed the grand aggravation of their atrocious wickedness.

35 And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another.

36 Again, he sent other servants more than the first; and they did unto them likewise.

37 But last of all, he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son.

38 But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance.

39 And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him.

40 When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto those husbandmen?

41 They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons.

42 Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never church for the due oversight of it, and for the promoting of its fruitfulness. What could have been done more to make it every way convenient?

2. How He intrusted these visible church privileges with the nation and people of the Jews, especially their chief priests and elders, as husbandmen. When in Judah God was known, and his name great; when they were taken to be God for a people, and for a name, and for a praise; (Jer. 13: 11.) when He revealed his Word unto Jacob; (Ps. 147: 19.) when the covenant of life and peace was made with Levi; (Mal. 2: 4, 5.) then this vineyard was let out. See an abstract of the lease, Cant. 8: 11, 12. The Lord of the vineyard was to have a thousand pieces of silver, (compare Isa. 7: 13.) the main profit; the keepers to have two hundred, a competent and comfortable encouragement. And then he went into a far country. When God had in a visible appearance settled the Jewish church at mount Sinai, He in a manner withdrew; they had no more such open vision, but were left to the written Word. Or, they imagined that he was gone into a far country, as Israel, when they made the calf, fancied that Moses was gone. They put far from them the evil day.

II. God's expectation of rent from those husbandmen, v. 34. Note, From those that enjoy church privileges, both ministers and people, God looks for fruit accordingly. 1. His expectations were not hasty; he staid till the time of the fruit drew near, as it did now that John preached the kingdom of heaven is at hand. God waits to be gracious, that He may give us time. 2. They were not high; He did not require them to come on penalty of forfeiting their lease if they ran behindhand; but He sent his servants to them, to mind them of the rent day, and to help them in gathering in the fruit, and making return of it. These servants were the prophets of the Old Testament. 3. They were not hard; it was only to receive the fruits. He did not demand more than they could make of it, but some fruit, an observance of the laws and statutes He gave them. What could have been done more reasonable? Israel was an empty vine, nay, it was become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, and brought forth wild grapes.

III. The husbandmen's baseness.

1. When he sent them his servants, they abused them. Note, The calls and reproofs of the world, if they do not engage, will but exasperate. See here what hath all along been the lot of God's faithful messengers, more or less; (1.) To suffer; so persecuted they the prophets. They not only despised and reproached them, but treated them as the worst of malefactors. They beat Jeremiah, killed Isaiah, stoned Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, in the temple. If they that line godly in Christ Jesus themselves, suffer persecution, much more they that press others to it. This was God's old quarrel with the Jews, misusing his prophets, 2 Chr. 36: 16. (2.) To suffer from their master's own tenants; they were the husbandmen that treated them thus, the chief priests and elders that sat in Moses' chair, that professed religion and relation to God; these were the most bitter enemies of the Lord's prophets, that cast them out, and killed them, and said, Let the Lord be glorified, Isa. 66: 5. See Jer. 20: 1, 2. 26: 11.

Now see, [1.] How God persevered in his goodness to them. He sent other servants, though the first sped not, but were abused. He sent them John the Baptist, and then his disciples. Oh the riches of the patience and forbearance of God, in keeping up in his church a despised, persecuted ministry! [2.] How they persisted in their wickedness. They did unto them likewise. One sinner is for another of the same kind. They that are drunk with the blood of the saints, and drunkenness to thirst, and still cry, Give, give.

2. At length He sent them his Son.

(1.) Never did grace appear more gracious than in sending the Son. This was done last of all. Note, All the prophets were harbingers and forerunners to Christ. He was sent last; for if nothing else would work on them, surely this would; it was therefore reserved for the last expedient. Surely they will reverence my Son, and therefore I will send Him. Note, It might reasonably be expected that the Son of God, when He came to his own, should be revered; and reverence to Christ would be a powerful and effectual principle of fruitfulness and obedience, to the glory of God; if they will but reverence the Son, the point is gained. Surely they will reverence my Son, for He comes with more authority than the servants could; judgment is committed to Him, that all men should honor Him. There is greater danger in refusing Him, than in despising Moses' law.

(2.) Never did sin appear more sinful than the abusing of Him, which was now to be done in two or three days. Observe,

[1.] How it was plotted; (v. 38.) When they saw the Son: when He came, whom the people owned and followed as the Messiah, who would either have the rent paid, or distrained for; this touched their copy-hold, and they were resolved to make one bold push for it, by taking Him out of the way, who was their only rival. This is the heir; come, let us kill him. Pilate, and Herod, the princes of this world, knew not; for if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. 2: 8. But the chief priests and elders knew that this was the Heir, at least, some of them; and therefore Come, let us kill Him. The chief thing they envied, hated and feared Him for, was his interest in the people, and their hosannas. They pretended He must die, to save the people from the Romans; (John 11: 50,) but really He must die, to save their hypocrisy and tyranny from reformation. He drives the buyers and sellers out of the temple; and therefore let us kill Him; and then, as if the premises must of course go to the occupant, let us seize on his inheritance. They thought, if they could but get rid of this Jesus, they should carry all before them in the church, might impose what traditions, and force the people to what submissions, they pleased. Thus they take counsel against the Lord and his Anointed; but He that sits in heaven, laughs to see them outshin in their own bow; for, while they sought to kill Him, and so to seize on his inheritance, He went by his cross to his crown, and they were broken in pieces with a rod of iron, and their inheritance seized, Ps. 2: 2, 3, 6, 9.

[2.] How this plot was executed, v. 39. While they were so set on killing Him, in pursuance of their design to secure their own pomp and power, and while He was so set on dying in pursuance of his design to subdue Satan, and save his chosen, no wonder if they soon caught Him and slew Him, when his hour was come. Though the Roman power condemned Him, yet it is still charged on the chief priests and elders; for they were not only the prosecutors, but the principal agents, and had the greater sin. Ye have taken, Acts 2: 23. Nay, looking on Him to be as unworthy to live, as they were unwilling He should, they cast Him out of the vineyard; for He was crucified without the gate, Heb. 13: 12. As if He had been the shame and reproach, who was the greatest Glory, of his people Israel. Thus they who persecuted the servants, persecuted the Son; as men treat not because He needs them. ment, God could build a flourishing church on our ruins; for He is never at a loss what to do for his great name, whatever becomes of us, and of our place and nation.

V. The further illustration and application of this by Christ Himself, telling them in effect, that they had right v. judged.

1. He illustrates it by referring to a scripture fulfilled in this; (v. 42.) Did ye never read in the Scripture? Yes, m doubt, they had often read and sung it, but had not considered it. We lose the benefit of what we read, for want of meditation. The scripture He quotes, is Ps. 118:22, 23. the same context out of which the children fetched their hosannas. The same word yields matter of praise and comfort to Christ's friends, which speaks conviction and terror to his enemies. Such a two-edged sword is the Word of God. That scripture, The Stone which the builders refused is become the Head-stone of the corner, illustrates the preceding parable, especially that part of it which refers to Christ.

(1.) The builders rejecting the stone is the same with the husbandmen's abusing the son that was sent to them. The chief priests and the elders were the builders: and they would not allow Christ a place in their building, would not admit his doctrine or laws into their constitution; they threw Him aside as a despised broken vessel, a stone that would serve only for a stepping-stone, to be trampled on.

(2.) The advancing of this stone to be the head of the corner, is the same with letting out the vineyard to other husbandmen. He who was rejected by the Jews, was embraced by the Gentiles; and to that church where there is no

God's ministers, they would treat Christ Himself, if He were with them.

IV. Here is their doom read out of their own mouths; v. 40, 41. He puts it to themselves, for their stronger conviction, that, knowing the judgment of God against them which do such things, they might be the more inexcusable. Note, God's proceedings are so unexceptionable, that there needs but an appeal to sinners themselves concerning the equity of them. God will be justified when He speaks. They could readily answer, He will miserably destroy these wicked men. Note, Many can easily prognosticate the dismal consequences of other people's sins, that see not what will be the end of their own.

1. Our Savior, in his question, supposes that the lord of the vineyard will come, and reckon with them. God is the Lord of the vineyard, and He will come. Persecutors say in their hearts, He delays his coming, He doth not see, He will not require; but they shall find, though He bear long with them, He will not bear always. It is comfort to abused saints and ministers, that the Lord is at hand, the Judge stands before the door. When He comes, what will He do to carnal professors? What will He do to cruel persecutors? They must be called to account, they have their day now; but He sees that his day is coming.

2. They, in their answer, suppose that it will be a terrible reckoning; the crime appearing so very black, you may be sure,

(1.) That He will miserably destroy those wicked men. This was fulfilled on the Jews, in that miserable destruction which was brought on them by the Romans, and was completed about forty years after this; an unparalleled ruin, attended with all the most dismal aggravating circumstances. It will be fulfilled on all that tread in the steps of their wickedness; hell is everlastingly destructive, and will be the most miserable destruction to them of all others, that have enjoyed the greatest share of church privileges, and have not improved them.

(2.) That He will let out his vineyard to other husbandmen. Note, God will have a church in the world, notwithstanding many abuse the privileges of it. The unbelief and forwardness of man shall not make the word of God of no effect. If one will not, another will. The Jews' leaveings were the Gentiles' feast. Persecutors may destroy the ministers, but cannot destroy the church. The Jews imagined that, no doubt, they were the people, and wisdom and holiness must die with them. But when God makes use of any to bear up his name, it is as if we were made a desolation and an astonishment, God could build a flourishing church on our ruins; for He is never at a loss what to do for his great name, whatever becomes of us, and of our place and nation.

Verse 43

Pruning forth the fruits. 'As in v. 34. an allusion is made to pruning the land in kind, so here the Gentiles are represented as paying God thus. The returns which He expects for his grace are, the fruits of grace; nothing can ever be acceptable in the sight of God that does not spring from Himself.'

Verse 44

Some (with Henry) suppose there is an allusion to the manner of stoning among the Jews; see Henry above; but John remarks thereupon, The assertion of the Talmudists (Sanhedrim 6:1-4.) that the criminal was first thrown off from an elevated scaffolding, and then stoned, is mere fable.'

Verses 45, 46.

The chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees, now fully understood the parables; but they were the more exasperated by them, and determined, as soon as they could, to apprehend Him, and put Him to death, whatever the consequence might be: yet they would not do it openly. At least the multitude should excite a tumult, as the people were generally of opinion that He was at least a prophet of God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 26: 3-5.)

difference of circumcision or uncircumcision Christ is all and in all. His authority over the gospel-church, and influence on it, his ruling 1 as the Head, and uniting it as the Corner-stone, are the great tokens of his exaltation. Thus in spite of the malice of the priests and elders, He divided a portion with the great, and received his kingdom, though they would not have Him to reign over them.

(3.) The hand of God was in all this; This is the Lord's doing. Even the rejecting of Him by the Jewish builders, was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; He permitted and overruled it; much more was his advancement to the Head of the corner; his right hand and his holy arm brought it about; it was God Himself that highly exalted Him, and gave Him a name above every name; and it is marvellous in our eyes. The wickedness of the Jews that rejected Him, is marvellous; that men should be so prejudiced against their own interest, see Isa. 29: 9, 10, 14. The honor done Him by the Gentile world, notwithstanding the abuses done Him by his own people, is marvellous; that He whom men despised and abhorred, should be adored y kings! Isa. 49: 7. But it is the Lord's doing.

2. He applies it to them, and application is the life of preaching.

(1.) He applies the sentence which they had passed, (v. 41.) and turns it on themselves. Know then,

[1.] That the Jews shall be unchurched, v. 43. This turning out of the husbandmen speaks the same doom with that of dismantling the vineyard, and laying it common, Isa. 5: 5. To the Jews had long pertained the adoption and the glory; (Rom. 9: 4.) to them were committed the oracles of God, (Rom. 3: 2.) and the sacred trust, bearing the name of God in the world; (Ps. 76: 1, 2.) but now it shall be so no longer. They were not only unfruitful, but opposed to the Gospel, and so forfeited their privileges; nor was it long ere the forfeiture was taken. Note, It is a righteous thing with God, to remove church privileges from those that not only sin against them, but sin with them, Rev. 2: 4, 5. The kingdom of God was taken from the Jews, not only by temporal, but by spiritual judgments, as blindness of mind, hardness of heart, and indignation at the Gospel, Rom. 11: 8-10, 1 Thess. 2: 15.

[2.] That the Gentiles shall be taken in. God needs not ask us leave, whether He shall have a church in the world; though his vine be plucked up in one place, He will find another to plant it in. He will give it to the Gentile world, that will bring forth the fruit of it. They who had not been a people, and had not obtained mercy, became favorites. This is the mystery which blessed Paul was so much affected with, (Rom. 11: 30, 33.) and which the Jews were so much affronted by, Acts 22: 21, 22. At the first planting of Israel in Canaan, the fall of the Gentiles was the riches of Israel; (Ps. 135: 10, 11.) so, at their extirpation, the fall of Israel was the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. 11: 12. It shall go to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. Note, Christ knows beforehand who will bring forth gospel-fruits in the use of gospel-means; because our fruitfulness is all the work of his own hands, and known unto God are all his works. They shall bring forth the fruits better than the Jews had done; God has had more glory from the New-Testament church, than from that of the Old-Testament; for, when He changes, it shall not be to his loss.

(2.) He applies the Scripture He had quoted, (v. 42.) to their terror; (v. 44.) and we have here the doom of two sorts of people, for whose fall it proves that Christ is set.

CHAP. XXII.

Jesus speaks in the parable of the marriage-supper, and the wedding garment, 1-14; answers the Pharisees and Herodians about paying tribute to Caesar, 15-22; the Sadducees about the resurrection and future state, 23-32; and a lawyer concerning the chief commandment in the law, 34-40; and inquires how the Messiah could be David's Son, and yet his Lord, 41-45.

AND Jesus answered, and spake unto them again by parables, and said,

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son, strayed by falling on this stone, it shall fall on, and so destroy them. He will strike through kings, He will fill the places with dead bodies, Ps. 110: 5, 6. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered.

Lastly, The entertainment which this discourse of Christ met with among the chief priests and elders.

1. They perceived that He spake of them, (v. 45.) and that, in what they said, (v. 41.) they had but read their own doom. Note, A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and sometimes will save a minister the saying, Thou art the man. Change but the name, the tale is told of thee. So quick and powerful is the Word of God, and such a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, that it is easy for bad men (if conscience be not quite seared) to perceive that it speaks of them.

2. They sought to lay hands on Him. Note, When those who hear the reproofs of the Word, perceive that it speaks of them, if it do not do them a great deal of good, it will certainly do them a great deal of hurt. If they be not picked to the heart with conviction and contrition, as they were, (Acts 2: 37.) they will be cut to the heart with rage and indignation, as they were, Acts 5: 33.

3. They durst not do it, for fear of the multitude, who took Him for a prophet, though not for the Messiah; this served to keep the Pharisees in awe. The fear of the people restrained them from speaking ill of John, (v. 26.) and here from doing ill to Christ. Note, God has many ways of restraining the remainders of wrath, as He has of making that which breaks out to redound to his praise, Ps. 76: 10.

CHAP. XXII. v. 1-14. This chapter is a continuation of Christ's discourses in the temple, two or three days before He died. His discourses then are largely recorded, as being of special weight and consequence.

We have here the parable of the guests invited to the wedding feast. In this it is said, (v. 1.) Jesus answered to what his opposers thought, when they were

[1.] Some, through ignorance, stumble at Christ, when this Stone lies on the earth, where the builders threw it; they, through their blindness and carelessness, fall on it, fall over it, and shall be broken; Isa. 8: 14. 1 Pet. 2: 7, 8. The unbelief of sinners will be their ruin.

[2.] Others, through malice, oppose Christ, when this Stone is advanced to the head of the corner; and on them it shall fall, for they pull it on their own heads, as the Jews did, (His blood be on us and on our children,) and it will grind them to powder. The former seems to bespeak the sin and ruin of all unbelievers; this is the greater sin, and sorer ruin, of persecutors. Christ's kingdom will be a burthen some stone to all those that attempt to overthrow it, or heave it out of its place; see Zech. 12: 3. This Stone will break in pieces all opposing power, Dan. 2: 34, 35. Some make this an allusion to the manner of stoning to death among the Jews. The malefactors were first thrown down violently from a high scaffold on a great stone, which would much bruise them; but then they threw another great stone upon them, which would crush them to pieces: one way or other, Christ will utterly destroy all those that fight against Him: they are not destroyed by falling on this stone, it shall fall on, and so destroy them.

He will strike through kings, He will fill the places with dead bodies, Ps. 110: 5, 6. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered.

Lastly, The entertainment which this discourse of Christ met with among the chief priests and elders.

1. They perceived that He spake of them, (v. 45.) and that, in what they said, (v. 41.) they had but read their own doom. Note, A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and sometimes will save a minister the saying, Thou art the man. Change but the name, the tale is told of thee. So quick and powerful is the Word of God, and such a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, that it is easy for bad men (if conscience be not quite seared) to perceive that it speaks of them.

2. They sought to lay hands on Him. Note, When those who hear the reproofs of the Word, perceive that it speaks of them, if it do not do them a great deal of good, it will certainly do them a great deal of hurt. If they be not picked to the heart with conviction and contrition, as they were, (Acts 2: 37.) they will be cut to the heart with rage and indignation, as they were, Acts 5: 33.

3. They durst not do it, for fear of the multitude, who took Him for a prophet, though not for the Messiah; this served to keep the Pharisees in awe. The fear of the people restrained them from speaking ill of John, (v. 26.) and here from doing ill to Christ. Note, God has many ways of restraining the remainders of wrath, as He has of making that which breaks out to redound to his praise, Ps. 76: 10.

wishing for an opportunity to lay hands on Him, ch. 21: 46. Note, Christ knows how to answer men's thoughts, for He is a Discerner of them. Or, He answered, that is, continued his discourse; for this parable, as the former, represents the gospel-offer, and the entertainment it meets with.

I. Gospel-preparations are here represented by a feast which a king made at the marriage of his son; such is the kingdom of heaven, or the new-covenant provision for precious souls. The King is God, a great King, King of kings. Now,

1. Here is a marriage made for his Son. Christ is the Bridegroom, the church the bride; the Gospel day, the day of his espousals, Cant. 3: 11. Behold by faith the church of the first born, that are written in heaven, and were given to Christ; and in them you see the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. 21: 9. The Gospel covenant is a marriage covenant betwixt Christ and believers. This branch of the similitude is only mentioned, and not prosecuted here.

2. A dinner prepared for this marriage, v. 4. All the privileges of church membership, and all the blessings of the new covenant, pardon of sin, the favor of God, peace of conscience, the promises of the Gospel, and all the riches contained in them, access to the throne of grace, the comforts of the Spirit, and a well-grounded hope of eternal life. These are the preparations for this feast; God has prepared it in his counsel, in his covenant. It is a dinner, denoting present privileges in the midst of our day, beside the supper at night in glory.

(1.) It is a feast. Gospel preparations were prophesied of as a feast, (Isa. 25: 6.) and typified by the many festivals of the ceremonial law; (1 Cor. 6: 8.) Let us keep the feast. A feast is a good day, (Esth. 8: 7.) so the Gospel is a continual feast, founded in the death of Christ. A feast was made for love, it is a reconciliation feast. It was made for laughter, (Eccl. 10: 19.) it is a rejoicing feast. It was made for fulness, to fill every hungry soul with good things. It was made for fellowship, to maintain an intercourse between heaven and earth. We are sent for to the banquet of wine, that we may tell what is our petition, and what is our request.

(2.) It is a wedding feast. Wedding feasts are usually rich, free, and joyful. The first miracle Christ wrought was, to make plentiful provision for a wedding feast; (John 2: 7.) surely then He will not be wanting in provision for his own wedding feast, when the marriage of the Lamb is come, and the bride has made

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 33-46. We have parable after parable, to show us the rage and enmity of the human heart, against the religion of the Savior. How can we then, if faithful to his cause, expect a favorable reception from a wicked world, or from ungodly professors of Christianity, when the holy prophets and the well-beloved Son of God Himself, were thus rejected with contempt, and treated with outrageous cruelty by his professed worshippers? How can we expect to convince or conciliate them, merely with our reasonings and persuasions, when the words of Christ only exasperated those to whom they were addressed, even when they felt the truth of his reproofs, and the energy of his arguments? The awful doom of the hypocritical rulers and unbelieving nation of the Jews, was recorded for our warning. They slew the prophets and crucified the Lord of glory; but they were destroyed with tremendous vengeance, and the kingdom of God was taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. We now have the vineyard and all its advantages; but do we, as a nation, render the fruits in due season? Here we must be silent, or answer, No. Yet amidst all our abominations, the monster persecution is chained up by authority: and while this is the case, we still hope for the continuance of our privileges. Numbers, however,

'stumble at the Word, being disoedient,' and thus fall on the Corner-stone, and are broken: alas! numbers likewise cause others to stumble by their wicked lives. Some use all their abilities in opposing the Gospel and dishonoring Christ, apparently in order to obtain reputation and distinction for themselves: it is to be feared, even many professed builders thus reject the 'Head-stone of the corner;' and that some are restrained in their opposition by no higher motive than the fear of man. Alas! few consider, that we are accountable for all our privileges, and shall be the more deeply condemned on account of them, if not made fruitful. Yet, blessed be God, there is a remnant, and we trust an increasing remnant, of such as adorn the Gospel by their holy lives: may we be found among them; may we attend to the voice of those whom the Lord sends to reprove or exhort us, in order to our increasing fruitfulness; may we reverence and obey the beloved Son of God; may He become more and more precious to our souls, as the firm Foundation and tried Corner-stone of the church; may we be willing to be despised and hated for his sake; and may we be faithful and obedient even unto death: and so, when He shall come to destroy his enemies, we shall receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. v. 1-14. (See Luke 14: 15-24.) Our Lord, proceeding to show the priests and people the criminality and consequences of their unbelief, stated the case to them in another parable: or in parables, for two are connected together. The preceding parable represented the sufferings of Christ, and the guilt and punishment of those who put Him to death: but this shows the motive of his humiliation, and the effects of it to Himself to his people, and to unbelievers and hypocrites. The union of the Son of God with our race, by assuming human nature: the endearing relation, into which He receives his redeemed church, and every true member of it; the spiritual honors, riches, and blessings, to which they are advanced by this sacred relation: the comforts which they receive from his condescending and faithful love, and from communion with Him; and the reciprocal duties of their relation to Him, are all intimated by this metaphor. (Marg. Ref. c.) The abundant and rich provision, which the Lord has made for our perishing souls in the Gospel, is here represented. They 'who made light of' the invitation, as well as the persecutors, were 'not worthy.' None else are put among them. (9.) not, and therefore desires not, to accept the call by his most powerful inducements, drawn with the cords of man, and all the bonds of love. If the repetition of the call will move us, Behold, the Spirit saith, Come; and the bride saith, Come; let him that hears say, Come; let him that is athirst, come, Rev. 22:17. If the reason of the call will work on us, Behold the dinner is prepared, the oxen and fatlings are killed, and all things are ready; the Father is ready to accept of us, the Son to intercede for us, the Spirit to sanctify us; pardon is ready, peace is ready, comfort is ready; the promises are ready, as wells of living water for supply; ordinances are ready, as golden pipes for conveyance; angels are ready to attend us, creatures are ready to be in league with us, providences are ready to work for our good, and heaven, at last, is ready to receive us; it is a kingdom prepared, ready to be revealed in the last time. Is all this ready; and shall we be unready? Is all this preparation made for us; and is there any room to doubt of our welcome, if we come in a right manner? Come, therefore, O come to the marriage; we beseech you, receive not all this grace of God in vain, 2 Cor. 6:1.

III. The cold treatment which the Gospel often meets with among men, represented by the cold treatment this message met with, and the hot treatment the messengers met with, in both which the king himself and the royal bridegroom are affronted. This reflects primarily on the Jews, but looks further, to the contempt and opposition the Gospel would meet with from many in all ages.

1. The message was basely slighted; (v. 3.) They would not come. Note, The reason why sinners come not to Christ, and salvation by Him, is, not because they cannot, but because they will not; (John 5:40.) Ye will not come unto Me. This will aggravate their misery, that they might have had happiness, but that they refused it. I would, and ye would not. But this was not all; (v. 5.) they made light of it; they thought it not worth coming for; herself ready; a victorious, triumphant feast, Rev. 19:7,17,18.

(3.) It is a royal wedding feast; at the marriage of a son; when, if ever, He will, like Ahasuerus, show the riches of his glorious kingdom, Esth. 1:4. The provision is not such as worthless worms had any reason to expect, but such as it becomes the King of glory to give. He gives like Himself, for He gives Himself to be to them El-shaddai—a God that is enough; a feast indeed for a soul.

II. Gospel calls and offers are represented by an invitation to this feast. Those that make a feast, will have guests to grace it. God's guests are the children of men. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus dignified! The guests first invited were the Jews; wherever the Gospel is preached, this invitation is given; ministers are the servants sent to invite, Prov. 9:4,5.

Now, 1. The guests are called, bidden. All within hearing are invited; and none are excluded but those that exclude themselves. Those that are bidden to the dinner, are bidden to the wedding; and they are bidden to the wedding, that they may go forth to meet the Bridegroom; for it is the Father's will that all men should honor the Son.

2. The guests are called on; for in the Gospel there are not only gracious proposals, but gracious persuasives. We persuade men, we beseech them in Christ's stead, 2 Cor. 5:11,20. See how much Christ's heart is set on the happiness of poor souls! He not only provides for them, but sends to them. When the invited guests were slack in coming, the king sent forth other servants, v. 4. When the prophets of the Old Testament prevailed not, nor John the Baptist, nor Christ himself, who told them the entertainment was almost ready, (the kingdom of God was at hand,) the apostles and ministers of the Gospel were sent, after Christ's resurrection, to tell them it was come, it was quite ready, and to persuade them to accept the offer. One would think it had been enough to give men an intimation that they had leave to come, and should be welcome; that, during the solemnity of the wedding, the king kept open house; but, because the natural man discerns the things of the Spirit of God, we are pressed thought the messengers made more ado than needs; let them magnify the preparations ever so much, they could feast as well at home. Note, Making light of Christ, and of the great salvation wrought out by Him, is the damning sin of the world. They were careless. Note, Multitudes perish eternally through carelessness, not from any direct aversion, but a prevailing indifference, to the matters of their souls.

And the reason why they made light of the marriage feast, was, that they had other things they minded more, and had more mind to: they went their ways, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise. Note, The business and profit of worldly employments prove to many a great hindrance in closing with Christ: none turn their back on the feast, but with some plausible excuse, Luke 14:18. The country people have their farms to look after; the town's people must tend their shops, and be constant on the exchange; they must buy, and sell, and get gain. It is true, that both farmers and merchants must be diligent in their business, but not so as to keep them from making religion their main business. These lawful things undo us, when they are unlawfully managed; when we are so careful and troubled about many things, as to neglect the one thing needful. Observe, Both the city and the country have their temptations; so that, whatever we have of the world in our hands, our care must be to keep it out of our hearts, lest it come between us and Christ.

2. The messengers were basely abused; The remnant, that is, those who were neither husbandmen nor tradesmen, but ecclesiastics, the scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests; these were the persecutors, these took the servants, and treated them spitefully, and slew them. This, in the parable, is unaccountable, never any could be so rude and barbarous as this, to servants that came to invite them to a feast; but in the application of the parable, it was matter of fact; they, whose feet should have been beautiful, because they brought the glad tidings of the solemn feasts, (Nahum 1:15.) were treated as the offscouring of all things, 1 Cor. 4:13. The prophets and John the Baptist had been thus abused already, and the apostles and ministers of Christ must count on the same. The Jews were, either directly or indirectly agents in most of the persecutions of the first preachers of the Gospel; witness the history of the Acts, that is, the sufferings of the apostles.

IV. The utter ruin that was coming o, the Jewish church and nation, is here represented by the revenge which the king, in wrath, took on these insolent recusants; (v. 7.) He was wroth. The Jews, who had been the people of God's love and blessing, by rejecting the Gospel, became the generation of his wrath and curse. Wrath came on them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2:16. Now observe here,

1. The sin that brought the ruin; it was the being murderers. He does not say he destroyed those despisers of his call, but those murderers of his servants; as if God were more jealous for the lives of his ministers than for the honor of his Gospel; he that toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye. Note, Persecution of Christ's faithful ministers fills the measure of guilt more than any thing. Filling Jerusalem with innocent blood, was that sin of Manasseh which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kings 24:4.

2. The ruin itself, that was coming; He sent forth his armies. The Roman armies were his armies, of his raising, of his sending; he gave riage feast. The Syriac version renders it "feast." So also Alb. Kypke, and Dr. Marsh. The more recent ones, Michaelis, Rosenm., Kuinoel, and Schleusner, explain an inaugural feast, "an inauguration, or instalment in office. For, from the custom of the orientals, kings on the day of inauguration were considered as bridegrooms and aushands, and with due form and solemnity were joined to the state, and to their subjects, who were compared to a bride and a wife." Rosenm. Comp. Ps. 45: and 1 Kings 1: 5-9. Other examples of his sense see in Luke 12:36. 14:8. Esth. 2:19. 3:22."

BLOOMFIELD. Wedding. 'The nuptial banquet. It was sometimes customary to send two messages, as in the case here supposed.'

DODDRIDGE.

'Grotius, Brug. and Kuinoel observe that it was the custom among the ancients for two guests to be twice invited, or, rather first invited some time before, that they might prepare themselves; secondly, summoned a short time previous to the banquet, that they might be there at a proper time.'

BLOOMFIELD. (4.) 'The original term includes calves, sheep, and fowls and all such animals as are put up to feed.'
'Fattings.' It was agreeable to the simplicity of the ancient ages to mention these as the chief parts of a royal entertainment. Thus in Homer and other ancient writers, we see princes of the first rank and dignity feasting each other with nothing but the flesh of oxen, sheep, and swine. Comp. Is. 25:6.'

7 But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city.

8 Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy.

9 Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage.

10 So those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together all, as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests.

2. The commission he gave to the servants, to invite other guests. The inhabitants of the city (v. 7.) had refused; Go to the highways then; into the way of the Gentiles, which at first they were to decline, ch. 10:5. Thus, by the fall of the Jews, salvation is come to the Gentiles, Rom. 11:11, 12. Eph. 3:8. Note, Christ will have a kingdom in the world, though many reject the grace, and resist the power, of that kingdom. Though Israel be not gathered, He will be glorious. The offer to the Gentiles, was, (1.) Unlooked for and unexpected; as an invitation to a wedding feast to wayfaring men on the road. The Jews had notice long before, and expected the Messiah; but to the Gentiles it was all new, what they had never heard of before, (Acts 17:19, 20.), and, consequently, what they could not conceive of as belonging to them. See Isa. 65:1, 2. (2.) It was universal and undistinguishing; Go, and bid as many as you find. The highways are public places, and there Wisdom cries, Prov. 1:20. 'Ask them that go by the way, ask any body, (Job 21:29.) high and low, rich and poor, bound and free, young and old, Jew and Gentile; tell them all, that they shall be welcome to gospel-privileges on gospel-terms; whoever will, let him come, without exception.'

3. The success of this second invitation; v. 10. The servants obeyed their orders. Jonah was sent into the highways, but was so tender of the honor of his country, that he avoided the errand; but Christ's apostles, though Jews, preferred the service of Christ before their respect to their nation; and Paul, though sorrowing for the Jews, yet magnifies his office, as the apostle of the Gentiles. They gathered together all. The design of the Gospel is, (1.) To gather souls together; not the nation of the Jews only, but all the children of God who are scattered abroad, (John 11:52.) the other sheep that were not of that fold, John 10:16. They were gathered into one body, one family, one corporation. (2.) To gather them together to the wedding feast, to pay their respect to Christ, and to partake of the privileges of the new covenant. Where the dole is, there will the poor be gathered together.

Now, the guests that were gathered, were, [1.] A multitude, all, as many as they found; so many, that the guest-chamber was filled. The sealed ones of the Jews were numbered, but those of other nations were without number, a very great multitude, Rev. 7:9. See Isa. 60:4, 8. [2.] A mixed multitude, both bad and good; some that, before their conversion, were sinner and well inclined, as the devout Greeks, (Acts 17:4.) and Cornelius; others, that had run them a charge to tread the people under foot, Isa. 10:6. God is the Lord of men's hosts, and makes what use He pleases of them, to serve his own purposes, though they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so, Mic. 4:11, 12. His armies destroyed those murderers, and burnt up their city. This points out the destruction of the Jews, by the Romans, forty years after this. No age ever saw a greater desolation than that, nor more of the direful effects of fire and sword. Though Jerusalem had been a holy city, the city that God had chosen to put his name there, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth; yet that city being now become a harlot, righteousness being no longer lodged in it, but murderers, the worst of murderers, (as the prophet speaks, Isa. 1:21.) judgment came on it, and ruin without remedy; and it is set forth for an example to all that should oppose Christ and his Gospel. It was the Lord's doing, to avenge the quarrel of his covenant.

V. The replenishing of the church again, by the bringing in of the Gentiles, is here represented, by the furnishing of the feast with guests out of the highways, v. 8, 10.

Here is, 1. The complaint of the master of the feast concerning those that were first bidden; v. 8. The wedding is ready, the covenant of grace ready to be sealed, a church ready to be founded; but they which were bidden, that is, the Jews, to whom pertained the covenant and the promises, by which they were of old invited to the feast of fat things, they were utterly unworthy, and, by their contempt of Christ, had forfeited all the privileges they were invited to. Note, It is not owing to God that sinners perish, but to themselves. Thus, when Israel of old was within sight of Canaan, the land of promise was ready, but their unbelief and murmuring, and contempt of that pleasant land, shut them out, and their carcasses were left to perish in the wilderness; and these things happened to them for ensamples. See 1 Cor. 10:11. Heb. 3:16. 4:1.

to an excess of riot, as the Corinthians; (1 Cor. 6:11.) Such were some of you; or some that, after their conversion, proved bad, that turned not to the Lord with all their heart, but feignedly; others, that were upright and sincere, and proved of the right class. Ministers, in casting the net of the Gospel, inclose good and bad; but the Lord knows them that are his.

VI. The case of hypocrites is represented by the guest that had not on a wedding garment, one of the bad that were gathered in. Concerning this hypocrite observe,

1. His discovery; how he was found out, v. 11.

(1.) The king came in to see the guests, to bid those welcome who came prepared, and to turn those out who came otherwise. Note, The God of heaven takes particular notice of those who profess religion, and have a place and a name in the visible church. Our Lord Jesus walks among the golden candlesticks, and therefore knows their works. See Rev. 2:1, 2. Cant. 7:12. Let this be a warning to us against hypocrisy, that disguises will shortly be stripped off, and every man will appear in his own colors; and an encouragement to us in our sincerity, that God is a witness to it.

Observe, This hypocrite was never discovered to be without a wedding garment, till the king himself came in to see the guests. Note, It is God's prerogative to know who are sound at heart, and who are not. We may be deceived in men, but He cannot. The day of judgment will be the great discovering day, when all the guests will be presented to the king; (ch. 25:32.) the secrets of all hearts will then be made manifest, and we shall infallibly discern between the righteous and the wicked. It concerns all the guests to prepare for the scrutiny of the heart-searching God.

(2.) As soon as he came in, he espied the hypocrite; though but one, he presently had his eye on him; there is no hope of being hid in a crowd from the arrests of divine justice; he was not dressed as became a nuptial solemnity. Note, Many come to the wedding feast without a wedding garment. If the Gospel be the wedding feast, then the wedding garment is a frame of heart and a course of life worthy of the vocation whereunto we are called, (Eph. 4:1.) as becomes the Gospel of Christ, Phil. 1:27. The righteousness of saints, their real holiness and sanctification, and Christ made Righteousness to them, is the clean linen. Rev. 19:6. This man was not naked, or in rags; some raiment he had, but not a wedding garment. Those, and only those, who put on the Lord Jesus, that have a Christian temper of mind, and are adorned with Christian graces, who live by faith in Christ, and to whom He is All in all, have the wedding garment.

2. His trial; (v. 12.) and there we may observe,

1. How he was arraigned; v. 12. A startling question to one that was priding himself in the place he securely possessed. Friend! That was a cutting word; a seeming friend, a friend in profession, under manifold ties and obligations to be a friend. Note, There are many in the church who are false friends to Jesus Christ, who say that they love Him, while their hearts are not with Him. How earnest thou in hither? He does not chide the servants for letting him in; (the wedding garment is an inward thing, ministers must go according to that which falls within their cognizance;) but He checks his presumption in crowding in, when he knew that his heart was not upright; How durst thou claim a share in gospel-bene-

(8.) Were not worthy. 'Because they made light of it, and would not come; among the Mohammedans, refusal to come to a marriage feast, when invited, is considered a breach of the law of God. It was probably considered in this light among all the oriental nations. This observation is necessary, in order to point out more forcibly the iniquity of the refusal mentioned in the text.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(9.) 'Strange as this direction may seem, there is something that approaches very near it in the customs of the eastern nations, even in modern times. For Pococke informs us, that an Arab prince will often dine in the street before his door, and call to all that pass, even to beggars, in the name of God; and they come and sit down to table, and, when they have done, retire with the usual form of returning thanks. This adds one more proof of the exact correspondence of the various facts and circumstances recorded in the sacred writings to the truth of history, and to ancient oriental customs and manners.'

(10.) Gathered—all—both good and bad. 'By the preaching of the Gospel, multitudes of souls are gathered into what is termed the visible church of Christ. This church is the floor, where the wheat and the chaff are often mingled, ch. 3:12. The field, where the bastard wheat and the true grain grow together, ch. 13:26, 27. The net, which collects of all kinds, both good and bad, ch. 13:48. The house, in which the wise and foolish are found, ch. 25:1, &c. And the fold, in which there are both sheep and goats, ch. 25:34, &c.'

13 Then said the king to the servants, "Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness : " there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Such are spots in the feast, dishonor the bridegroom, affront the company, and disgrace themselves ; therefore, How camest thou in hither ? Note, Hypocrites will be called to an account for all their presumptuous intrusion into gospel-ordinances, and usurpation of gospel-privileges. Who has required this at your hand ? Isa. 1:12. Despised Sabbaths and abused sacraments must be reckoned for, and judgment taken out on an action of waste against all those who received the grace of God in vain. "How camest thou to the Lord's table, at such a time, unhumiliated and unsanctified ? What brought thee to sit before God's prophets, as his people do, when thy heart went after thy covetousness ? How camest thou in ? Not by the door, but some other way, as a thief and a robber. It was a tortuous entry, a possession without color of a title." Note, It is good for those that have a place in the church, often to put it to themselves, "How came I in hither ? Have I a wedding garment ?" If we would thus judge ourselves, we should not be judged.

(2.) How he was convicted ; he was speechless—muzzled ; (so the word is used, 1 Cor. 9:9.) the man stood mute, on his arraignment, being convicted and condemned by his own conscience. They who live within the church, and die without Christ, will not have one word to say for themselves in the judgment of the great day ; should they plead, we have eaten and drunken in thy presence, as they do (Luke 13:26,) that is, to plead guilty ; for, the crime they are charged with, is, thrusting themselves into the presence of Christ, and to his table, before they were called. They who never heard of this wedding feast will be more excusable, and their condemnation more tolerable.

3. His sentence ; (v. 13.) Bind him hand and foot, &c.

(1.) He is ordered to be pinioned, as condemned malefactors are, to be manacled and shackled. Those that will not work and walk as they should, may expect to be bound hand and foot. There is a binding in this world by the servants, the ministers, whose suspending of persons that walk disorderly, is called binding of them, ch. 11:18. "Bind them up from partaking of special ordinances, and the peculiar privileges of their church-membership ; bind them over to the righteous judgment of God." In the day of judgment, hypocrites will be bound ; the angels shall bind up these tares in bundles for the fire, ch. 13:41. Damned sinners are bound hand and foot by an irreversible sentence ; this signifies the same with the fixing of the great gulf ; they can neither resist nor outrun their punishment.

Verses 11—14.

The preceding part of the parable represented the replenishing of the church with professed Christians : this shows the difference between nominal and real disciples. According to the custom of those times, princes had large wardrobes, from which, on some occasions, they furnished numbers with suitable apparel ; it must be supposed, that a wedding garment was offered to each guest when he entered the banquetting house : for it could not be expected, that travellers from the highways should be properly habited for the royal entertainment, to which they were so unexpectedly invited. It is not material, whether we understand the wedding garment to mean the imputed righteousness of Christ, or "the sanctification of the Spirit," for both are alike necessary, and they always go together. No man can obtain either of these blessings, except from Christ, and by faith in Him : yet those who remain unrighteous and unholy, besides all their other crimes, are chargeable with refusing the blessing when offered them.

SCOTT.

(11.) Wedding garment. That persons making an entertainment sometimes furnished the habits in which the guests should appear, is evident from what Homer says of Ulysses being thus furnished by the Phœnicians. (Odys.) and from the account Diodorus gives us of the hospitality of Gelias, the Sicilian, who at once supplied with clothes five hundred horsemen, driven by a storm to take shelter with him.

DODDRIDGE.

"The kings of Persia have great wardrobes, where there are always many hundreds of habits ready designed for presents, and stored. More than forty tailors are always employed in this house—(the wardrobe)." CHARDIN.

"At the entertainment given by the grand vizier to lord Elgin and his suite, in the palace of the seraglio, pelisses were given to all the guests." PORTER.

Dr. A. Clarke refers to Zeph. 1:7, 8. Had not on a wedding garment. "It was usual, more especially at marriage feasts, for persons to appear in a sumptuous dress, adorned, as some writers tell us, with gold embroidery ; though many times white garments seem to have been used on such occasions. Rev. 19:8, 9. But as it could not be expected that travellers, thus pressed in, should themselves be provided with a suitable habit, we must therefore conclude, not only from the magnificence of the preparations, to which we must suppose the wardrobe of the prince corresponded, but likewise from the full-wing circumstance of resentment against this guest, that a robe was offered, but refused by him. And this is a circumstance which (as Calvin) is admirably suited to the method of God's deal-

(2.) He is ordered to be carried off from the wedding feast ; Take him away. When the wickedness of hypocrites appears, they are to be taken away from the communion of the faithful, to be cut off as withered branches. This bespeaks the punishment of loss in the other world ; they shall be taken away from the king, from the kingdom, from the wedding feast. Depart from me, ye cursed. It will aggravate their misery, that (like the unbelieving lord, 2 Kings 7:2,) they shall see all this plerety with their eyes, but shall not taste of it. Note, Those that walk unworthy of their Christianity, forfeit all the happiness they presumptuously lay claim to, and complimented themselves with a groundless expectation of.

(3.) He is ordered into a doleful dungeon ; Cast him into outer darkness. Our Savior here insensibly slides out of this payable into that which it intimates—the damnation of hypocrites in the other world. Hell is utter darkness, darkness out of heaven, the land of light ; extreme darkness, darkness to the last degree without the least ray or spark of light, or hope of it, like that of Egypt ; darkness which might be felt ; the blackness of darkness, as darkness itself, Job 10:22. Note, Hypocrites go by the light of the Gospel itself down to utter darkness ; and hell will be hell indeed to such, a condemnation more intolerable ; there shall be weeping, and gnashing of teeth. This our Savior often uses as part of the description of hell-torments, which are hereby represented, not so much by the misery itself, as by the perception sinners will have of it ; there shall be weeping, an expression of great sorrow and anguish ; not a gush of tears, which gives present ease, but constant weeping, which is constant torment ; and the gnashing of teeth, is an expression of the greatest rage and indignation ; they will be like a wild bull in a net, full of the fury of the Lord, Isa. 51:20. 8:21, 22. Let us therefore bear and fear.

Lastly, The parable is concluded with the remarkable saying which we had before, (ch. 20:9, 10) Many are called, but few are chosen, v. 14. Of the many that are called, if you set aside all those as unchosen, that made light of the feast, and avowedly prefer other things before it ; if then you set aside all that make a profession of religion, but the temper of whose spirits, and the tenor of whose conversation, is a constant contradiction to it ; if you set aside all the pro-ing with us ; who indeed requires holiness in order to our receiving the benefits of the Gospel, but is graciously pleased to work it in us by his Holy Spirit, and therefore may justly resent and punish our neglect of so great a favor."

(13.) "In ancient times, the stewards of great families were slaves, as well as the servants of the lower class, being raised to that trust on account of their good qualities. If any steward, therefore, in the absence of his lord, behaved as is represented in the parable, it was a plain proof that the virtues on account of which he was raised, were counterfeited, and by consequence that he was an hypocrite. Slaves of this character, among other chastisements, were sometimes condemned to work in the mines. As this was one of the most grievous punishments, when they first entered, nothing was heard among them but weeping and gnashing of teeth on account of the intolerable fatigue to which they were subjected in these hideous caverns without hope of release."

MACKNIGHT.

"It is well known that banquets were generally celebrated in rooms that were finely illuminated and richly adorned. And considering how splendid and magnificent the entertainments of the eastern princes were, it cannot be thought an unnatural circumstance, that such an affront as this, offered to the king, his son, his bride, and the rest of the company, should be punished with bonds, and a dungeon."

DODDRIDGE.

"This man was meant to be the representative of those presumptuous persons, who intrude themselves into the Christian covenant, and expect to receive all the privileges and all the rewards annexed to it, without possessing any one of those Christian graces and virtues, which the Gospel requires from all those who profess to believe and to embrace it. Nothing is more common in Scripture than to represent the habits and dispositions of the mind, those which determine and distinguish the whole character, under the figure of bodily garments and external habits, as in Job 22:14, and Is. 61:10. In the same manner, we are commanded in the Gospel to "put on charity, to be clothed with humility," and in the book of Revelation, the elders are described as "sitting before the throne of God, clothed in white raiment."

PORTER.

(14.) Many are called, &c. "Many are called by the preaching of the Gospel into the outward communion of the church of Christ, but few comparatively are chosen to dwell with God in glory, because they do not come to the master of the feast for a marriage garment, for that holiness without which none can see the Lord."

speaking his mind, and hoped by that, if they could bring Him to some nice and tender point, to get an advantage against Him. It has been the old practice of Satan's agents and emissaries, to make a man an offender for a word, a word misplaced, or mistaken, or misunderstood: thus they lay a snare for him that reprooeth in the gate, (Isa. 29: 21.) and represent the greatest teachers as the greatest troublemakers of Israel: thus the wicked plotteth against the just, Ps. 37: 12, 13.

There were two ways by which the enemies of Christ might be rid of Him; either by law, or by force. But to do it by law, they must make Him obnoxious to the civil government; for it was not lawful for them to put any man to death; (John 18: 31.) and the Roman powers were not apt to concern themselves about questions of words, and names, and their law, Acts 18: 14. And to do it by force, they must make Him obnoxious to the people, who were always the hands, whoever were the heads, in such acts of violence; but the people took Christ for a prophet, and therefore his enemies could not raise ^hthe mob against Him. Now, then, the design was, to bring Him into such a dilemma, that He must make Himself liable to the displeasure, either of the Jewish multitude, or of the Roman magistrates.

II. The question which they put to Him, pursuant to this design, v. 16, 17. Having devised this iniquity in secret, they went forth to practise it. Observe,

1. The persons they employed: they did not go themselves, but they sent their disciples, who would look less like tempters, and more like learners. Note, Wicked men will never want wicked instruments to carry on their wicked counsels. Pharisees have their disciples at their beck, and they have this in their eye, when they are so industrious to make proselytes.

With them they sent the Herodians, a party among the Jews, who were fane, and all the hypocritical, you will find that they are few, very few, that are chosen; many called to the wedding feast, but few chosen to the wedding garment, that is, to salvation, by sanctification of the Spirit. This is the strait gate, and narrow way, which few find.

V. 15-22. In these verses, we find Christ attacked by the Pharisees and Herodians, with a question about paying tribute to Cæsar. Observe,

1. What their design was, v. 15. Hitherto, his encounters had been mostly with the chief priests and the elders, who trusted more to their power than to their policy, and examined Him concerning his commission; (ch. 21: 23.) but now He is set upon from another quarter; the Pharisees will try whether they can deal with Him by their learning in the law, and in casuistical divinity. Note, It is vain for the best and wisest of men to think that, by their ingenuity, or interest, or industry, or even by their innocence and integrity, they can escape the hatred and ill-will of bad men, or screen themselves from the strife of tongues. See how unwearied the enemies of Christ and his kingdom are in their opposition!

1. They took counsel. It was foretold concerning Him, that the rulers would take counsel against Him; (Ps. 2: 2.) and so persecuted they the prophets. Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah. See Jer. 18: 18. 20: 10. Note, The more there is of contrivance and consultation about sin, the worse it is. There is a particular woe to them that devise iniquity. Mic. 2: 1.

2. What they aimed at, was, to entangle Him in his talk. They saw Him free and bold in for a cheerful and entire subjection to the Roman emperor, and to Herod his deputy; and who made it their business to reconcile people to that government, and pressed all to pay their tribute. Some think that they were the collectors of the land tax, as the publicans were of the customs, and that they went with the Pharisees to Christ, with this blind on their plot, that, while the Herodians demanded the tax, and the Pharisees denied it, they were both willing to refer it to Christ, as a proper judge to decide the quarrel. Herod being obliged, by the charter of the sovereignty, to take care of the tribute, these Herodians, by assisting him in that, helped to endear him to his great friends at home. The Pharisees, on the other hand, were zealous for the liberty of the Jews, and did what they could to make them impatient of the Roman yoke. Now, if He should countenance the paying of tribute, the Pharisees would incense the people against Him; and if He should discountenance or disallow it, the Herodians would incense the government against Him. Note, It is common for those that oppose one another, to continue in an opposition to Christ and his kingdom. Samson's foxes looked several ways, but met in one firebrand. See Ps. 83: 3, 5, 7, 8. If they are unanimous in opposing, should we not be so in maintaining, the interests of the Gospel?

2. The preface to the question; it was highly complimentary to our Savior, v. 16. Note, It is a common thing for the most spiteful projects to be covered with the most specious pretences. Had they come to Christ with the most serious inquiry, and the most sincere intention, they could not have expressed themselves better. Here is hatred covered with deceit, and a wicked heart with burning lips; (Prov. 26: 23.) as Judas, who kissed and betrayed, as Joab, who kissed and killed.

Now, (1.) What they said of Christ was right, and, whether they knew it or no, blessed be God, we know it.

[1.] That Jesus Christ was a faithful Teacher; Thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth. For Himself, He is true, the Amen, the faithful Witness; He is the Truth itself. As for his doctrine, the matter of his teaching was the way of God, the way that God requires us to walk in, the way of duty, that leads to happiness. The manner of it was in truth; He showed people the right way, the way in which they should go. He was a skilful Teacher, that knew the way; a faithful Teacher, that would be sure to let us know it. See Prov. 8: 6-9. This is the character of a good teacher, to preach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; not to suppress, pervert, or stretch it, for favor or affection, hatred or good-will, either out of a desire to please, or a fear to offend, any man.

[2.] That He was a bold Reprover. In preach-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. God has not only provided food, but a royal feast, for the perishing souls of his rebellious creatures; and there is 'enough and to spare' of every thing, which can conduce to our present comfort and everlasting felicity, in the salvation of his Son, Jesus Christ. Let none then think of religion, as of an unpleasant service, to which they are urged, but as a rich and magnificent feast, to which they are invited; and, whilst believers enjoy peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, communion with God, and the lively hope of glory, let them not forget at what a price the feast was prepared. 'All things are now ready,' the servants are continually employed in inviting guests, and they are commanded to invite all, 'as many as they find, both bad and good,' to renew their invitations to such as have repeatedly rejected them; and not to be wearied out by disappointments or ill usage, but to address others, and others still, that 'the wedding may be furnished with guests.' Yet, after all these invitations, numbers perish in their sins: not because they may not come; nor, properly speaking, because they cannot; but because they 'will not.' This is the effect of profane contempt of spiritual blessings, inordinate love of worldly objects, carnal dislike to the perfection, law, and government of God, and proud aversion to the humbling salvation of the Gospel. From such motives, numbers 'make light' of the invitations, and turn aside, perhaps pretending want of leisure, or purposing to come at 'a more convenient season.' Others are enraged at the warnings and expostulations, with which the servants enforce the invitation; and treat them with insult and reproach; or even murder them if they have it in their power. Thus the Gospel of salvation occasions their deeper condemnation, because they hate the light through love of sin; and so God is provoked to give them up to temporal and eternal destruction. Sometimes they, who have been brought up under the Gospel, prove the greatest despisers and enemies of it; and the servants, who are sent forth into the highways and hedges, have most success in winning souls to Christ. No objections will be made to any man, on account of his previous character, who is desirous of admission to this feast: yet no man will actually partake of it, who does not seek and obtain an interest in the merits of Christ, or who remains a stranger to converting grace. (Notes, Rev. 3: 17-19.) Many find admission among believers, and continue with them to the last, who have not this 'wedding garment,' and whom the King will at length distinguish and separate from his chosen people: then their present pretences will be shown to be fallacious, and they will have nothing to plead in arrest of judgment, when He shall order them to be 'bound hand and foot, and cast into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.' As, therefore, 'many are called, and few chosen,' let us 'examine ourselves whether we be in the faith,' and seek above all things to be approved of by the King Himself, when He shall come in to see the guests.

SCOTT.

“Tell us therefore, what thinkest thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not?”

“But Jesus perceived their wickedness, and said, ‘Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites?’

“Shew me the tribute-money. And they brought unto him a penny.”

“And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and *superscription?”

“They say unto him, Cæsar’s. Then saith he unto them, ‘Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar’s,’ and unto God the things that are God’s.”

ing He cared not for any; He valued no man’s frowns or smiles, He did not court, or dread, either the great or the many, for He regarded not the person of man; He did not know faces; that Lion of the tribe of Judah turned not away for any, Prov. 30: 30. He reproveth with equity, (Isa. 11: 14.) and never with partiality.

(2.) Though what they said was true for the matter of it, yet there was nothing but flattery and treachery in the intention of it. They called Him Master, when they were contriving to treat Him as the worst of malefactors; they pretended respect, when they intended mischief; and they affronted his wisdom as Man, much more his omniscience as God, of which He had so often given undeniable proofs, when they imagine that they could impose on Him with these pretences, and that He could not see through them. It is the grossest atheism, that is, the greatest folly in the world, to think to put a cheat upon Christ, who searches the heart, Rev. 2: 23. Those that mock God, do but deceive themselves, Gal. 6: 7.

3. The proposal of the case; What thinkest thou? As if they had said, ‘Many men are of many minds in this matter; it is a case which relates to practice, and occurs daily; let us have thy thoughts freely in the matter, Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?’ This implies a further question; Has Cæsar a right to demand it? The nation of the Jews was lately, about a hundred years before this, conquered by the Roman sword, and so, as other nations, became a province of the empire; accordingly, toll, tribute, and custom, were demanded from them, and sometimes poll-money. By this it appeared that the sceptre was departed from Judah; (Gen. 49: 10.) and therefore, if they had understood the signs of the times, they must have concluded that Shiloh was come, and either that this was He, or they must find out another more likely to be so.

Now, the question was, Whether it was lawful to pay these taxes voluntarily, or, Whether they should not insist on the ancient liberty of their nation, and rather suffer themselves to be distressed upon? The ground of the doubt was, that they were Abraham’s seed, and should not by consent be in bondage to any man, John 8: 33. God had given them a law, that they should not set a stranger over them; did not that imply that they were not to yield any willing subjection to any prince, state, or potentate, that was not of their own nation and religion? This was an old mistake, arising from that pride and that haughty spirit, which bring destruction and a fall. Jeremiah, in his time, though he spake in God’s name, could not possibly beat them off it, nor persuade them to submit to the king of Babylon; and their obstinacy in that matter was then their ruin: (Jer. 27: 13.) and now again they stumbled at the same stone; and it was the very thing which, in a few years after, brought final destruction on them by the Romans. They quite mistook the sense both of the precept and of the privilege, and, under color of God’s word, contended with his providence, when they should have kissed the rod, and accepted the punishment of their iniquity.

However, by this question they hoped to entangle Christ, and, which way soever He solved it, to expose Him to the fury either of the jealous Jews or of the jealous Romans; they were ready to triumph, as Pharaoh did over Israel, that the wilderness had shut Him in, and his doctrine would be concluded either injurious to the rights of the church, or hurtful to kings and provinces.

Cæsar. ‘This was the general title given to the Roman emperors. Theribus Cæsar was at this time emperor.’ Dr. A. CLARKE.

‘Is it lawful?’ That is, may we do this without a breach of our duty to God?’ Bp. PEARCE.

Verse 18.

Ye hypocrites. [Note, 6: 1—4, v. 2.] ‘Christ justly calls these persons hypocrites, because they pretended to own Him as a just person, and one who bore no respect to persons; and yet came with design to accuse Him for an unjust decision. And because they (Luke 20: 20, 27, 28) ‘sighed themselves’ to be such as they were not.’ Whitby.

Verse 21.

‘Christians must obey their magistrates, although they be wicked and extortioners; but so that the authority of God may remain safe to Him, and his honor be not diminished.’ Beza, in Scott.

Render therefore, &c.] ‘There is scarcely any thing which proves both wisdom and rightness of mind more fully, than proper behavior on sudden occasions, and proper answers to unforeseen questions: for what a man shows himself to be at such times, we have, in general, great cause to believe that he really is. To this trial our Savior, living Him, was perpetually exposed; and his character not only did not suffer, but was exalted by every such occasion of showing his wisdom and wisdom, inasmuch that his enemies were amazed, and paid Him the unwilling tribute of public approbation.’ Anps. SECKLER and NEWCOMB.

1. He discovered it; (v. 19.) He perceived their wickedness; for, surely, it was in the net spread in the sight of any bird, Prov. 1: 17. A temptation perceived is half conquered, for our greatest danger lies from snakes under the green grass; and He said, Why tempt ye Me, ye hypocrites? Note, Whatever vizard the hypocrites put on, our Lord Jesus sees through it. He cannot be imposed on, as we often are, by flatteries and fair pretences. He that searches the heart, can call hypocrites by their own name, as Ahijah did the wife of Jeroboam, (1 Kings 14: 6.) Why feignest thou thyself to be another? Why tempt ye Me, ye hypocrites? Note, Hypocrites tempt Jesus Christ; they try his knowledge, whether He can discover them through their disguises; they try his holiness and truth, whether He will allow them in his church; but if they that of old tempted Christ, when He was but darkly revealed, were destroyed of serpents, of how much sorer punishment shall they be thought worthy, who tempt Him now in the midst of gospel-light and love!

2. He evaded it; his convicting them of hypocrisy might have served for an answer: such captious, malicious questions deserve a reproof, not a reply: but our Lord Jesus gave a full answer to their question, and introduced it by an argument sufficient to support it, so as to lay down a rule for his church in this matter, and yet to avoid giving offence, and to break the snare.

(1.) He forced them, ere they were aware, to confess Cæsar’s authority over them, τ. 19, 20. In dealing with those that are captious, it is good to give our reasons, and, if possible, reasons of confessed cogency, before we give our resolutions. Thus, the evidence of truth may silence gainsayers by surprise, while they only stood on their guard against the truth itself, not against the reason of it; Show me the tribute money. He had none of his own to convince them by, not so much as one piece, it should seem; for, for our sakes, He emptied Himself and became poor; He despised the wealth of this world, and thereby taught us not to overvalue it; silver and gold He had none; why then should we covet to load ourselves with the thick clay? The Romans demanded their tribute in their own money, which was current among the Jews at that time: that, therefore, is called the tribute money; He does not name what piece, but the tribute money, to shew that He did not mind things of that nature, nor concern Himself about them; his heart was on better things, the kingdom of God, and the riches and righteousness thereof, and ours should be so too. They presently brought Him a penny, a Roman penny in silver, in value about seven pence halfpenny sterling, and the most common piece then in use; it was stamped with the emperor’s image and superscription, which was the warrant of the public faith for the value of the pieces so stamped; a method agreed on by most nations, for the more easy circulation of money with satisfaction. The coining of money has always been looked upon as a branch of the prerogative, ‘Amongst the peculiar qualities of our holy religion, is to be reckoned its complete abstraction from all views of civil policy. Christianity, while it declines every question relating to particular forms of government, is alike friendly to them all, by tending to make men virtuous and therefore easier to be governed; by statuting obedience to government in ordinary cases, to be not merely a submission to force, but a duty of conscience; and by inducing dispositions favorable to public tranquillity; and by recommending prayers for communities and governors, of every description, with a solicitude and fervency proportioned to the influence they possess upon human happiness.’ FALEY.

And to God the things which are God’s.] ‘Diodati, Ropheus, and some other commentators, interpret this as a caution against omitting the sacred tribute, on pretence of answering the demands of Cæsar, who (they say) had claimed it to himself. But I apprehend our Lord had a more extensive view; and that, as He cautions the Pharisees against using religion as a pretence to justify secession, so He also warns the Herodians that they should not, as they were too inclinable to do, make a compliment of their religion to the Romans, by complying with those things which were forbidden by the divine law, that they might ingratiate themselves with Cæsar’s party.’ DODDRIDGE.

‘The inserting a prince’s name in the khoutha, (or public prayer for the king,) and the inscribing it on the current coin, are reckoned in the East the most certain acknowledgments of sovereignty.’

re t in the country.' Some think that the superscription on this coin was, a memorandum of the conquest of Judea by the Romans, and that they admitted that, too.

(2.) From thence He inferred the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar; (o. 21.) Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; not 'Give it him,' (as they expressed it, v. 17) but 'Render it; Return,' or 'Restore it'; if Cæsar fill the purses, let Cæsar command them. It is too late now to dispute paying tribute to Cæsar, for you are become a province of the empire, and, when once a relation is admitted, the duty of it must be performed. Render to all their due; and, particularly, tribute to whom tribute is due. Now, by this answer,

[1.] No offence was given. It was much to the honor of Christ and his doctrine, that He did not interpose as a Judge or a Divider in matters of this nature, but left them as He found them, for his kingdom is not of this world; and in this He hath given an example to his ministers, who deal in sacred things, not to meddle with disputes about things secular, but to leave that to those whose proper business it is. Ministers that would mind their business and please their Master, must not entangle themselves in the affairs of this life; they forfeit the guidance of God's Spirit, and the convoy of his providence, when they thus go out of their way. Christ discusses not the emperor's title, but enjoins a peaceable subjection to the powers that be. The government therefore had no reason to take offence at his determination, but to thank Him, for it would strengthen Cæsar's interest with the people, who held Him for a Prophet; and yet such was the impudence of his prosecutors, that, though He had expressly charged them to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, they laid the direct contrary in his indictment, that He forbade to give tribute to Cæsar, Luke 23: 2. As to the people, the Pharisees could not accuse Him to them, because they themselves had, before they were aware, yielded the premises, and then it was too late to evade the conclusion. Note, Though truth seeks not a fraudulent concealment, yet it sometimes needs a prudent management, to prevent the offence which may be taken at it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15-22. While we carefully shun the hypocrisy and wickedness of the enemies of Christ, we may learn from their words what a minister of God ought to be. By their allowance, and in their unimpassioned judgment, he should be an upright, faithful man, 'teaching the way of God in truth'; able and bold 'to declare the whole counsel of God'; and not so caring for man, or fearing him, or respecting the person of any man, as to keep back, alter, or soften any part of his message. Who will deny in words, that this ought to be the character of a minister? Yet how few reduce it to practice! Who expects such unpliant faithfulness and unreserved honesty, towards all ranks and descriptions of men, from the ministers of Christ? Who does not censure that man; as rude, uncourtly, and intruding, who flatters no one, connives at no errors or sins of his patron, his friend, or his prince; and will not disguise his sentiments to please any party, or for fear of the frown of any man or multitude of men? The nearer any servant of God comes to this character, the more need he will have to pray for 'the meekness of wisdom,' and to copy the example of his Lord: for, many will seek for matter of accusation against him, that they may re-establish their own reputation by ruining his; and if his boldness be not evidently disinterested, benevolent, humble, harmless, and prudent, he will often be entangled in their snares. Few subjects are more perilous in this respect, than those which are in any degree connected with political con-

[2.] His adversaries were proved. First, Some of them would have had Him make it unlawful to give tribute to Cæsar, that they might have a pretence to save their money. Thus many excuse 'themselves from that which they must do,' by arguing whether they may do it or no. Secondly, They all withheld from God his dues, and are reproved for that: while they were vainly contending about their civil liberties, they had lost the life and power of religion, and needed to be put in mind of their duty to God, with that to Cæsar.

First, That the Christian religion is no enemy to civil government, but a friend to it. Christ's kingdom doth not clash or interfere with the kingdoms of the earth, in any thing that pertains to their jurisdiction. By Christ kings reign.

Secondly, It is the duty of subjects to render to magistrates that which, according to the laws of their country, is their due. The higher powers, being intrusted with the public welfare, the protection of the subject, and the conservation of the peace, are entitled, in consideration thereof, to a just proportion of the public wealth, and the revenue of the nation. For this cause, pay we tribute, because they attend continually to this very thing; (Rom. 13: 6.) and it is doubtless a greater sin to cheat the government than to cheat a private person. Though it is the constitution that determines what is Cæsar's, yet, when that is determined, Christ bids us render it to him; my coat is my coat, by the law of man; but he is a thief, by the law of God, that takes it from me.

Thirdly, When we render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, we must remember withal to render to God the things that are God's. If our purses be Cæsar's, our consciences are God's; He hath said, My son, give me thy heart; He must have the innermost and uppermost place there; we must render to God that which is his due, out of our time, and out of our estates; from them He must have his share, as well as Cæsar his; and, if Cæsar's commands interfere with God's, we must obey God rather than men.

tests: for it is difficult to touch on them, without giving advantage to one party or other, or without verging to some extreme. Yet ministers must teach the people their duty, though it should interfere with their own popularity, or incur the displeasure of their rulers: and to this they should confine their interposition. They must insist upon men's rendering tribute, honor, and civil obedience, without reserve, to 'the powers that be'; let Pharisees, or men of any creed or name, attempt to render religion the watchword of sedition, or the cloak of their depredations on the public revenue; or indulge their rebellion against the providence of God, by reviling the persons or measures of their rulers: and they must equally insist upon men's 'rendering to God the things that are God's'; let Herodians say what they will to prove that kings are authorized to lord it over the consciences of their subjects, and to model the Gospel and its ordinances as may best suit their interest, convenience, or caprice. Nor will it be very difficult to apply this general rule to particular cases, provided the heart be upright; except that it will sometimes expose a man to secular loss or persecution, if he determines to obey Cæsar as far as his duty to God will give him leave, and no farther.—But how broad is the rule of God's commandments! The enlightened soul can never seriously meditate on any one of them, without seeing cause to say, 'God be merciful to me, and write this law in my heart, I beseech thee.'

Verses 23-33.

They purposed to embarrass Jesus with a difficulty, which probably had perplexed others of their opponents; though the case stated would not have been worth recording, had it not shown the cavilling, frivolous spirit of infidelity, and given our Lord an occasion of returning a most instructive answer. The inference which they meant to insinuate, was the impossibility of a resurrection. It is method of arguing by insinuation, from imagined difficulties, to discredit authentic revelation, or even stubborn facts, forms a species of logic for which infidels, ancient and modern, have shown a peculiar predilection; and indeed it is the best method, which can be taken, of perplexing weak minds, and amusing superficial inquirers. (Marg. Ref. e. f.—Mark 12: 18-27, v. 27.) Among other egregious errors, the Sadducees took no notice of a state of punishment, in the future world, but spake as if those who believed in the resurrection thought all was (at least all Jews) to be of one character, and to go to one place. The argument (31, 32.) seems at first sight more immediately to prove, that the souls of the patriarchs were, at that time, in existence and felicity, than to evince the resurrection of their bodies: but if we consider, that man is constituted of soul and body, we shall perceive that it proves both. For if JEHOVAH gave Himself, by an everlasting covenant, to be the God and Portion of any person, it implied that He would finally render him happy, in body and soul, by bringing him to the complete enjoyment of his presence and favor; and this could not be done, unless the body be restored from the grave. The whole reasoning shows that the doctrine of the resurrection, and the future state, is as certainly contained in the Old Testament, when properly understood, as in the New. The resurrection of the wicked is revealed in other places; but the question proposed led Jesus rather to speak concerning that of the righteous.

that there is no resurrection, and asked him,

24 Saying, O Master, Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

25 Now there were with us seven brethren; and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and, having no issue, left his wife unto his brother:

flourished about two hundred and eighty-four years before our Savior's birth. They lie under heavy censures among the writers of their own nation, as men of base and debauched conversations, which their principles led them to. They were the fewest in number of all the sects among the Jews, but generally persons of some rank. As the Pharisees and Essenes seemed to follow Plato and Pythagoras, so the Sadducees were much of the genius of the Epicureans, and denied the resurrection; they said, that, when the body dies, the soul dies with it; that there is no future state of rewards or punishments; no judgment to come in heaven or hell. They maintained, that, except God, there is no spirit, (Acts 23: 8.) nothing but matter and motion. They would not own the divine inspiration of the prophets, nor any revelation from heaven, but what God Himself spake on mount Sinai. Now, the doctrine of Christ carried that great truth, of the resurrection and a future state, much farther than it had yet been revealed, and therefore the Sadducees in a particular manner set themselves against it. The Pharisees and Sadducees were contrary to each other, and yet confederates against Christ. Christ's Gospel hath always suffered between superstitious, ceremonious hypocrites and bigots on the one hand, and profane deists and infidels on the other; the former abusing, the latter despising, the form of godliness, but both denying the power of it.

II. The objection they made against the truth; (v. 24-28.) they take it for granted, that, if there be a resurrection, it must be a return to such a state as this we are now in, and to the same circumstances, like the imaginary Platonic year; and if so, it is an invincible absurdity for this woman in the future state to have seven husbands, or else an insuperable difficulty which of them should have her.

1. They suggest the law of Moses in this matter, (v. 24.) that the next of kin should marry the widow of him that died childless; (Deut. 25: 5.) we have it practised, Ruth 4: 5. It was a political law, founded in the particular constitution of the Jewish commonwealth, to preserve the distinction of families and inheritances, of both which there was special care taken in that government.

2. They put a case upon this statute, which, whether it were a case in fact, or only a moot case, is not material; if it had not really occurred, yet possibly it might. It was of seven brothers, who married the same woman, v. 25-27. Now, this case supposes,

(1.) The desolations that death sometimes makes in families; how it often sweeps away a whole fraternity in a little time; seldom (as the case is put) according to seniority, (the land of darkness is without any order,) but heaps upon heaps; it diminishes families that had multiplied greatly, Ps. 107: 35, 39. When there were seven brothers grown up to man's estate, there was

Lastly, observe how they were nonplussed by this answer, v. 22. They admired his sagacity in discovering and evading a snare which they thought so craftily laid. Christ is, and will be, the Wonder, not only of his beloved friends, but of his baffled enemies. One would think, they should have marvelled and followed Him; but no, they marvelled, and left Him. Note, There are many in whose eyes Christ is marvellous, and yet not precious. They admire his wisdom, but will not be guided by it, his power, but will not submit to it. They went their way, as persons shamed, and made an inglorious retreat. The stratagem being defeated, they quitted the field. Note, There is nothing got by contending with Christ.

V. 23-33. We have here Christ's dispute with the Sadducees concerning the resurrection; it was the same day on which He was attacked by the Pharisees about paying tribute. Satan was now more busy than ever to ruffle and disturb Him; it was an hour of temptation, Rev. 3: 10. Observe here,

I. The opposition which the Sadducees made to a very great truth of religion, v. 23. These heretics were called Sadducees, from one Sadoc, a disciple of Antigonus Sochoas, who was a Sadducee. The Pharisees, who professed to believe a resurrection, had very gross and carnal notions concerning the future state, which perhaps drove the Sadducees to deny the thing itself; for nothing gives greater advantage to atheism and infidelity, than the carnality of those that make religion a servant to their sensual appetites and secular interests; while those that are erroneous deny the truth, those that are superstitious betray it to them. Now they, in this objection, went on the Pharisees' hypothesis. Note, It is not strange that carnal minds have very false notions of spiritual and eternal things. The natural man receiveth not these things, for they are foolishness to Him, 1 Cor. 2: 14. Let truth be set in a clear light, and then it appears in its full strength.

III. Christ's answer to this objection. 1. He reproves their ignorance; (v. 29.) Ye do err. Note, Those do greatly err, in the judgment of Christ, who deny the resurrection and a future state. Here Christ reproves with the meekness of wisdom, and is not so sharp as sometimes He was on the chief priests and elders; Ye do err, not knowing. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error: those that are in the dark, miss their way. The patrons of error do, therefore, resist the light, and do what they can to take away the key of knowledge; Ye do err in this matter, not knowing. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error about the resurrection and the future state. What it is, the wisest and best know not; but that it is, is a thing about which we are not left in the dark; blessed be God, we are not; and those who deny it, are guilty of a willing and affected ignorance. It seems there were some such monsters, among professing Christians, some who said, There is no resurrection of the dead; (1 Cor. 15: 12.) turning it into an allegory, and saying, The resurrection is past already. Now observe, a family very likely to be built up, and yet this numerous family leaves neither son nor nephew, nor any remaining in their dwellings Job 18: 19. Well may we say then, Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. Let none be sure of the advancement and perpetuity of their names and families.

(1.) They know not the power of God; which would lead men to infer, that there may be a resurrection and a future state. Note,

(2.) The obedience of these seven brothers to the law, though they had a power of refusal under the penalty of a reproach, Deut. 25: 7. Note, Discouraging providences should not keep us from doing our duty; because we must be governed by the rule, not by the event.

But, last of all, the woman died also. Note, Survivorship is but a reprieve; they that live long, and bury their relations and neighbors one after another, do not thereby acquire an immortality. Death's bitter cup goes round, and sooner or later, we must all pledge in it, Jer. 25: 26.

3. They propose a doubt on this case; (v. 28.) In the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? You cannot tell whose; and therefore we must conclude there is no resurrection. The Pharisees, who professed to believe a resurrection, had very gross and carnal notions concerning the future state, which perhaps drove the Sadducees to deny the thing itself; for nothing gives greater advantage to atheism and infidelity, than the carnality of those that make religion a servant to their sensual appetites and secular interests; while those that are erroneous deny the truth, those that are superstitious betray it to them. Now they, in this objection, went on the Pharisees' hypothesis. Note, It is not strange that carnal minds have very false notions of spiritual and eternal things. The natural man receiveth not these things, for they are foolishness to Him, 1 Cor. 2: 14. Let truth be set in a clear light, and then it appears in its full strength.

III. Christ's answer to this objection. 1. He reproves their ignorance; (v. 29.) Ye do err. Note, Those do greatly err, in the judgment of Christ, who deny the resurrection and a future state. Here Christ reproves with the meekness of wisdom, and is not so sharp as sometimes He was on the chief priests and elders; Ye do err, not knowing. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error: those that are in the dark, miss their way. The patrons of error do, therefore, resist the light, and do what they can to take away the key of knowledge; Ye do err in this matter, not knowing. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error about the resurrection and the future state. What it is, the wisest and best know not; but that it is, is a thing about which we are not left in the dark; blessed be God, we are not; and those who deny it, are guilty of a willing and affected ignorance. It seems there were some such monsters, among professing Christians, some who said, There is no resurrection of the dead; (1 Cor. 15: 12.) turning it into an allegory, and saying, The resurrection is past already. Now observe,

(33.) Who say there is no resurrection. [Rather, no future life. The original word, when applied to the dead, properly denotes no more than a renewal of life to them, in whatever manner this may happen. Nay, that the Pharisees themselves did not universally mean, by this term, re-union of soul and body, is evident from Josephus and the gospels. To say, therefore, in English, (in giving the tenets of the Sadducees,) that they deny the resurrection, is, at least, to give a very defective account of their sentiments on this very topic. It is notorious, not only from Josephus, and other Jewish writers, but from what is said, Acts 23: 8, that they denied the existence of angels, and all separate bodies, whereas the pagans did indeed deny what Christians call the resurrection of the body, but acknowledge that the souls existed after death in a state of rewards and punishments. [The version here given makes our Lord's argument appear pertinent, and levelled against the doctrine He wished to refute.] Our Lord brings an argument to prove — that they shall be re-united, (to this it has not even the most distant relation,) but that the soul survives the body, and subsists after the body is dissolved. This many would have admitted, who denied the resurrection. Yet so evidently did it strike at the root of the scheme of the Sadducees, that they were silenced by it, and to the conviction of the hearers, confuted.' Campbell. 'After all, however, there is perhaps no sufficient reason to deviate from the common interpretation. Let us always bear in mind, that the language of Scripture is and must be, popular language; and therefore to handle it metaphysically, will be to miss its real sense. There seems little doubt but that the original expression denoted, in common acceptance, not only the resurrection of the body, but the survival of the soul, i. e. a future life. The Sadducees, in fact, held the doctrines of what is now called materialism. Throughout the whole of this narration, the original phrase translated 'resurrection of the dead,' plainly denotes the restitution of bodies, and their conjunction with souls; so that marriages, &c. might exist, as the Pharisees maintained, whose opinion it seemed to have been the especial purpose of the Sadducees to expose to derision.' BLOOMFIELD.

The opinions of the Sadducees were peculiar. They believed that besides God, there was no other spiritual being, whether good or bad. They rejected the doctrine of fate, or of an overruling Providence, and maintained that the events which happened depended on the free and unconstrained actions of men. They held that the traditions were not binding, but did not, as some suppose, receive merely the Pentateuch, and reject all the other books of the Old Testament. In the progress of time, they appear to have admitted the existence of angels, and also to have embraced the belief of the immortality of the soul; and in the eighth century, they were distinguished as a sect, merely by rejecting the authority of traditions. Whence they were at length called Caraites, a sect of comparatively recent origin, as they are not mentioned by Josephus. [But see notes v. 31, and 16: 1. Ed.] JAHN. (24.) Seed. [Deut. 25: 5. Christ rose again according to the Scriptures; (1 Cor. 15: 3.) and so shall we. Those, therefore, who deny it, either have not conversed with the Scriptures, or do not believe them, or do not take the true sense and meaning of them. Note, Ignorance of the Scripture is the rise of abundance of mischief.

2. He rectifies their mistake, v. 30. Observe,

(1.) The future state is not like the state we are now in on earth; They neither marry, nor are given in marriage. Marriage was instituted in innocence, and was never laid aside, nor will be to the end of time. In the old world, they were marrying, and giving in marriage; the Jews in Babylon, when cut off from other ordinances, yet were bid to take them wives, Jer. 29: 6. All civilized nations have had a sense of the obligation of the marriage covenant; and it is requisite for the gratifying of the desires, and recruiting the deficiencies, of the human nature. But, in the resurrection, there is no occasion for marriage; whether in glorified bodies there will be any distinction of sexes, some too curiously dispute; (the ancients are divided in their opinions about it;) where God will be All in all, there needs no other meet-help; the body will be spiritual, and there will be in it no carnal desires to be gratified: when the mystical body is completed, there will be no further occasion to seek a golly seed, which was one end of the institution of marriage, Mal. 2: 15. In heaven there will be no decay of the individuals, and therefore no eating and drinking; no decay of the species, and therefore no marrying; where there shall be no more deaths, (Rev. 21: 4.) there needs be no more births. The married state is a composition of joys and cares; those that enter on it, are taught to look upon it as subject to changes, richer and poorer, sickness and health; and therefore it is fit for this mixed, changing world; but, as in hell, where there is no joy, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride shall be heard no more at all; so in heaven, where there is all joy, and no care, or pain, or trouble, there will be no marrying. The joys of that state are pure and spiritual, and arise from the marriage of all of them to the Lamb, not of any of them to one another.

(2.) It is like the state angels are now in, in heaven; They are as the angels of God in heaven; they are so, that is, undoubtedly they shall be so. They are so already in Christ their Head, who has made them sit with Him in heavenly places, Eph. 2: 6. The spirits of just men already made perfect, are of the same corporation with the innumerable company of angels, Heb. 12: 22, 23. Man, in his creation, was made a little lower than the angels; (Ps. 8: 5.) but, in his complete redemption and renovation, will be as the angels; pure and spiritual as the angels, knowing and loving as they, ever praising God, like them and with them. The bodies of the saints shall be raised incorruptible and glorious, like the uncompounded vehicles of those pure and holy spirits, (1 Cor. 15: 42, &c.) swift and strong like them. We should therefore desire and endeavor to do the will of God now, as the angels do it in heaven because we hope shortly to be like the angels who always behold our Father's face. He saith nothing of the state of the wicked in the resurrection; but, by consequence, they shall be like the devils, whose lusts they have done.

IV. Christ's argument to confirm this great truth of the resurrection and a future state. Now observe,

1. Whence He fetched his argument—from the Scripture; that is the great magazine, or armory, whence we may be furnished with spiritual weapons, offensive and defensive. It is written, is Goliath's sword. Have ye not read that which was spoken to you by God? Note, (1.) What the Scripture speaks; God speaks. (2.) What was spoken to Moses, was spoken to us; it was spoken and written for our learning. (3.) It concerns us to read and hear what God hath spoken, because it is spoken to us. It was spoken to you Jews, in the first place, for to them were committed the oracles of God. The argument is fetched from the books of Moses, because the Sadducees received them only, as some think, or, however, them chiefly, for canonical Scriptures. The latter prophets have more express proofs of a future state than the law of Moses has; which supposes the immortality of the soul and a future state, but yet contains no express revelation of it; because much of that law was peculiar to that people, and the more express revelation of a future state was reserved for the latter days; but our Savior finds a very solid argument for the resurrection, even in the writings of Moses. Much scripture-treasures under ground, that must be digged for.

2. What his argument was, v. 32. This was not an express proof, in so many words; and yet it was really a conclusive argument. Consequences from Scripture, if rightly deduced, must be received as Scripture; for it was written for those that have the use of reason.

Now the drift of the argument is to prove,

(1.) That there is a future state, in which the righteous shall be truly and constantly happy. This is proved from what God said; I am the God of Israel.

[1.] For God to be any one's God, supposes some very extraordinary privilege and happiness; unless we know fully what God is, we cannot comprehend the riches of that word, I will be to thee a God, that is, a Benefactor like Myself. The God of Israel is a God to Israel, (1 Chron. 17: 24.) a spiritual Benefactor; for He is the Father of spirits; an all-sufficient Benefactor; a God that is enough, an eternal Benefactor; for He is Himself an everlasting God, and will be to those that are in covenant with Him an everlasting Good. This great word God had often said to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and it was intended as a recompense for their singular faith and obedience, in quitting their country at God's call. The Jews had a profound veneration for those three patriarchs, and would extend the promise God made them to the uttermost.

[2.] It is manifest that these good men had no such extraordinary happiness in this life, as might look any thing like the accomplishment of so great a word as that. They were strangers in the land of promise, wandering, pinched with famine; they had not a foot of ground of their own but a burying-place, which directed them to look for something beyond this life. In present enjoyments, they came far short of their neighbors that were strangers to this cove-

(29.) When the Pharisees asked Him respecting matters which regarded this life, Christ did not choose to concern Himself with what did not belong to Him. Now, however, when the Sadducees moved this question concerning eternal life, He felt that, having come from the bosom of his Father, to bring life and immortality to light by the Gospel, He ought no longer to be silent.

Similar to the angels, in not being subject to the appetites of the body, and in being immortal. The nature of those future bodies is described in 1 Cor. 15: 42, seq. From this comparison, therefore, if man beings restored to life, with angels, it does not follow that we shall be destitute of bodies; for what Jesus says is not to be referred to the mind.

31 But as touching the resurrection of the dead, I have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, likewise of God's relation to him as his God; but, at that time, when God spake to Moses, He was the God of Abraham, and therefore Abraham must be then alive; which proves the immortality of the soul in a state of bliss; and that, by consequence, infers the resurrection of the body; for there is such an inclination in the human soul to its body, as would make a final and eternal separation inconsistent with the bliss of those that have God for their God. The Sadducees' notion was, that the union between body and soul is so close, that, when the body dies, the soul dies with it. Now on the same hypothesis, if the soul lives, as it certainly does, the body must, some time or other, live with it. And besides, the Lord is for the body, it is an essential part of the man; there is a covenant with the dust, which will be remembered, otherwise the man would not be happy. The charge which the dying patriarchs gave concerning their bones, and that in faith, was an evidence that they had some expectation of the resurrection of their bodies. But this doctrine was reserved for a more full revelation after the resurrection of Christ, who was the first fruits of them that slept.

33 And when the multitude heard this, they were astonished at his doctrine.

Lastly, We have the issue of this dispute. The Sadducees were put to silence, (v. 34.) and so put to shame. They thought, by their subtlety, to put Christ to shame, when they were preparing shame for themselves. But the nant. If no happiness had been reserved for them on the other side death, that melancholy word of poor Jacob's, when he was old, (Gen. 47: 9.) Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, would have been an eternal reproach to the wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness of that God who had so often called Himself the God of Jacob.

[3.] Therefore there must certainly be a future state, in which, as God will ever live to be eternally rewarding, so Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will ever live to be eternally rewarded. That of the apostle, (Heb. 11: 16.) is a key to this argument; Therefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; because He has provided for them a city, a heavenly city; implying, that if He had not provided so well for them in the other world, considering how they sped in this, He would have been ashamed to have called Himself their God; but now He is not, having done that for them which answers it in its true intent and full extent.

(2.) That the soul is immortal, and the body shall rise again, to be united; if the former point be gained, these will follow; but they are likewise proved by considering the time when God spake this; it was to Moses at the bush, long after Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead and buried; and yet God saith not, 'I was; or have been; but I am, the God of Abraham. Now, God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. He is a living God, and communicates vital influence to those to whom He is a God. If, when Abraham died, there had been an end of him, there had been an end him as his God; but, at that time, when God multitude were astonished at his doctrine, v. 33. 1. Because it was new to them. See to what a sad pass the exposition of Scripture was come among them, when people were astonished at it as a miracle, to fear the fundamental promise applied to this great truth; they had sorry scribes, or this had been no news to them. 2. Because it had something in it very good and great. Truth often shows the brighter, and is the more admired, for its being opposed. Observe, Many gainsayers are silenced, and many hearers astonished, without being savingly converted; yet, even in the silence and astonishment of unsanctified souls, God magnifies his law, magnifies his Gospel, and makes both honorable.

V. 34—40. Here is a discourse which Christ had with a Pharisee lawyer, about the great commandment of the law. Observe,

I. The combination of the Pharisees against Christ, v. 34. They heard that He had put the Sadducees to silence, though their understandings were not opened; and they were gathered together, not to thank Him, as they ought to have done, but to tempt Him, in hopes to get the reputation of puzzling Him who had puzzled the Sadducees. They were more vexed that Christ was honored, than pleased that the Sadducees were silenced; being more concerned for their own tyranny and traditions, than for the doctrine of the resurrection and a future state. Note, It is an instance of Pharisaical envy and malice, to be displeased at the maintaining of a confessed truth, when it is done by those we do not like; to sacrifice a public good to private piques and prejudices. Blessed Paul was otherwise minded, Phil. 1: 13.

II. The lawyer's question, which he put to Christ. The lawyers were students and teachers of the law of Moses, as the scribes were; but some think they dealt more in practical questions than the scribes; they studied and professed casuistical divinity. This lawyer asked Him a question, tempting Him; not with any design to ensnare Him, as appears by Mark's relation of the story, where we find that this was he to whom Christ said, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, (Mark 12: 34.) but only to see what He would say, and to draw on discourse with Him, to satisfy his own and his friends' curiosity.

1. The question was 'Laster which is the great commandment of the law?' A needless question, when all the things of God's law are

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23—33. Those who are most proud of their reasoning powers, and most disposed to boast of them, often form the grossest conceptions of spiritual things; so that they are commonly fighting with shadows, when they start objections to the doctrines of the Gospel. If they understood the plain meaning of the Scriptures, or had any proper ideas of the divine power, they must be convinced of the futility of their own arguments; which seldom need any other answer, than a fair statement of the truths which they oppose. Indeed all our errors result from 'not knowing the Scriptures and the power of God'; and this should excite us to redouble our diligence in searching the sacred oracles, and our earnestness in prayer to be led into a right understanding of them.—We are continually reminded what a dying world this is. The history of men in general resembles the account here given of one family: death removes one after another, and so terminates all their carnal hopes, joys, cares, sorrows, and connections. (P. O. Gen. 5.) How wretched then must they be, who have all 'their good things' here, and can expect nothing but misery beyond the grave! And how grovelling the soul of an infidel, who can be content, and even hope, to die like a beast, for the sake of living 'without God in the world!' Yet, even of this forlorn hope, he will most certainly be disappointed.—The whole Scripture 'warns us to flee from the wrath to come,' and calls us to expect a far better and happier state; and the thoughts of that felicity will be the more welcome to the spiritual man, (however comfortable in his relative connections,) from the consideration, that there will be 'neither marrying nor giving in marriage.' For he aspires to a higher state of existence, and emulates the worship, the holiness, and the blessedness of angels; compared with which, the most rational and honorable of earthly comforts are mean and of no estimation. In that happy world, the God of Abraham will be the portion of all his believing children; and they will, in body and soul, live to Him and with Him, and have the unalloyed fruition of that 'fulness of joy which is at his right hand forevermore.'

SCOTT.

(31.) 'The Sadducees are thought by many to have agreed with the Samaritans in rejecting all the other parts of holy Scripture but the five books of Moses, which is particularly contended for by Serrarius; but this is questioned by Drusius and Reland, and Scaliger maintains the contrary, and shows that the passage from Josephus, which is commonly alleged in defence of that opinion, only relates to their rejecting all traditions. And, indeed, as it appears from the Talmud that other parts of the Old Testament were often quoted by the Sadducees, and arguments were brought from thence against them by the Pharisees to prove the resurrection, which they endeavored only to evade, without disputing the authority of the texts, though they were not taken from the law of Moses, it is more reasonable to believe, with Dr. Lightfoot, that they did not reject the other books of the Old Testament, but only gave a preference to the five books of Moses; and, laying it down as a principle, to receive nothing as an article of faith which could not be proved from the law. If any thing was urged from other parts of Scripture that could not be deduced from Moses, they would explain it in some other way. And this might be sufficient to induce our Lord to bring his argument to prove the resurrection from what Moses had said, and to confirm it by that part of Scripture which was most regarded by the Sadducees, and upon which they grounded their objections to it.'

DODDIDGE.

'Our Lord, by confuting them from these books, proved the second part of his assertion, 'Ye are ignorant of these very Scriptures, which ye profess to hold sacred.''

DR. A. CLARKE.

(32.) 'The manner of argumentation, pursued by Jesus, is quite agreeable to the usual method of the Jewish doctors, who used slightly to allude to passages of Scriptures, and left their auditor to find the consequence of any proposition, omitting in argumentation the transitions and conclusions, the use and applications.'

KUINOEL, in BLOOMFIELD.

(33.) 'The multitude were astonished.' 'God uses the infidelity of some for the edification of others. Had no false doctrine been broached in the world, we had not seen the full evidence of the true teaching. The opposition of deists and infidels has only served to raise up men in behalf of the truth of God, who not only have refuted them, but shown at the same time, that the sacred testimonies are infinitely amiable to themselves, and worthy of all acceptance. Truth always gains by being opposed.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

35 Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, and saying, 36 Master, which is the great commandment in the law?

37 Jesus said unto him, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

38 This is the first and great commandment.

39 And the second is like unto it, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

40 On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

begins in the affections, and nothing in religion is done right, that is not done there first. Love is the leading affection, and therefore to be first secured and garrisoned for. Man is a creature cut out for love; thus then is the law written in the heart, that it is a law of love. Love is a short and sweet word; and if that be the fulfilling of the law, surely the yoke of the command is very easy. Love is the rest and satisfaction of the soul; if we walk in this good old way, we shall find rest.

(2.) The love of God is the first and great commandment of all, the summary of all the commands of the first table. The proper act of love being complacency, good is the proper object of it. Now God, being good infinitely, originally and eternally, is to be loved in the first place, and nothing loved beside Him, but what is loved for Him. Love is the first and great thing that God demands from us, and therefore the first and great thing that we should devote to Him. Now here we are directed,

[1.] To love God as ours; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God as thine. The first commandment is, Thou shalt have no other god; which implies, that we must have Him for our God, and that will engage our love to Him. Those that made the sun and moon their gods, loved them, Jer. 8:2. Judges 18:24. To love God as ours, is to love Him because He is ours, our Creator, Owner, and Ruler, and to conduct ourselves to Him as ours, with obedience to Him, and dependence on Him. We must love God as reconciled to us; and made ours by covenant; that is the foundation of this, Thy God.

Verse 35.

One of them which was a lawyer.] 'Lawyers and scribes appear to be synonymous terms, importing one and the same order of men. Compare Mark 12:28. Dr. Macknight conjectures the scribes to have been the public expounders of the law, and that the lawyers studied in private; perhaps, as Dr. Lardner supposes, they taught in the schools.'

HORNE.

'It seems very probable to me that the discourse here, and that in Mark 12:28-34 are not of the same individual. The lawyer here was from among the Pharisees, who came to Jesus for the purpose of ensnaring Him. But the scribe in Mark came of his own accord, after Jesus' dispute with the Sadducees, and therefore with upright intentions, knowing that He had answered the Sadducees well.'

ROSENEM.

'It seems to have been a maxim among the scribes and Pharisees, that such a multitude of precepts as the law contained, was too great for any one to observe; and therefore all that could be required was, that each should select to himself one or two great and important duties, on account of which, if invariably observed, his transgressions in other respects would be overlooked.'

PORREUS.

Which is the great commandment, &c.] 'This was a point that was often disputed by the Jewish doctors; some contending for the law of circumcision, others for that of sacrifices, and others for that of the phylacteries. Christ quotes in answer a passage written in those very phylacteries.'

DODDRIDGE.

Verse 37.

The quotation of this first and great commandment varies considerably from the Septuagint in words, but accords in meaning with [29] great things, (Hos. 8:12.) and the wisdom from above, (Mal. 2:9.) hath respect to them all. Yet, it is true, there are some commands more extensive and inclusive than others. Our Savior speaks of the weightier matters of the law, ch. 23:23.

2. The design was to try, not so much his knowledge as his judgment. It was a question disputed among the critics in the law. Some would have the law of circumcision to be the great commandment; others, the law of the Sabbath, others the law of sacrifices; now they would try what Christ said to this question, hoping to incense the people against Him, if He should not answer according to the vulgar opinion; and if He should magnify one commandment, they would reflect on Him as vilifying the rest. The question was harmless enough, and it appears by comparing Luke 10:27, 28, that it was an adjudged point among the lawyers, that the love of God and our neighbor is the great commandment, and the sum of all the rest, and Christ had there approved it; so that the putting of it to Him, here, seems rather a scornful design to catechize Him as a child, than a spiteful design to dispute with Him as an adversary.

III. Christ's answer to this question. It is no disparagement to great men to answer plain questions. Observe,

1. Which these great commandments are; (p. 37-39.) not the judicial laws, those could not be the greatest, now that the people of the Jews, to whom they pertained, were so little; not the ceremonial laws, those could not be the greatest, now that they were waxen old, and were ready to vanish away; nor any particular moral precept; but the love of God and our neighbor, the spring and foundation of all the rest, which (these being supposed) will follow of course.

(1.) All the law is fulfilled in one word, and that is love. See Rom. 13:10. All obedience

[2.] To love Him with all our heart, and soul, and mind. Some make these to signify one and the same thing, to love Him with all our powers; others distinguish them; the heart, soul, and mind, are the will, affections, and understanding; or the vital, sensitive, and intellectual faculties. Our love of God must be sincere, not in word and tongue only, as theirs is, who say they love Him, but their hearts are not with Him. It must be a strong love, more in the most intense degree; as we must prize Him, so we must love Him, with all that is within us, Ps. 103:1. It must be a singular and superlative love; we must love Him more than anything else; this way the stream of our affections must entirely run. The heart must be united to love God, in opposition to a divided heart. All our love is too little to bestow on Him, and therefore all the powers of the soul must be engaged for Him, and carried out toward Him. This is the first and great commandment; for obedience to this, is the spring of obedience to all the rest; which is then only acceptable, when it flows from love.

(3.) To love our neighbor as ourselves, is the second great commandment; p. 39. It is like unto that first, inclusive of all the precepts of the second table, as that is of the first. It is like it, for it is founded on it, and flows from it; and a right love to our brother, whom we have seen, is both an instance and an evidence of our love to God, whom we have not seen, 1 John 4:20.

[1.] It is implied that we do, and should, love ourselves. There is a self-love which is corrupt, and the root of the greatest sins, and it must be put off and mortified; but there is a self-love which is natural, and the rule of the greatest duty, and it must be preserved and sanctified. We must love ourselves, that is, have a due regard to the dignity of our own natures, and a due concern for the welfare of our own souls and bodies.

[2.] It is prescribed, that we love our neighbor as ourselves. We must honor and esteem all men, and wrong and injure none; must have a good will to all, and good wishes for all, and, as we have opportunity, do good to all. We must love our neighbor as ourselves, as truly and sincerely and in the same instances; nay, in many cases we must deny ourselves for the good of our neighbor, make ourselves servants to the true welfare of others, and be willing to spend and be spent for them, to lay down our lives for the brethren.

2. Observe what the weight and greatness of these commandments is; p. 40. This is the sum and substance of all those precepts relating to practical religion, which were written in men's hearts by nature, revived by Moses, and enforced by the prophets. All hang on the law of love; take away this, and all falls to the ground, and comes to nothing. Rituals and ceremonies must give way to these, as must all spiritual gifts, for love is the more excellent way. This is the spirit of the law, which animates it, the cement of the law, which joins it; it is the root it; as it does with the original Hebrew. Indeed, as the passage is found but once in the Old Testament, and is referred to repeatedly in the New, with variation in words, but not in meaning, it is most manifest that no quotation was intended. The Septuagint seems to be a more literal translation of the Hebrew, than any of those found in the New Testament.

The law, duly interpreted, required this love of God and man; the prophets enforced the law, and foretold 'Christ, as the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth: and the whole of revelation is intended to bring fallen sinners, by regeneration, repentance, and faith in the Savior, to love God supremely, and man unfeignedly and fervently on earth, and perfectly forever in heaven. The whole system of revelation will generally be comprehended, in proportion as these two commandments are understood: perhaps every error in religion may well be said to depend on them. (Marg. PALEY.

If Jesse had lived till David was established in the kingdom, David might, in some good sense, have been called Jesse's lord, though Jesse's son: but could David, with any propriety, be called the lord of Boaz, Judah, Abraham, Noah, and Adam, his progenitors? Yet this would be quite as reasonable, as to call the Messiah David's Lord, if He had no existence till a thousand years after David's death; and who, even if existing at that time, could be called David's lord, at the summit of his exaltation, as the Lord's anointed king of Israel, except the Lord of all? The modern Jews, unable to answer this argument, affirm that David did not write Psalm 110: but those to whom Jesus spoke did not attempt such an evasion, or they would not have been silent. This question, which is equally interesting to modern Socinians, the Pharisees could not answer; and they were so baffled in their endeavors to entangle Jesus, that they never after dared to put another question to Him. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Nor can any man solve the difficulty proposed, in a satisfactory manner, except he allow the Messiah to be truly and properly 'the Son of God'; and, equally with the Father, 'David's Lord' at the time when his progenitor thus spake of Him; and that the Lord's anointed king of Israel, except the Lord of all, and the Son of God, manifested 'in the flesh'; and in this sense 'the Son of man,' and 'the Son of David.' To this the Old Testament had given abundant testimony: but the Pharisees, blinded by carnal prejudices, overlooked all that had been said of Immanuel, and of 'the mighty God' becoming 'a Child born,' and expected a mere man and a temporal deliverer, instead of a divine and spiritual Redeemer. (Marg. Ref.—See also Mark 12:35-37. Luke 20:41-44.)

SCOTT.

(41.) 'Jesus asks this question to show the people, that the source of all the captious questions of his opponents, was their ignorance of the prophecies relative to the Messiah.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(42.) 'The Son of David.' This was a thing well known among the Jews, and universally acknowledged: (see John 7:42.) and is a most powerful proof against them that the Messiah is come. Their families are now so perfectly confounded, that they cannot trace back any of and spring of all other duties, the compendium of the whole Bible, not only of the law and the prophets, but of the Gospel too, only supposing this love to be the fruit of faith, and that we love God in Christ, and our neighbor for his sake. All hangs on these two commandments, as the effect doth both on its efficient and on its final cause; for the fulfilling of the law is love, (Rom. 13:10.) and the end of the law is love, 1 Tim. 1:5. The law of love is the nail in the sure place, fastened by the masters of assemblies, (Eccl. 12:11.) on which is hung all the glory of the law and the prophets, (Isa. 22:24.) a nail that shall never be drawn; for on this nail 'all the glory of the new Jerusalem shall eternally hang. Love never faileth.' Into these two great commandments, therefore, let our hearts be delivered as into a mould; in the defence and evidence of these, let us spend our zeal, and not in notions, names, and strifes of words, as if those were the mighty things on which the law and the prophets hung, and to them the love of God and our neighbor must be sacrificed; but to the commanding power of these, let every thing else be made to bow.

Christ to the Pharisees, when together, v. 41. He did not take some one of them apart from the rest; but, to shame them the more, He took them all together, when they were in confederacy and consult against Him. Note, God baffles his enemies when they most strengthen themselves; Associate yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces, Isa. 3:9, 10. Now here,

I. Christ proposes a question to them, which they could easily answer; v. 42. 'Whose son do you expect the Messiah to be?' To this they could readily reply, The Son of David. It was the common periphrasis of the Messiah; they called Him the Son of David. So the scribes, who expounded the Scripture, had taught them, from Ps. 89:35, 36, 'I will not lie unto David; his seed shall endure forever, (Isa. 9:7.) upon the throne of David. And Isa. 11:1. A rod out of the stem of Jesse. The covenant of royalty made with David, was a figure of the covenant of redemption made with Christ, who, as David, was made King with an oath, and was first humbled and then advanced. If Christ was the Son of David, He was really and truly man. Israel said, We have ten parts in David; and Judah said, He is our bone and our flesh; what part have we then in the Son of David, who took our nature upon Him?

What think ye of Christ? They had put questions to Him out of the law; but his question to them is on the promise. Many are so full of the law, that they forget Christ, as if their duties would save them without his merit and grace. It concerns each of us seriously to ask ourselves, What think we of Christ? Some think not of Him at all, He is not in all, not in any of their thoughts; some think meanly, and some think hardly, of Him; but, to them that believe—He is precious; and how precious then are the thoughts of Him! While the daughters of Jerusalem think no more of Christ than of another beloved, the spouse thinks of Him as the Chief of ten thousands.

II. He starts a difficulty on their answer which they could not easily solve, v. 43-45. Many think they have knowledge enough to be proud of, who show they have ignorance enough to be ashamed of. The objection Christ raised was, If Christ be David's son, how then doth David, in spirit, call Him Lord? He did not thereby design to ensnare them, as they did Him, but to instruct them in a truth they were loath to believe—that the expected Messiah is God.

1. It is easy to see that David calls Christ Lord, and this, being divinely inspired, for it was the Spirit of the Lord that spake by him, 2 Sam. 23:1, 2. David was one of those holy men that spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, especially in calling Christ Lord; for it was then, as it is still, (1 Cor. 12:3.) no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now, to prove that David, in spirit, called Christ Lord, He quotes Ps. 110:1, which psalm the scribes themselves understood of Christ; of Him it is certain, the prophet there speaks, and of no other man; and it is a prophetic summary of the doctrine of Christ; it describes Him executing the offices of a Prophet, Priest, and King, both in his humiliation and also in his exaltation.

Christ quotes the whole verse, which shows the Redeemer in his exaltation; (1.) Sitting at the right hand of God. His sitting denotes both rest and rule; his sitting at God's right hand, superlative honor and sovereign power.

their genealogies with any degree of certainty, nor have they been capable of ascertaining the different families of their tribes, for more than sixteen hundred years. Why then should the Spirit of prophecy assert so often, and in such express terms, that Jesus was to come from the family of David, if He should only make his appearance when the public registers were all demolished, and it would be impossible to ascertain the family? Is it not evident that God designed, that the Messiah should come at a time when the public genealogies might be expected, to prove that it was He who was prophesied of, and that no other was to be expected? The evangelists Matthew and Luke were so fully convinced of the conclusiveness of this proof, that they had recourse to the public registers; and thus proved to the Jews, from their own records, that Jesus was born of the family mentioned by the prophets. Nor do we find that a scribe, Pharisee, or any other, ever attempted to invalidate this proof, though it would have essentially subverted their cause, could they have done it. But as this has not been done, we may fairly conclude it was impossible to do it.

(43.) How then does David in the Spirit. This, by the Holy Spirit. Our Lord, we see, always takes it for granted in his arguments with the Jews, that the writers of the Old Testament were under such an extraordinary guidance of the Holy Spirit, as to express themselves with the strictest propriety on all occasions. Compare John 10:33. And I look on this as no contemptible argument for the inspiration of the New Testament: for we can never think the apostles of Christ to have been less assisted by the Divine Spirit in their writings, when they were in other respects so much more endowed with it.

Jesus exhorts the people to regard the scriptural instructions of the Scribes and Pharisees; but not to follow their bad example, and especially not to imitate their ambition, 1-12. He denounces divers woes on them, for their blindness, hypocrisy, and iniquity, 13-36. He predicts the destruction of Jerusalem, and the calamities of the Jews for their atrocious crimes, 37-39.

THEN spake Jesus to the multitude, and to his disciples, calls the Messiah his Lord; The Lord, Jehovah, said unto my Lord. This intimates that, in expounding Scripture, we must notice, not only the main scope and sense of a verse, but the words and phrases, by which the Spirit chooses to express that sense, which have often a very useful and instructive significance. Here is a good note from that word, My Lord.

2. It is not so easy for those who believe not the Godhead of the Messiah, to clear this from an absurdity, if Christ be David's Son. It is incongruous for the father to speak of his son, the predecessor of his successor, as his Lord. If David call him Lord, that is laid down, (p. 45.) as the more evident truth; for whatever is said of Christ's humanity and humiliation, must be construed and understood in consistency with the truth of his divine nature and dominion. We must hold this fast, that He is David's Lord, and by that explain his being David's Son. The seeming differences of Scripture, as here, may not only be accommodated, but contribute to the beauty and harmony of the whole. The differences observable in the Scriptures are of a friendly kind; would to God that our differences were of the same kind!

III. We have here the success of this gentle trial which Christ made of the Pharisees' knowledge, in two things.

1. It puzzled them; v. 46. Either it was their ignorance, that they did not know, or their impety that they would not own, the Messiah to be God; which truth was the only key to unlock this difficulty. What those rabbies could not then answer, blessed be God, the plainest Christian can now account for; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord; and Christ, as man, was David's Son. This He did not now Himself explain, but reserved it till the proof of it was completed by his resurrection: but we have it fully explained by Him in his glory; (Rev. 22: 16.) I am the root and offspring of David. Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring. If we hold not fast this truth, that Jesus Christ is over all, God blessed forever, we run ourselves into inextricable difficulties. And well might David, his remote ancestor, call Him Lord, when Mary, his immediate mother, after she had conceived Him, called Him Lord, and God, her Savior, Luke 1: 46, 47.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 34-46. While Pharisees, Sadducees, and scribes are perplexing each other, and trying to disconcert us, by curious questions and frivolous disputes, let us remember that the love of God with all our heart, and the love of our neighbor as ourselves, though the ministration of condemnation to the sinner, is our perfect rule of obedience; and that 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, to every one that believeth.' It behoves us, sinners, therefore, above all things, to inquire seriously, what we think of Christ. What are our views of his person, his priesthood, his atonement, his intercession, his power, truth, and love? Is He altogether glorious in our eyes, and precious to our hearts? Do we trust in Him as the incarnate Son of God, and submit to Him as the anointed King of Israel? Do we seek Him in all his characters and offices? Do we desire that 'all his enemies should be put under his feet,' without excepting any of our own sinful passions? Do we deem Him entitled to all the service and honor which we can possibly render Him, and far more? According to a man's practical judgment in these matters, are his state and character; and his conduct will eventually prove this. His judgment of the perfections, law, and government of God, of sin and holiness, of this world and the next, of himself, his life past, and present, and of his heart, in short, of every object around him, will be influenced by his view of this subject. The temper of his mind will be humble, meek, patient, compassionate, thankful, spiritual, or the contrary, according to his thoughts of Christ, and his whole conduct will be habitually influenced by it. May Christ then be our Joy, our Confidence, our All; may we daily see more of his glory and preciousness, and experience more of his love; and may we daily be more conformed to his image, and devoted to his service. Then our words and works will confute and shame those who would falsely accuse us, and effectually silence the malicious objections and subtle insinuations of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, however distinguished. SCOTT.

called David's Lord, any more than Julius Cæsar could have been called the lord of Romulus, because he reigned in Rome seven hundred years after his death, and vastly extended the bounds of that empire which Romulus founded.

(46.) We see here three kinds of enemies and false accusers of Christ and his disciples; and three sorts of accusations brought against them. 1. The Herodians, or politicians and courtiers, who form their questions and accusations on the rights of the prince, and matters of state, v. 16. 2. The Sadducees, or libertines, who found their upon matters of religion and articles of faith, which they did not credit, v. 23. 3. The Pharisees, lawyers, scribes or Karaites, hypocritical pretenders to devotion, who found theirs on that vital and practical godliness, (the love of God and man) of which they wished themselves to be thought the sole proprietors, v. 36.

Thus our Lord put the four great seats of the Jews to silence in one day, successively. The Herodians and Pharisees wanted to know whether they might lawfully pay tribute to Cæsar or not. The Sadducees were inquisitive to know whose wife the woman should be of the seven brethren, in the resurrection, who had her to wife. Then comes the scribe, (or Karaites), who owned no authority beyond or besides the written law and asked which was the great commandment in the law. This lawyer deserves to be mentioned here, because he not only acquiesced in, but commended what our Lord had said in answer to his ques-

Wotton, in CLARKE

2. It silenced them, and all others that sough occasion against Him. Note, God will glorify Himself in silencing many, whom He will not glorify Himself in saving. Many are convinced, that are not converted, by the Word. Had these been converted, they would have asked Him more questions, especially that great question, What must we do to be saved? But, since they could not gain their point, they would have no more to do with Him. But thus all that strive with their Master shall be convinced, as these Pharisees and lawyers here were, of the inequality of the match.

CHAP. XXIII. v. 1-12. In the foregoing chapter, we had our Savior's discourses with the scribes and Pharisees. Here we have his discourse concerning them, or rather against them.

We no where find Christ so severe on any sort of people, as on the scribes and Pharisees; who, though made up of pride, worldliness and tyranny, under a cloak and pretence of religion, were yet the idols and darlings of the people, who thought, if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee. Now Christ directs his discourse, here, to the multitude and to his disciples, (v. 1.) to rectify their mistakes concerning these men, and so to take off the prejudice which some of the multitude had conceived against Him and his doctrine, because it was opposed by those men of their church, who called themselves the people's guides. Note, It is good to know the true characters of men, that we may not be imposed upon by great names, titles and pretensions. People must be told of the wolves, (Acts 20: 29, 30.) the dogs, (Phil. 3: 3.) the deceitful workers, (2 Cor. 11: 13.) that they may know where to stand on their guard. And not only the mixed multitude, but even the disciples need these cautions; for good men are apt to have their eyes dazzled with worldly pomp.

Now, in this discourse,

I. Christ allows their office as expositors of the law; The scribes and Pharisees, (that is, the whole sanhedrim, called scribes, and some of whom were Pharisees,) they sit in Moses' seat; (v. 2.) the law of Moses being the muni-

'Thus did the wisdom of God triumph over the cunning of men. From this time we do not find that our Lord was any more troubled with their captious questions: their whole stock, it appears, was expended, and now they coolly deliberate on the most effectual way to get Him murdered. He that resists the truth of God, is capable of effecting the worst purpose of Satan.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. v. 1-4. It is probable, that our Lord continued still at the temple, and addressed Himself to the disciples and the multitude, in the presence of 'the scribes and Pharisees.' They 'sat in Moses' seat,' for they explained the law of Moses, and enforced obedience to it. Whatever therefore, from this source, they inculcated, the people ought to attend to and practise. This limitation must be admitted; otherwise their traditions and perversions of the law, and even their opposition to Christ, would have been included; for they taught these to the people. He evidently meant, that whatever they enforced or required, according to the law of Moses, or the writings of the prophets, was to be obeyed. No argument can fairly be formed on this, to prove that men are obliged to follow the instructions, or obey the commands, of any teachers or rulers, further than they consist with the Word of God: (See 15: 1-14. 16: 5-12.) yet, on the other hand the bad character of rulers and teachers should not induce men to disobey their lawful commands, or to reject their scriptural instructions. SCOTT.

2 Saying, 'The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat:

3 All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; ' for they say, and do not.

4 For ' they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers.

not therefore pull down Moses' seat, because scribes and Pharisees have got possession of it; rather than so, let both grow together until the harvest, ch. 13:30.

Hence He infers, (v. 3.) Whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do. The scribes and Pharisees made it their business to study the Scripture, and were well acquainted with the language, history, and customs of it, and its style and phraseology. Now Christ would have the people to make use of the helps they gave them for the understanding of the Scripture, and do accordingly. As long as their comments did illustrate the text, and not pervert it; did make plain, and not make void the commandment of God; so far they must be observed and obeyed, but with caution, and a judgment of discretion. Note, We must not think the worse of good truths for their being preached by bad ministers; nor of good laws for their being executed by bad magistrates. Though it is most desirable to have our food brought by angels, yet, if God sends it us by ravens, if it be good and wholesome, we must take it, and thank God for it. Our Lord Jesus premiseth this, to prevent the cavil which some would be apt to make at his following discourse; as if, by condemning the scribes and Pharisees, He designed to bring the law of Moses into contempt, and to draw people off from it; whereas He came not to destroy, but to fulfil. Note, It is wisdom to obviate the exceptions which may be taken at just reports, especially when there is occasion to distinguish between officers and their offices, that the ministry be not blamed, when the ministers are.

II. He condemns the men. He had ordered the multitude to do as they taught, but here He annexeth a caution to beware of their leave; Do not ye after their works. Their traditions were their works, their idols, the works of their fancy. Or, 'Do not according to their example.' Doctrines and practices are spirits that must be tried, and, where there is occasion, carefully separated and distinguished; and, as we must not swallow corrupt doctrines for the sake of any laudable practices of those that teach them, so we must not imitate any bad examples for the sake of the plausible doctrines of those that give them. The scribes and Pharisees boasted as much of the goodness of their works, as of the orthodoxy of their teaching, and hoped to be justified by them; (Luke 18:11, 12.) and yet these things which they valued themselves so much upon, were an abomination in the sight of God.

Our Savior specifies particulars wherein we must not imitate them. In general, they are charged with hypocrisy, dissimulation, or double dealing, in religion; a crime which can be judged of by God only, who searcheth the heart; though nothing is more displeasing to Him, for He desireth truth.

Four things are here charged on them.

1. Their saying and doing were two things.

They teach out of the law that which is good, but their conversation gives them the lie; and they seem to have found another way to heaven for themselves than what they show to others. See this illustrated and charged on them, Rom. 2:17-24. Those are of all sinners most inexcusable, that allow themselves in the sins they condemn in others, or in worse. This especially touches wicked ministers, who will be sure to have their portion appointed them with hypocrites; (ch. 24:51.) for what greater hypocrisy can there be, than to press that on others to be believed and done, which they themselves disbelieve and disobey; pulling down in their practice, what they build up in their preaching; when in the pulpit, preaching so well, that it is pity they should ever come out; but when out, living so ill, that it is pity they should ever come in; like bells, that call others to church, but hang out of themselves; or guide posts, that point the way to others, but stand still themselves. Such will be judged out of their own mouths.

It is applicable to all others that say, and do not; that make a plausible profession of religion, but do not live up to that profession; that make fair promises, but do not perform the promises; are full of good discourse, but empty of good works; great talkers, but little doers. Jacob's voice, but Esau's hands—mere sound. They speak fair, I go, sir; but there is no trusting them, for there are seven abominations in the heart.

2. They were very severe in what they imposed on others, (v. 4.) not only insisting on the minute circumstances of the law, which is called a yoke, (Acts 15:10.) and pressing the observation of them with more strictness and severity than God Himself did, but by adding to his words, and imposing their own inventions and traditions, under the highest penalties. They loved to show their authority, and say to men's souls, Now down, that we may go over; witness their many additions to the law of the fourth commandment, by which they made the Sabbath a burden on men's shoulders, though designed to be the joy of their hearts. Thus, with force and cruelty, did those shepherds rule the flock, as of old. Ezek. 34:4.

But see their hypocrisy; v. 4. (1.) They pressed on the people a strictness in religion, which they themselves would not be bound by; secretly transgressing their own traditions which they publicly enforced: popish priests, that fast with wine and sweetmeats, while they force the people to fast with bread and water, and decline the penances they enjoin the laity. (2.) They would not ease the people in these things, nor put a finger to lighten their burthen, when they saw it pinched them. They could find out loose constructions to put upon God's law, and dispense with that, but would not bate any thing of their own impositions, nor dispense with a failure in the least punctilio of them. How contrary to this was the practice of Christ's apostles, who would allow to others that use of Christian liberty, which, for the peace and edification of the church, they would deny themselves! They would lay no other burden (than necessary things, and those easy, Acts 15:23.) How carefully doth Paul spare those to whom he writes! 1 Cor. 7:28. 9:12.

3. They were all for show, and nothing for substance, in religion; v. 5. We must do such good works, that they who see them may glorify God; but we must not proclaim our good works with design that others may see them, and glorify us; which our Savior here chargeth on the Pharisees. All their end was to be praised of men, and therefore all their endeavor was to be seen of men, to make a fair show in the flesh. In those duties of religion which fall under the eye of men, none were so constant and abundant as they; but in what lies between God and their souls in retirement, they desire to be excused. The form of godliness will get them a name to live, and therefore they trouble themselves with the power of it. He that doth all to be seen, doth nothing to the purpose.

He specifies two things which they did to be seen of men. (1.) They made 'read their phylacteries. These were little scrolls of paper or parchment, wherein were written, with great care, these four paragraphs of the law, Exod. 13:2-11

(2.) Scribes.] The word scribe in general signifies any one conversant about books and writings; and is sometimes put for a civil officer, whose business probably resembled that of a secretary of state: 2 Sam. 8:17. 1 Kings 4:3. 2 Kings 19:2.) [and secretary of war, 2 Kings 25:19. Is. 33:18 Jennings.] at other times it is used at large for a man of learning and ability, [as sage, Sauve, 1 Chron. 27:22. Jer. 36:26. Ezra 7:6. Matt. 23:34. 1 Cor. 1:20. But as biblical learning was most esteemed among the Jews, the word in the N. T. seems to be chiefly appropriated to those that applied themselves to the study of the law; perhaps including those whose business it was to transcribe it. [Some of these were probably under-secretaries and clerks to the principal scribes, or even common scribes. Jennings.] Of these the public professors, who read lectures upon the law, were called doctors or lawyers; and, probably, they who were invested with some public offices in the sanhedrim or other courts, scribes of the people. Matt. 2:4. But that the scribes were Karaites or exarites, who rejected those traditions which the Pharisees inculcated, seems from this text especially, utterly improbable. (The Karaites Jews call the rabbinical Jews "bridled asses," says Calmet, because they wear the tephillin. Note, v. 5.) Our Lord commonly joins them with the Pharisees, and probably most of them were of that sect. Jennings

5 But 'all their works they do for to be seen of men: & they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments,

6 And love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, ears, or fringes, on their garments, (Num. 15:38.) to distinguish them from other nations, and to be a memorandum to them of their being a peculiar people; the Pharisees were not content to have these borders like other people's, but they must be larger than ordinary, as if they were more religious than others. Those who thus enlarge their phylacteries, and the borders of their garments, while their hearts are straitened, and destitute of the love of God and their neighbor, though they may now deceive others, will in the end deceive themselves.

4. They much affected pre-eminence and superiority, and prided themselves extremely in it. Pride was the darling, reigning sin of the Pharisees, the sin that did most easily beset them, and which our Lord Jesus takes all occasions to witness against.

(1.) He describes their pride, v. 6, 7. They courted and coveted,

(1.) Places of honor and respect. In all public appearances, they expected, and had, to their hearts' delight, the uppermost rooms, and the chief seats. They took place of all others, and precedence was adjudged to them, as persons of the greatest note and merit; and it is easy to imagine what a complacency they took in it: they loved to have the pre-eminence, 3 John 9. It is not possessing the uppermost rooms, nor sitting in the chief seats, that is condemned, (somebody must sit uppermost,) but loving them; for men to value such a little piece of ceremony as sitting highest, going first, taking the wall, or the better hand, and to value themselves on it, to seek it, and to feel resentment if they have it not; what is that but making an idol of ourselves, and then falling down and worshipping it?—the worst kind of idolatry! It is bad any where, but especially in the synagogues. There to seek honor to ourselves, where we appear in order to give glory to God, and to humble ourselves before Him, is indeed to mock God, instead of serving Him. David would willingly lie at the threshold in God's house; so far was he from coveting the chief seat there, Ps. 84:10. It savors much of pride and hypocrisy, when people do not care for going to church, unless they can look fine, and make a figure there.

Verse 5.

[Phylacteries.] Or, 'preservatives,' being superstitiously considered as amulets, to protect from dangers. SCOTT. 'They were prepared with a great multitude of ceremonies to be used specially in their prayers.' HAMMOND. 'An original phylactery,' says Dr. A. Clarke, 'was now before me. It is a piece of fine vellum, about eighteen inches long, and an inch and a quarter broad. It is divided into four unequal compartments: in the first is written the first ten verses of Ex. 13; in the second, from the eleventh to the sixteenth verse inclusive; in the third, from the fourth to the ninth verse, inclusive, of Deut. 6, beginning, Hear, O Israel, &c.; in the fourth, from the thirteenth to the twenty-first verse, inclusive, of Deut. 11.' 'Thoses for the arms were two rolls of parchment (written in square letters) rolled up to a point, and inclosed in a case of black calf-skin. They then were put upon a square bit of the same leather, but something stiffer, whence hung a thong of the same, of about a finger's breadth, and a cubit and a half long. These rolls were placed at the bending of the left arm, and after the thong had made a little knot in the form of the letter yodh, it was wound about the arm, in a spiral line, which ended at the top of the middle finger. This was called the Teffila of the hand.

The Teffila of the hand was formed of four pieces of parchment tanned together, and a square formed of them, on which a Hebrew letter yodh, is written: then a little square of hard calf-skin is put at the top this square is placed on the middle of the forehead, and the strings

Exod. 13:11-16. Deut. 6:4-9. Deut. 11:13-21. These were sewn up in leather, and worn on their foreheads and left arms. It was a tradition of the elders, which had reference to Exod. 13:9. and Prov. 7:3. where the expressions seem to be figurative, intimating no more than that we should bear the things of God in our minds as carefully, as if we had them bound between our eyes. Now the Pharisees made broad these phylacteries, that they might be thought more holy, and strict, and zealous for the law, than others. It is a gracious ambition, to covet to be really more holy than others, but it is a proud ambition to covet to appear so. It is good to excel in real piety, but not to exceed in outward shows; for overdoing is justly suspected of design, Prov. 27:14. It is the guise of hypocrisy, to make more ado than needs in external services, more than is needful either to prove, or to improve, the good affections and dispositions of the soul.

[2.] Titles of honor and respect. They loved greetings in the markets, love to have people put off their hats to them, and show them respect when they met them in the streets. Oh how it pleased them, and fed their vain humors to be pointed out, and to have it said, This is he, to have way made for them in the crowd of market-people. 'Stand off, here is a Pharisee coming!' and to be complimented with the high and pompous title of Rabbi, Rabbi! They took as great a satisfaction in it as Nebuchadnezzar did in his palace, when he said, Is not this great Babylon that I have built? The greetings would not have done them half so much good, if they had not been in the markets, where every body might see how much they were respected, and how high they stood in the opinion of the people. It was but a little before Christ's time, that the Jewish teachers, the masters of Israel, had assumed the titles of Rabbi, Rab and Rabban, which signifies great, or much; and was construed as Doctor, or My lord. And they laid such a stress on it, that they gave it for a maxim, that 'he who salutes his teacher, and does not call him Rabbi, provokes the Divine Majesty to depart from Israel.' So much religion did they place in that which was but a piece of good manners! For him that is taught in the Word, to give respect to him that teaches, is commendable enough in him that it gives it; but for him that teaches, to love it, and demand it, and affect it, to be puffed up with it, and to be displeased if it be omitted, is sinful and abominable; and, instead of teaching, he has need to learn the first lesson in the school of Christ, which is, humility.

(2.) He cautions his disciples against being herein like them; herein they must not do after their works; 'But be not ye called so, for ye shall not be of such a spirit,' v. 8, &c.

Here is, [1.] A prohibition of pride. They are forbidden,

First, To challenge titles of honor and dominion to themselves, v. 8, 10. It is repeated twice; Be not called Rabbi, neither be ye called Master or Guide; not that it is unlawful to give civil respect to those that are over us in the Lord; nay, it is an instance of the honor and esteem which it is our duty to show them; but, 1. Christ's ministers must not affect the name of Rabbi, or Master, by way of distinction from other people; it is not agreeable to the simplicity of the Gospel, for them to covet or accept of the honor which they have that are in kings' pa-being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of another Hebrew letter; they are then brought before, and fall on the breast."

CAULMET

'The Targum on Cant. 8:3. introduceth the Jews speaking thus: "I am chosen above all people, because I bind my frontals to my head and my left hand; and my parchment is fixed to the right side of my gate or door, so that a third part of it comes up to my bed, that the evil spirits may not hurt me."'

WHITBY, in SCOTT.

'Our Lord gives us the distinguishing characteristics of all false teachers. They live not according to the truths they preach. They are severe to others, point out the narrowest road to heaven, and walk in the broad road themselves. They affect to appear righteous, and are strict observers of certain rites, &c. while destitute of the power of godliness. They love worldly entertainments, go to feasts wherever they are asked, and seek church preferments. They love and seek public respect and high titles; salutations in the market place, (for they are seldom in their studies,) and to be called of men, rabbi—eminent teacher, though they have no title to it, either from the excellence or fruit of their teaching. When these marks are found in a man who professes to be a minister of Christ, charity itself will assert, he is a thief, and a robber—he has climbed over the wall of the sheepfold, or broken it down in order to get in.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

[Rooms.] 'Rather, places. The middle couch, which lay along the upper end of the table, and was therefore accounted the most honorable place, and that which the Pharisees are said particularly to have affected, was distinguished by the name, "the first couch," or "seat," and so it is considered at our public entertainments now.'

[Chief seats.] 'The doctors had seats by themselves, with their backs towards the pulpit in which the law was read, and their faces towards the people.'

DODDRIDGE.

'According to the most ancient custom among the Jews, those who had no office in the synagogue, sat in the order of age. But, in many places, it came to be the practice, at length, that they who had acquired some reputation for learning, should occupy a more honorable seat as here. And there are extant in the books of the Hebrews, &c. several rules on this subject, from which it appears that the doctors of the law ranked the same as the Pharisees.'

Secondly, They are forbidden to ascribe such titles to others; (v. 9.) constitute no man the father of your religion, that is, the founder, author, director, and governor of it. The fathers of our flesh must be called fathers, and as such laces. 2. They must not assume the authority and dominion implied in those names; they must not be magisterial, nor domineer over their brethren, or over God's heritage, as if they had dominion over the faith of Christians: what they received of the Lord, all must receive from them; but in other things they must not make their opinions and wills a rule and standard to all other people, to be admitted with an implicit obedience. The reasons for this prohibition are,

(1.) One is your Master, even Christ, v. 8, 10. Note, [1.] Christ is our Master, our Teacher, our Guide. Mr. George Herbert, when he named the name of Christ, usually added, My Master. [2.] Ministers are but ushers, Christ only is the Master, that great Prophet whom we must hear, and be ruled and overruled by; whose word must be an oracle and a law to us. And if He only be our Master, then for his ministers to set up for dictators, and to pretend to a supremacy, and an infallibility, is a daring usurpation of that honor of Christ which He will not give to another.

(2.) All ye are brethren. Ministers are brethren, not only to one another, but to the people; and therefore it ill becomes them to be masters, when there are none for them to master it over we must give them reverence: but God only must be owned as the Father of our spirits, Heb. 12: 9. We are born again to the spiritual and divine life, not of corruptible seed, but by the word of God; not of the will of the flesh, or the will of man, but of God. Now the will of man, not being the rise of our religion, must not be the rule of it. We must not swear to the dictates of any creature, not the wisest or best; nor pin our faith on any man's sleeve, because we know not, whether he will carry it. Paul calls himself a father to those whose conversion he had been an instrument of; (1 Cor. 4: 15. Phil. 10.) but he pretends to no dominion over them, and uses that title to denote, not authority, but affection; therefore he calls them not his obliged, but his beloved sons, 1 Cor. 4: 14.

The reason given is, One is your Father, who is in heaven. God is our Father, and is all in all in our religion. He is the Fountain of it, and its Founder; the Life of it, and its Lord. He is the Father of all lights, (Jam. 1: 17.) that one Father, from whom all things, and we in Him, Eph. 4: 6. Christ having taught us to say, Our Father, who art in heaven, let us call no man father upon earth; for man on earth is a sinful worm; there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and smeth not, and therefore no one is fit to be called Father.

[2.] Here is a precept of humility and mutual subjection, (v. 11.) He that is greatest among you, shall be your servant; not only call himself so, (we know of one that styles himself servant of the servants of God, but acts as rabbi, and father, and master, and [has been impiously called] the Lord our God,) but be so. Take it

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. It has been too common in every age, for those who fill the highest stations in the visible church, to be strangers and enemies to 'the power of godliness,' and to be entirely the reverse of those to whom they seem to succeed in their sacred functions. We must not, however, think the worse of the truths and ordinances of God on that account, but must 'observe and do' whatever they scripturally command and teach. Yet we should guard against their perversions, and not imitate any part of their ungodly conduct; for, loose as the principles of such men are, their lives are still worse; and they are far from practising even the scanty measure of duty which they teach. Indeed, if the human inventions and uncommanded austerities which some of this description enforce, with great rigor, on men's consciences, be taken into the account, they may be said to 'bind up heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and to lay them on men's shoulders;' but their negligence and self-indulgence often evidence, that they disdain to 'move them with one of their fingers;' except as ambition and vain-glory lead them to observe some worthless externals 'to be seen of men,' and to amuse and dazzle superficial observers, with a splendid superstition, and thus to render appearances of piety subservient to their love of homage, distinction, and authority. How contrary is all this to the humble, unassuming, and self-abasing spirit of Christianity!—He who is consistently a disciple of Christ, courts privacy for his duties, and delights most to commune with his Father in secret: he steps forth into notoriety with reluctance; and instead of 'loving,' is pained by, 'the chief places,' either in private houses, or in public congregations; as he is disposed to make choice of the lowest place, and 'in honor to prefer others to himself.'

Verse 7.

Rabbi.] A word importing the variety of their learning, and the greatness of their religious knowledge. 'It signifies one that is above his fellows, and is as good as a number of them; and we may see by the repeating of it, how proud a title it was.' The learned Jews said, the words of the rabbins were the words of God.

Nitch, in BLOOMFIELD. 'Simon, the son of Hillel, who succeeded his father as president of the sanhedrin about the time of the birth of Christ, was the first Jewish rabbi. The title was generally conferred with a great deal of ceremony. When a person had gone through the schools, and was thought worthy of the degree of rabbi, he was first placed in a chair, a little raised above the company; then were delivered to him a key as a symbol of the power and authority conferred upon him, to teach others, and a table book as a symbol of diligence in his studies. The key he afterward wore as a badge of honor, and when he died was buried with him. On the same occasion also, the imposition of hands, by the delegates of the sanhedrin was practised. After this, they proclaimed his title.'

WITSIUS and ALTING.

Verse 8-10.

Rabbi.] Even the apostles, though the most eminent persons who ever appeared on earth, were commanded not to accept of the title 'rabbi,' because they had one Master, even Christ Himself; and they were all brethren, without any pre-eminence or authority over each other; being all equally dependent on their common Lord, and equally subject to Him. This is twice repeated, perhaps to show how prone men are to forget it. And, as the disciples were not to affect worldly authority or worldly honor, they were required not to 'call any man our father upon earth.' This cannot be supposed to forbid men from expressing respect, affection, and gratitude to those, who have been instrumental to their spiritual good; any more than to interfere with the duties of children to their parents. If these rules were proper for the apostles and primitive disciples, they must be still more suitable to the case of all other teachers and Christians: and it is evident, that they were given with a prophetic view to the enormous abuses and fatal effects, which have since been witnessed in the Christian church, from the ambition and lust of dominion in some, and the abject submission of others, to their assumed authority and pretensions to infallibility. The astonishing degree to which these evils have proceeded, especially in the church of Rome, the exorbitant claims, and high-sounding titles of ecclesiastics, and servile submission of the people, are well known to but the same heaven still works; and many things are found, among different bodies of Protestant Christians, which by no means comport with these rules, and which do not at all savor of the simplicity and humility of the Gospel, or consist with believing and obeying no teacher, church-ruler, learned doctor, or head of a sect, in the least matter, further than he evidently declares the truth and will of Christ, our common Teacher and Lord. It is observable, that assuming priests of all religions have been ambitious of being called 'father,' or of some such name; importing rather what they are conscious they ought to have been, than what they really were.

SCOTT.

(8.) Rabbi, Master.] 'Many MSS., with most of the ancient versions, sustain teacher or master, rather than guide or leader; it is approved by the most eminent critics, and appears to be genuine, as it exactly answers to the title rabbi, which the Jewish doctors ostentatiously assumed, claiming excessive deference and regard, and requiring to be implicitly followed in the traditions which they taught.'

GREENFIELD.

Even Christ.] 'Griesbach has left this out of the text, because it is wanting in many of the most excellent MSS., versions, or fathers Mill and Bengel approve of the omission. It might have been brought into this verse, from verse 10. Our Lord probably alludes to Is. 54: 13. All thy children shall be taught of the Lord.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

All ye are brethren.] 'It is observable that not one word is said about Peter's authority over the rest, either here or on the application made by Zebedee's children; though, had such an authority been intended, nothing could have been more natural or necessary, than it had been mentioned and adjusted to.'

DODDRIE.

(9.) Father.] 'Our Lord probably alludes to the "father" of the sanhedrin, who was the next after the president. See on ch. 20: 21. By which He gives his disciples to understand, that He would have no second, after Himself, established in his church, of which He alone was the head; and that a perfect equality must subsist among them.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'They who followed any rabbi as chief of a school, &c. were called sons of the sage, and they themselves called him 'my father.' Therefore, in the sense in which the Jews called these wise men fathers, Christians ought to call no one father. In another sense, however they are rightly called fathers, who have, as Paul says, (1 Cor. 4: 16. begotten us in the Gospel.' BLOOMFIELD, after GROTIUS and ROSEN-
'By "calling a man father" here, our Savior plainly means having regard to human authority in matters of faith, or in doctrines of religion.

with the holy God, and respected by all wise and good men; of being qualified for, and often called out to, the most honorable services; for honor is like the shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, and grasp at it, but follows nose that flee from it. However, in the other world, they that have humbled themselves in contrition for their sin, in compliance with their God, and in condescension to their brethren, shall be exalted to inherit the throne of glory; shall be not only owned, but crowned, before angels and men.

v 19-33. In these verses we have eight woes against the scribes and Pharisees, like so many claps of thunder, or flashes of lightning, from mount Sinai. The Gospel has its woes as well as the law, and gospel-curses are of all others the heaviest. These woes are the more remarkable, not only because of the authority, but because of the meekness and gentleness, of Him that denounced them. He came to bless, and loved to bless; but, if his wrath be kindled, there is surely a cause: and who shall entreat for him the great Intercessor pleads against? A woe from Christ is a remediless woe.

This is here the burthen of the song, and it is a heavy burthen, v. 13. Note, 1. The scribes and Pharisees were hypocrites; this is the sum of their character; it was the leaven which gave the relish to all they said and did. A hypocrite is a stage-player in religion; (that is the primary signification of as a promise: He shall be accounted greatest, and stand highest in the favor of God, that is most submissive and serviceable: or as a precept; 'He that is advanced to any place of dignity, trust, and honor in the church, let him be your servant.' Paul, who knew his privilege as well as duty, though free from all, yet made himself servant of all; (1 Cor. 9:19.) and our Master frequently pressed it on his disciples, to be humble and self-denying, mild and condescending, and to abound in all offices of Christian love, though mean, and to the meanest; and of this He hath set us an example.

[3.] Here is a good reason for all this, v. 12. Consider,

First, The punishment intended for the proud; Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased. If God give them repentance, they will be abased in their own eyes, and abhor themselves; if they repent not, sooner or later they will be abased before the world. Nebuchadnezzar, in the height of his pride, was turned to be a fellow-commoner with the beasts; Herod, to be a feast for the worms; and Babylon, that sat as a queen, to be the scorn of nations. God made the proud and aspiring priests contemptible and base, (Mal. 2:9.) and the lying prophet to be the tail, Isa. 9:15. But, if proud men have not marks of humiliation set on them in this world, there is a day coming, when they shall rise to everlasting shame and contempt; (Dan. 12:2.) so plentifully will He reward the proud doer! Ps. 31:23.

Secondly, The preferment intended for the humble; He that shall humble himself shall be exalted. Humility is that ornament which is in the sight of God of great price. In this world the humble have the honor of being accepted the word;) he personates, or acts, the part of one that he neither is, nor may be; or, perhaps would be. 2. Hypocrites are in a woful state; while they live, their religion is vain; when they die, their ruin is great.

Now each of these woes has a reason annexed to it, containing a separate crime, and justifying the judgment of Christ in pronouncing them.

1. These scribes and Pharisees were sworn enemies to the Gospel of Christ, and consequently to the salvation of the souls of men (v. 13.) they did all they could to keep people from believing in Christ, and so entering into his kingdom. Christ came to open the kingdom of heaven, that is, to open a new and living way into it. Now the scribes and Pharisees ought to have contributed their assistance here in, by opening those scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed to the Messiah and his kingdom, in their true proper sense; they that undertook to expound Moses and the prophets, should have showed the people how they testified of Christ; that Daniel's weeks were expiring, the sceptre was departed from Judah, and therefore now was the time for the Messiah's appearing. Thus they might have facilitated that great work, and helped thousands to heaven; but, instead of this, they shut up the kingdom, and made it their business to press the ceremonial law, which was now in the vanishing, to suppress the prophecies, which were now in the accomplishing, and to heget and nourish prejudices against Christ and his doctrine.

2. They would not go in themselves; Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on Him? John 7: 48. No; they were too proud to stoop to his meanness, too formal to be reconciled to his plainness; they did not like a religion which insisted so much on humility, self-denial, contempt of the world, and spiritual worship. Repentance was the door of admission into this kingdom, and nothing could be more disagreeable to the Pharisees, who justified and admired themselves, than to repent, that is, accuse, abase, and abhor themselves; therefore they went not in themselves; but that was not all.

3. They would not suffer them that were entering, to go in. It is bad to keep away from Christ ourselves, but worse to keep others from Him; yet that is commonly the way of hypocrites: they do not love that any should go beyond them in religion, or be better than they. Their not going in themselves, was a hindrance to many; for, they having so great an

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8-12. Who, that looks around him into the visible church, could think that a lowly, unassuming spirit was essential to Christianity, and expressly required by its divine Author? Who could suppose, that his disciples were forbidden to be called Rabbi, or Master? to assume, or to receive, high-sounding pompous titles, to usurp dominion over others, or submit to such usurpation? It is evident that there are many antichrists, and some measure of this spirit prevails perhaps in every religious society. Much remains to be done, in all parts of the church, before Christians will live together as brethren, the children of one common Father, the disciples and subjects of one common Lord and Master, in the equality of genuine humble love and harmony, and before no one aspires to be greatest. In any other way, than by becoming the servant of the whole fraternity for Jesus' sake. (Note, 2 Cor. 4: 5, 6.) We have all very much to learn, and to unlearn, before we can be completely qualified to form a part of such a company: while we therefore lament the horrid evils, the spiritual tyranny and abject slavery, the damnable heresies, superstitions, idolatries, persecutions, and bloody contentions, which have resulted from the spirit of pride and ambition, let us watch against it in our own hearts: let us aspire after no honor, except that of being accepted by our Master; of being useful to our brethren; and known as 'the children of our Father which is in heaven.' But let us by no means 'call any man Father upon earth,' or so attach ourselves to any leader or teacher, as to be more properly his disciples, than the disciples of Christ; and let us believe and follow no man, any further than he follows our common Lord. This will consist with the deepest humility; which must never be lost sight of, if we would be truly wise, honorable, or happy. In proportion as men endeavor to exalt themselves into consequence and eminence, the Lord will surely abase them; He will save none who continue proud and ambitious; He seldom employs self-sufficient instruments; He will expose to disgrace even his own servants, if they begin to be aspiring, and desirous of honor from men; but He will exalt to real eminence, usefulness, and felicity, those who are abased as sinners in his sight, and are humbly willing to be despised of men, and to attend to the meanest service of love to his people.

'It is feigned that when king Jehoshaphat saw a disciple of the wise man, he rose up out of his throne, and embraced him, and said, Wise man, Father! Lord, Rabbi! Master, Master! the three titles which our Lord condemns, and which the Jewish doctors greatly affected.'

4 Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.

15 Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves.

interest in the people, multitudes rejected the Gospel only because their leaders did; but, besides that, they opposed both Christ's entertainment of sinners, (Luke 7: 39.) and sinners' entertaining of Christ; they perverted His doctrine, confronted his miracles, quarrelled with his disciples, and represented Him, and his institutes and economy, in the most disingenuous, disadvantageous, manner imaginable; they excommunicated those that confessed Him, and used all their wit and power to serve their malice against Him; thus they shut up the kingdom of heaven, so that they who would enter into it must suffer violence, (ch. 11: 12.) and press into it, (Luke 16: 16.) through a crowd of scribes and Pharisees, and all the obstructions and difficulties they could contrive to lay in their way. How well is it for us, that our salvation is not intrusted in the hands of any man, or company of men; if it were, we were undone. They that shut out of the church, would shut out of heaven; but the malice of men cannot make the promise of God to his chosen of no effect; blessed be God, it cannot.

II. They made religion and the form of godliness, a cloak to their covetousness, v. 14. Observe here,

1. Their wicked practices; they devoured widows' houses, either by quartering themselves on them for entertainment; or by getting to be the trustees of their estates, which they could make an easy prey of. The chief thing they aimed at, was, to enrich themselves; all considerations of justice therefore were laid aside, and even widows' houses were sacrificed. Widows are of the weaker sex in its weakest state, easily imposed on; and therefore they fastened on them, to make a prey of. They devoured those whom, by the law of God, they were particularly obliged to protect, patronize, and relieve. There is a woe in the Old Testament.

2. That those that made widows their prey; (Isa. 10: 1, 2.) and Christ here seconded it with his woe. God is the Judge of the widows; they are his peculiar care. He establisheth their border, (Prov. 15: 25.) and espouseth their cause: (Exod. 22: 22, 23.) yet these were they whose houses the Pharisees devoured, which denotes not only covetousness, but cruelty, Mic. 3: 3. They eat the flesh, and flay the skin; and, doubtless, they did all this under color of law; for they did it so artfully, that it passed uncensured, and did not at all lessen the people's veneration for them.

3. The cloak with which they covered these wicked practices; for a pretence they made long prayers; very long indeed, the Jewish writer tells us, three hours at a time, and thrice every day, which is more than an upright soul, that makes conscience of being inward with God in the duty, dare pretend ordinarily to do. By this craft they got their wealth, and maintained their grandeur. It is not probable that these long prayers were extemporary, but rather that they were stated forms of words in use among them, which they said over by tale, as the papists drop their beads. Christ doth not here condemn long prayers, as in themselves hypocritical; nay, if there were not a great appearance of good in them, they would not have been used for a pretence; and the cloak must be very thick to cover such wicked practices. Christ himself continued all night in prayer to God [alone], and we are commanded to pray, without ceasing to soon; where there are many sins to be confessed, and many wants to pray for the supply of, and many mercies to give thanks for, there is occasion for long prayers. But the Pharisees' long prayers were made up of vain repetitions, and (which was the end of them) they were for a pretence; by them they got the reputation of pious, devout men, that loved prayer, and were the favorites of heaven; and by this mean, people were made to believe it was not possible that such men as they should cheat them; and, therefore, happy the widow that could get a Pharisee for her trustee, and guardian to her children! Thus, while they seemed to soar heavenward, on the wings of prayer, their eye, like the kite's, was all the while on their prey on the earth, some widows' house or other that lay convenient for them. Thus circumcision was a cloak of the Shechemites' covetousness, (Gen. 34: 22, 23,) the payment of a vow in Hebron the cover of Absalom's rebellion, (2 Sam. 15: 7.) a fast in Jezreel must patronize Naboth's murder, and the ex-tirpation of Baal is the footstool of Jehoi's ambition. Popish priests, under pretence of long prayers for the dead, masses, and dirges, and I know not what, enrich themselves by devouring the houses of the widows and fatherless. Note, It is no new thing for the show and form of godliness to be made a cloak to the greatest enormities. But dissembled piety however it passeth now, will be reckoned for as double iniquity, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men.

3. The doom passed on them for this, Therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. (1.) There are degrees of damnation; there are some, whose sin is more inexcusable, and whose ruin will therefore be more irreparable. (2.) The pretences of religion, with which hypocrites disguise, or excuse, their sin now, will aggravate their condemnation shortly. Such is the deceitfulness of sin, that that very thing by which sinners hope to expiate and atone for their sins, will come against them, and make their sins more exceeding sinful. But it is sad for the criminal, when his plea (We have prophesied in thy name, and in thy name made long prayers,) heightens the charge against him.

III. While they were such enemies to the conversion of souls to Christianity, they were very industrious in the perversion of them to their faction, v. 15. Observe here,

1. Their industry in making proselytes; for one such, though but one, they compass sea and land, had many a cunning reach, and laid man a plot, rode and run, and sent and wrote, and labored unweariably. And what did they air at? The credit of making them proselytes and the advantage of making a prey of them when they were made. Note, (1.) The making of proselytes to the truth and serious godliness, with a good design, is a good work, well worthy of the utmost care and pains. Such is the value of souls, that nothing must be thought too much to do to save a soul. The industry of the Pharisees herein may show the negligence of many, who would be thought to act from better principles, but will be at no pains or cost to propagate the Gospel. (2.) To make a proselyte, sea and land must be compassed; all ways and means must be tried; first one and then another, all little enough; but all well paid, if the point be gained. (3.) Carnal hearts seldom shrink from the pains necessary to carry on their carnal purposes; when a proselyte is to be made to serve a turn, they will compass sea and land to make him.

2. Their impiety in abusing their proselytes when they were made; 'Ye make him the disciple of a Pharisee presently, and he sucks in all a Pharisee's notions; and so ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves.' Note, (1.) Hypocrites, while they fancy themselves heirs of heaven, are, in the judgment of Christ, children of hell. The rise of their hypocrisy is from hell, and its tendency is toward hell; that is the country they belong to, the inheritance they are heirs to; they are called children of hell, because of their rooted enmity to the kingdom of heaven, which was the principle and genius of Pharisaism. (2.) Though all that maliciously oppose the Gospel are children of hell, yet some are two-fold more so than others, more furious, and bigoted, and [Devour.] 'Devour entirely.' This was done, it should seem, (from Sct. Hieros. f. 20: 1.) partly by caballing with the children, in order to deprive the widow of a portion of her aliment; but more especially by making them devotees, and thereby readily brought under contribution; and, indeed, this would be the easier, since it has been truly observed by Jamblichus V. P. 2, "because indeed sentiments of religion are most natural to women." That this was sometimes done is plain from rabbinical writers.

BLOOMFIELD.

'The softer feelings and the religious sentiments are commonly,' it has been said 'stronger in women than in men. Females therefore become easily the favorite tools of [a seeking] priesthood.' 2 Tim. 3: 6.

'Two-fold,' 'Double.' Doddridge, 'More deceitful—fraudulent.' Cygne, Dr. A. Clarke. 'The proselytes did not only disbelieve Jesus's doctrine, but were abundantly more blasphemous against Him than the Jews themselves, endeavoring to torment and cut off the Christians wherever they could, they being in this the instruments of the scribes and Pharisees.' Bloomfield, after Justin Martyr, 'Children of hell.' 'Equivalent' to 'worthy of hell,' in phrases of this kind, as 2 Sam. 12: 5, where the phrase, translated 'shall surely die,' is in the original—'is a son of death.'

Verses 16—22.

Dur Lord had before disallowed all such oaths. they are profane in common conversation, and not solemn enough on important occasions. But He here shows, that they imply an appeal to God for the truth of what is thus declared or promised.

SCOTT.

'With the former they reckoned oaths sworn by any thing offered to God, which they accounted the same as swearing by God himself. There was a superstition not dissimilar among the Persians.'

BLOOMFIELD.

7 Ye fools and blind; for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold?

18 And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it he is *guilty.

19 Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift?

[1.] They allowed swearing by creatures, provided they were consecrated to the service of God, as the temple and the altar. But an oath is an appeal to God, and to make this appeal to any creature, is to put that creature in the place of God. See Deut. 6:13.

[2.] They distinguished between an oath by the temple, and by the gold of the temple; by the altar, and by the gift upon the altar; making the latter binding, but not the former. Here was a double wickedness; First, That there were some oaths which they dispensed with, and made light of, and reckoned a man was not bound by to assert the truth, or perform a promise. They ought not to have sworn by the temple, or the altar; but, when they had so sworn, they were taken in the words of their mouth. That doctrine cannot be of the God of truth, which gives countenance to the breach of faith, in any case whatsoever. Oaths are not to be jested with. Secondly, That they preferred the gold before the temple, and the gift before the altar, to encourage people to bring gifts to the altar, and gold to the treasurers of the temple, which they hoped to be gainers by. They who had made gold their hope, and whose eyes were blinded by gifts in secret, were great friends to the Corban; and gain being their godliness, by a thousand artifices they made religion truckle to their worldly interests. Corrupt church-guides make things to be sin or no sin, as it serves their purposes, and lay a much greater stress on that which concerns their own gain, than on that which is for God's glory and the good of souls.

To convict them of folly, He appeals to themselves, Whether is greater, the gold, (the golden vessels and ornaments, or the gold in the treasury,) or the temple that sanctifies the gold; the gift, or the altar that sanctifies the gift? Any one will own, That that, on account of which any thing is qualified in a particular way, must itself be much more qualified in the same way. They that swear by the gold of the temple, had an eye to it as holy; but what made it holy but the holiness of the temple, to the service of which it was appropriated? And therefore the temple cannot be less holy than the gold, but must be more so, Heb. 7:7. The temple and altar were dedicated to God, fixedly, the gold and gift but secondarily. Christ is our Altar, (Heb. 13:10.) our Temple; (John 2:21.) for it is He that sanctifies all our gifts, (18.) Perhaps the manner of swearing by other things rather than God, was introduced out of a too superstitious reverence for his name. Our Savior's decision is, that such distinctions are frivolous; and that oaths, as such, are binding, as carrying in them an appeal to God.

ADAM.

(20.) By the altar &c. 'As an oath always supposes a person

malignant. (3.) Perverted proselytes are commonly the greatest bigots; the scholars out-did their masters. [1.] In fondness of ceremony; the Pharisees themselves saw the folly of their own impositions, and in their hearts smiled at the obsequiousness of those that conformed to them; but their proselytes were eager for them. Note, Weak heads commonly admire those shows and ceremonies which wise men (however for public ends they may countenance them) cannot but think meanly of. [2.] In fury against Christianity; the proselytes readily imbibed the principles which their crafty leaders possessed them with, and so became extremely hot against the truth. The most bitter enemies the apostles met with in all places, were, the Hellenist Jews, who were mostly proselytes, Acts 13:45. 14:2, 19. 17:5. 18:6. Paul, a disciple of the Pharisees, was exceedingly mad against the Christians, (Acts 26:11.) when his master Gamaliel seems to have been more moderate.

IV. Seeking their own worldly gain and honor more than God's glory, they coined false and unwarrantable distinctions, with which they led the people into dangerous mistakes, particularly in the matter of oaths; which, as an evidence of a universal sense of religion, have been by all nations accounted sacred; (v. 16.) Ye blind guides. Note, 1. It is sad to think how many are under the guidance of those, who undertake to show others that way they are themselves willingly ignorant of. His watchmen are blind; (Isa. 56:10.) and too often the people love to have it so, and say to the seers, See not. But the case is bad, when the leaders of the people cause them to err, Isa. 3:16. 2. Though the condition of those whose guides are blind is very sad, yet that of the blind guides themselves is yet more sad. Christ denounces a woe to the blind guides, that have the blood of so many souls to answer for.

Now, to prove their blindness, He specifies the matter of swearing, and shows what corrupt casuists they were.

(1.) He lays down the doctrine they taught.

[1.] They allowed swearing by creatures, provided they were consecrated to the service of God, as the temple and the altar. But an oath is an appeal to God, and to make this appeal to any creature, is to put that creature in the place of God. See Deut. 6:13.

[2.] They distinguished between an oath by the temple, and by the gold of the temple; by the altar, and by the gift upon the altar; making the latter binding, but not the former. Here was a double wickedness; First, That there were some oaths which they dispensed with, and made light of, and reckoned a man was not bound by to assert the truth, or perform a promise. They ought not to have sworn by the temple, or the altar; but, when they had so sworn, they were taken in the words of their mouth. That doctrine cannot be of the God of truth, which gives countenance to the breach of faith, in any case whatsoever. Oaths are not to be jested with. Secondly, That they preferred the gold before the temple, and the gift before the altar, to encourage people to bring gifts to the altar, and gold to the treasurers of the temple, which they hoped to be gainers by. They who had made gold their hope, and whose eyes were blinded by gifts in secret, were great friends to the Corban; and gain being their godliness, by a thousand artifices they made religion truckle to their worldly interests. Corrupt church-guides make things to be sin or no sin, as it serves their purposes, and lay a much greater stress on that which concerns their own gain, than on that which is for God's glory and the good of souls.

To convict them of folly, He appeals to themselves, Whether is greater, the gold, (the golden vessels and ornaments, or the gold in the treasury,) or the temple that sanctifies the gold; the gift, or the altar that sanctifies the gift? Any one will own, That that, on account of which any thing is qualified in a particular way, must itself be much more qualified in the same way. They that swear by the gold of the temple, had an eye to it as holy; but what made it holy but the holiness of the temple, to the service of which it was appropriated? And therefore the temple cannot be less holy than the gold, but must be more so, Heb. 7:7. The temple and altar were dedicated to God, fixedly, the gold and gift but secondarily. Christ is our Altar, (Heb. 13:10.) our Temple; (John 2:21.) for it is He that sanctifies all our gifts, and puts an acceptableness in them, 1 Pet. 2:5. Those that put their own works into the place of Christ's righteousness in justification, are guilty of the Pharisees' absurdity, who preferred the gift before the altar. Every true Christian is a living temple; and by virtue thereof, common things are sanctified to Him: who the pure all things are pure, (Tit. 1:15.) and the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, 1 Cor. 7:14.

(3.) He rectifies the mistake, (v. 20-22.) by reducing all the oaths they had invented to the true intent of an oath, which is, By the name of the Lord: so that though an oath by the temple, or the altar, or heaven, be formally bad, yet they are binding. A man shall never take advantage of his own faults, Ps. 15:4.

[1.] He that swears by the altar, let him not think to shake off the obligation of it by saying, 'The altar is but wood, and stone, and brass;' for his oath shall be construed most strongly against himself; because he was culpable, and so as that the obligation of it may be preserved, the obligation being hereby strengthened rather than destroyed. And therefore an oath by the altar should be interpreted by it and by all things thereon; for the appurtenances pass with the principal. And the things thereon being offered up to God, to swear by it and them, was, in effect, to call God Himself to witness: for it was the altar of God; and he that went to that, went to God, Ps. 43:4. 26:6.

[2.] He that swears by the temple, does so, not because the temple is a fine house, but because it is the house of God, dedicated to his service: therefore he swears by it, and by Him that dwells therein; there He was pleased in a peculiar manner to manifest Himself, and give tokens of his presence; so that who swears by it, swears by Him who had said, This is my rest, here will I dwell. Good Christians are God's temples, and the Spirit of God dwells in them, (1 Cor. 3:16. 6:19.) and God takes what is done to them as done to Himself; he that grieves a gracious soul, grieves it, and the Spirit that dwells in it, Eph. 4:30.

[3.] If a man swears by heaven, he sins; (Job. 5:34.) yet he shall not therefore be discharged from the obligation of his oath; no, God will make him know, that the heaven he swears by is his throne; (Isa. 66:1.) and he that swears by the throne, appeals to Him that sits on it; who, as He resents the affront done to Him in the form of the oath, so He will certainly avenge the greater affront done to Him by the violation of it. Christ will not countenance the evasion of a solemn oath, though ever so plausible.

V. They were very strict and precise in the smaller matters of the law, but as careless and loose in the weightier matters, v. 23, 24. They were partial in the law, (Mal. 2:9.) would pick and choose their duty, according as they were interested or stood affected. Sincere obedience is universal, and he that from a right principle obeys any of God's precepts, will have respect to them all, Ps. 119:6. But hypocrites, who act in religion for themselves, and not for God, will do no more than may serve a turn for themselves. The partiality of the scribes and Pharisees appears here, in two instances:

1. They observed smaller duties, but omitted greater: they were very exact in paying tithes, till it came to mint, anise, and cummin their exactness in tithing of which would not cost them much, but would be cried up, and they should buy reputation cheap. The Pharisees boasted of this, I give tithes of all that I possess, Luke 13:12. But it is probable they had ends of their own to serve, and would find their own account in it; for the priests and Levites, to whom the tithes were paid, were in their interests, and knew how to return them who witnesses it, and will punish perjury; whether they swore by the temple, or the gold, or by the altar, or the gifts laid on it, the oath necessarily supposed the God of the temple—the altar, and of the gift, who witnessed the oaths, and would even, in their exempt cases, punish the perjury.

23 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: ^m these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

24 Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.

s. J. 12:17, 22:37-40. 1 Sam. 15: 2. Prov. 21:3. Hos 6:8. Mic. 6: 5. Gal. 5:22, 23.

yet to cheat and defraud every body else, is but to mock God, and deceive ourselves. Mercy also is preferred before sacrifice, Hos. 6: 6. To feed those who made themselves fat with the offerings of the Lord, and at the same time to shut up the bowels of compassion from a brother or a sister that is naked, and destitute of daily food, to pay tithe-mint to the priest, and to deny a crumb to Lazarus, is to be open to that judgment without mercy, which is awarded to those who pretended to judgment, and showed no mercy; nor will judgment and mercy serve without faith in divine revelation; for God will be honored in his truths as well as in his laws.

2. They avoided lesser sins, but committed greater; (v. 24.) Ye blind guides; so He had called them before (v. 16.) for their corrupt teaching; here He calls them so for their corrupt living; they strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel. In their doctrine they strained at gnats, warned people against every the least violation of the tradition of the elders. In their practice they strained at gnats, as if they had a great abhorrence of sin, and were afraid of it in the least instance; but they made no difficulty of those sins which, in comparison with them, were as a camel to a gnat; when they devoured widows' houses, they did indeed swallow a camel; when they gave Judas the price of innocent blood, and yet supposed to put the returned money into the treasury; (ch. 27: 6.) when they would not go into the judgment-hall, for fear of being defiled, and yet would stand at the door, and cry out against the holy Jesus; (John 18: 28.) when they quarrelled with the disciples for eating with unwashed hands, and yet, for the filling of the Corban, taught people to break the fifth commandment, they strained at gnats, or lesser things, and yet swallowed camels. It is not the scrupling of a little sin that Christ here reproves; if it be a sin, though but a gnat, it must be strained at; but the doing of that, and then swallowing a camel. In the lesser matters of the law to be superstitious, and to be profane in the greater, is the hypocrisy here condemned.

VI. They were all for the outside, and not at all for the inside, of religion. They were more solicitous to appear pious than to be so in reality. This is illustrated by two similitudes:

1. They are compared to a vessel that is clean on the outside, but all dirt within, v. 25, 26. The Pharisees placed religion in that which at best was but a point of decency—the washing of cups, Mark 7: 4. They were in care to eat their meat in clean cups and platters, but made no conscience of getting their meat by extortion, and using it to excess. Now, what a foolish thing would it be for a man to wash only the outside of a cup, which is to be looked at, and to leave the inside dirty, which is to be used? so they do, who only avoid scandalous sins that would spoil their reputation with men, but allow themselves in heart-wickedness, which renders them odious to the pure and holy God. In reference to this, observe,

(1.) The practice of the Pharisees; they made clean the outside. In those things which fell under the observation of their neighbors they seemed very exact, and carried on their wicked intrigues with so much artifice, that their wickedness was not suspected; people generally took them for very good men. But within, in the recesses of their hearts, and the close retirements of their lives, they were full of extortion and excess; of violence and incontinence; (so Dr. Hammond;) that is, of injustice and intemperance. Their inward part was very wickedness; (Ps. 5: 9.) and that we are really, which we are inwardly.

(2.) The rule Christ gives, in opposition to this practice, v. 26. It is addressed to the blind Pharisees. They thought themselves the seers of the land, but (John 9: 40.) Christ calls them blind. Note, Those are blind, in Christ's account, who, (how quick-sighted soever they are in other things) are strangers, and no enemies, to the wickedness of their own hearts. Self-ignorance is the most shameful and hurtful ignorance, Rev. 3: 17. The rule is, Cleanse first that which is within. Note, The principal care of every one of us should be to wash our hearts from wickedness, Jer. 4: 14. The main business of a Christian lies within, to get cleansed from the filthiness of the spirit. Corrupt affections and inclinations, the secret lusts that lurk in the soul, unseen and unobserved; those must first be mortified and subdued. Those sins must be conscientiously abstained from, which the eye of God only is a witness to, who searcheth the heart.

Observe the method prescribed; Cleanse first that which is within; not that only, but that first; because, if due care be taken concerning that, the outside will be clean also. External motives and inducements may keep the outside clean, while the inside is filthy; but if renewing, sanctifying grace make clean the inside, that will have an influence on the outside, for the commanding principle is within. If the heart be well kept, all is well, for out of it are the issues of life.

2. They are compared to whitened sepulchres, v. 27, 28.

(1.) Some make it refer to the custom of the Jews to whiten graves, only to mark them, especially if they were in unusual places, that people might avoid them, because of the ceremonial pollution contracted by the touch of a grave, Num. 19: 16. And it was part of the charge of the overseers of the highways, to repair that whitening when it was decayed. Sepulchres were thus made remarkable, 2 Kings 23: 16, 17. The formality of hypocrites doth but make all wise and good men the more careful to avoid them, for fear of being defiled by them. Beware of the scribes, Luke 20: 46. It rather alludes to the custom of whitening the

Verses 23, 24.

These were the most weighty requirements of the moral law, which must be obligatory under every dispensation: and if they had attended to them, it would then have been proper to observe the more minute requirements of the ritual law: (Note, Lev. 27: 30-34.) but to be exact in trifles, and devoid of conscience in matters of the highest importance, was egregiously absurd.

(23.) Anise and cummin. 'Anise' or dill is a species of plant of the centaurid diglyna class, growing native in Spain and Portugal. The root is fusiform and long; stems, erect-grooved, jointed, branched, and about two feet in height; leaves doubly pinnated, sweet and odorous; flowers, flat, terminal umbels; corolla, five ovate, concave yellow petals, with apex inflexed; germin, like that of fennel; seeds, scarcely the length of a caraway seed, but broader and flatter, of a brown color, aromatic, sweetish odor, and warmish, pungent taste. Cummin is a fruit of the same class as dill, which rises eight or ten inches on a slender round, procumbent, branching stem; leaves, a dark green, narrow, linear and pointed; flowers, purple, in numerous four-rayed umbels; corolla, five unequal petals, inflexed and notched at the apex; seeds, long, striated of a brown color, strong heavy odor, and warm bitterish taste.

A question arose how far the command (Deut. 14: 23, 29.) to give the tithe of the increase of their lands for the Levites and the poor extended? Some thought the precept was not to be pressed so rigorously as to take in every trifling herb of the garden. But these rigid interpreters would take it in the severest sense. They were nice and scrupulous, busy and vehement, about these little and dubious points, boasting loudly of it, (Luke 18: 12.) while yet they showed no conscience towards men in matters of a thousand times greater importance.'

Emlyn, in HEWLETT.

'The rabbins are fond of distinguishing between the weightier and lighter-matters of the law. See Weststein. The words following seem to be taken from Micah 6: 8. and mean justice, equity and right, mercy, humanity, benevolence, fidelity, probity, and truth towards God and man.'

Path. 'The original word has the signification of fidelity in many places: (comp. Tit. 2: 10. Gal. 5: 22. and Rom. 3: 3.) but there are many more in which it signifies the confidence reposed in another; and it is of great importance to observe this. See Col. 1: 4. and 1 Pet. 1: 21.'

DODDIDGE.

(24.) Strain at. 'A misprint for strain out. It first entered into the edition of 1611, and has been regularly continued ever since. In William Powell's Bible—1547, it is "strayne out." Dr. A. CLARE.

'In southern countries, these gnats swarm, and therefore may easily fall into wine vessels, and are sometimes bred in them. Hence, both Gentiles and Jews strained their wine. The former for cleanliness the latter from cleanliness mixed with religious scruples the "gnat" being unclean.'

Passing the liquor through a strainer, that no gnat or part of one might remain, grew into a proverb for exactness about little matters.'

'The Arabs have a proverb, "He swallows an elephant, and is strange by a flea."'

The Geneva version has, 'strain out.'

27 Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess.

[Practical Observations.]

28 Thou blind Pharisee! cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also.

1 Cor. 13: 12. Mark 7: 4. Luke 11: 35. 2 Cor. 13: 12. 1 Tim. 5: 22. 2 Cor. 13: 12. 1 Tim. 5: 22. 2 Cor. 13: 12. 1 Tim. 5: 22.

all the host of heaven, Jer. 8: 1, 2. For it is the day when God shall judge, not the shows, but the secrets, of men. It will then be small comfort to them, who have their portion with hypocrites, to remember, how creditably they went to hell, applauded by their neighbors.

VII. They pretended a deal of kindness for the memory of the prophets that were dead, while they hated and persecuted those that were alive. This is put last because it was the blackest part of their character. God is jealous for his honor in his laws and ordinances, and resents it if they be profaned and abused; but He has often expressed an equal jealousy for his honor in his prophets and ministers, and resents it more, if they be wronged and persecuted: and therefore, when our Lord Jesus comes to this head, He speaks more fully than on any of the others; (v. 29—37.) for he that toucheth his ministers, toucheth his Anointed. Observe here,

1. The respect which the scribes and Pharisees pretended for the prophets that were gone, v. 29, 30.

(1.) They honored the relics of the prophets, built their tombs, and garnished their sepulchres. It seems, the places of their burial were known, David's sepulchre was with them, Acts 2: 29. There was a title on the sepulchre of sepulchres of eminent persons, for the beautifying of them. It is said here, (v. 29.) that they garnished the sepulchres of the righteous; as if it were with respect to monuments over the graves of great persons, and to strew flowers on the graves of dear friends. Now the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees was like the ornaments of a grave, or the dressing up of a dead body only for show.

(2.) They were foul within, like sepulchres, full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness, so vile are our bodies, when the soul has deserted them! Thus were they full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Hypocrisy is the worst of all iniquities. Note, It is possible for those that have their hearts full of sin, to have their lives free from blame, and to appear very good. But what will it avail us, to have the good word of our fellow servants, if our Master doth not say, Well done? When all other graves are opened, these whitened sepulchres will be looked into, and the dead men's bones, and all the uncleanness, shall be brought out, and be spread before the man of God. (2 Kings 23: 17.) and Josiah thought it respect enough not to move his bones, v. 18. But they would do more, rebuild and beautify them. Now consider this, [1.] As an instance of honor done to deceased prophets, who, while they lived, were counted as the off-scouring of all things, and had all manner of evil spoken against them falsely. Note, God can extort, even from bad men, an acknowledgment of the honor of piety and holiness. Them that honor God, He will honor, and sometimes with those from whom contempt is expected, 2 Sam. 6: 22. The memory of the just is blessed, when the names of those that hated and persecuted them shall be covered with shame. The honor of constancy and resolution, in the way of duty, will be a lasting honor; and those that are manifest to God, will be manifest in the consciences of those about them. [2.] As an instance of the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees who paid their respect to them. Note, Carnal people can easily honor the memories of faithful ministers that are dead, because they do not reprove them, nor disturb them, in their sins, Rev. 11: 10. They can pay respect to the writings of the dead prophets which tell them what they should be; but not the reproofs of the living prophets, which tell them what they are. Let there be saints, but let them not be living here. The extravagant respect which the church of Rome pays to the memory of saints departed, especially the martyrs, dedicating days and places to their names, enshrining their relics, praying to them, and offering to their images, while they make themselves drunk with the blood of the saints of their own day, is a manifest proof that they not only succeed, but exceed, the scribes and Pharisees in a counterfeit, hypocritical religion, which builds the prophets' tombs but hates the prophets' doctrine.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—25. It gives great offence, yet on some occasions it is absolutely necessary, to expose the hypocrisy, wickedness, and blindness of false teachers; especially when they have acquired extensive influence, and are eminent for learning, reputation, or authority. In such circumstances, they often mislead very great numbers into fatal errors, and harden them in sin. It does not, indeed, become us to speak in that decisive language concerning their characters, or in that authoritative manner of their state and punishment, which He did, 'who knew what was in man,' and to whom all judgment belongs. But it is common for such men to lay themselves so open, by their egregious absurdities or enormous crimes, as to make it obvious that they are 'blind guides,' or subtle deceivers; who are going on the broad road, and leading their disciples in the same destructive course.—What discoveries then will Christ make in the great day of account, when He shall strip off the mask from every character, and show every man exactly as he is!—They who are appointed by office to guide men into the way of salvation, often use all their influence 'to shut the kingdom of heaven against them: hating the Gospel themselves, they instil their proud carnal prejudices into others; and they are most observant of those who seem about to enter, that by reasoning, ridicule, calumny, menaces, flatteries, or promises, they may deter them from becoming the real disciples of Christ. Woe be to such deceivers! they are Satan's agents, and share with that old murderer in the guilt of destroying immortal souls.—Many enemies of the Gospel, nay, professed believers, are notoriously defective in common honesty; for in various ways there has always been a race of men, who have used religion as a mask, or pretext, to obtain confidence and to get money. Long prayers, demure countenances, religious phrases and gestures, have gained them the opportunity of 'devouring widows' houses,' or of plundering the public, and practising manifold frauds, impositions, and oppressions, and have for a time screened them from investigation and conviction; but such scandals to all godliness 'shall receive the deeper damnation,' and be more severely punished than robbers of a less sanctimonious cast.—Hypocrites also find their account in bestowing much pains to make proselytes to their party; while every one whom they win over, becomes more callous in enmity to true religion than before, and even vies with his tutor in pride and bigotry. It is also observable, that new converts to any superstition, or to any sect, are generally more intolerant and vehement than such as have been brought up in it; for they aim to evince the sincerity of the change, and to vindicate what they have done, and the importance of the contested points, by an excess of zeal for their new opinions. Scott.

God forbid that our devotions should ever be intended as a cloak of maliciousness, or as the instrument of serving any mean and vile purpose! Such prayers would return in curses on our own heads, and draw down on them aggravated damnation. God forbid that we should spend that time, and that ardency of spirit, in making proselytes to our own peculiar notions and party, which ought to be laid out in making them the servants of God through Christ! God forbid that we should delude ourselves or others by such idle distinctions in matters of conscience, as those which our blessed Redeemer has with so much reason and spirit exposed!—Let us retain the greatest reverence for an oath, and not accustom ourselves to trifle with any thing that looks like it. Let us consider heaven as the throne of God, and often think of the majesty and glory of that illustrious Being that sits thereon; for a sense of his continual presence will form us to a better temper, and engage us, with a righteousness far exceeding that of the scribes and Pharisees, to walk before Him in all his commandments and ordinances blameless. DODDIDGE.

These scribes and Pharisees, who trusted in themselves that they were right, and despised others; and proudly rejected the salvation of Christ, were mere hypocrites. They were careful to maintain a decent exterior, but paid no attention to their imaginations, motives, or affections: so that avarice, pride, and sensuality reigned in uncontrolled dominion in their hearts; and induced them covertly to grasp at wealth by extortion, and to spend it in inordinate self-indulgence. This proved them blind, and ignorant of God, of his law, of true religion, and of themselves: for common sense might have directed them, to begin first with their hearts. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12: 33—37. Jer. 4: 3, 4. Ez. 10: 30—32. v. 31. Luke 11: 37, 40. Jam. 4: 4—10.) The touch of a grave communicated a ceremonial uncleanness. (Notes, Num. 19: 11. Ez. 39: 11—16.) The Jews, therefore, used to wash their hands with lime, or other materials of that kind; and some were of opinion, that the word beautiful, does not refer to the grave when whitened, but when grown over with grass and flowers. [236]

But this does not at all agree with the text; for the Pharisees were like whitened sepulchres, and so appeared beautiful, not like those which were grown over with grass; and in those days, as well as in modern times, those who could afford it, adorned and beautified the tombs of their deceased friends. (29.) Scott.

(25.) Clean the outside. 'This censure carries a double sting; what filled their cups was procured by injustice, and used with intemperance.' ROBINSON.

(26.) 'The sepulchres were painted white the last month of every year, i. e. the month of Adar. The object of the practice was, by a timely warning, to prevent those who came to the feast of the passover, from approaching them, and thus becoming contaminated.' JAMN. 'The passover was at hand when our Lord made this censure, and therefore, it is likely they were just then white as fresh, when the rainy and bad weather was over, and the time for Israel to assemble in Jerusalem was at hand—as all or nearly all their solemnities were held in the dry part of the year.' HARMAN.

27 Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness.

28 Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

29 Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, 30 And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.

31 Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets.

32 Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers.

Rom. 1:32 2:1. They knew they ought not to have been partakers with persecutors, and yet were the followers of them. Such self-contradictions now will amount to self-condemnations in the great day. Christ puts another construction on their building the tombs of the prophets than what they intended; as if by beautifying their graves they justified their murderers, (Luke 11:48.) for they persisted in the sin.

[2.] By their own confession, these notorious persecutors were their ancestors; Ye are the children of them. They meant no more than that they were their children by blood and nature; but Christ turns it upon them, that they were so by spirit and disposition; You are the sons of those fathers, and their lusts you will do. As your fathers did, so do ye, Acts 7: 51. They came of a persecuting race, were a seed of evil doers, (Isa. 1: 4.) risen up in their fathers' stead, Num. 32: 14. Malice, envy, and cruelty were bred in the bone with them, and they had formerly espoused it for a principle, to do as their fathers did, Jer. 44: 17. And it is observable here, (v. 30.) how careful they are to mention the relation; 'They were our fathers, men in honor and power, whose sons and successors we are.' If they had detested the wickedness of their ancestors, as they ought to have done, they would not have been so fond to call them their fathers; for it is no credit to be akin to persecutors, though they have ever so much dignity and dominion.

By the just judgment of God, hypocrites, when they most seek to cover their crimes, most expose themselves to disgrace. Beza. It is probable, that some allusion was in these verses intended to the preceding comparison: It is remarkable, that the most severe and awful things contained in Scripture, were spoken by Jesus Christ Himself. (Marg. Ref. c. d.—Notes, 3: 7—10. Gen. 3: 14, 15.) SCOTT.

(29.) 'We may not doubt but that the synagogues were built at first after the sepulchres of distinguished men, thus to perpetuate their memory with posterity. For if ever men were inclined to "build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous," the Jews were to use men. Thus we read in the Cippis Hebraicus, that they were accustomed to honor the tomb of Mordecai by a certain annual religious celebration. "From over all that region the Jews congregated together on the day of Purim, and proceeded towards his sepulchre, chanting canticles and eulogies, with drums and choirs exulting

(2.) The sentence passed on them. Christ here proceeds,

[1.] To give them up to sin, as irreclaimable; v. 32. If Ephraim be joined to idols, and hate to be reformed, let him alone. He that is filthy, let him be filthy still. Christ knew they were now contriving his death, and in a few days would accomplish it; 'Well,' saith He 'go on with your plot, walk in the way of your heart, and in the sight of your eyes, and see what will come of it. What thou doest, do quickly. You will but fill up the measure of guilt, which will then overflow in a deluge of wrath.' Note, First, There is a measure of sin to be filled up, before utter ruin comes on persons and families, churches and nations. God will bear long, but the time will come, when He can no longer forbear, Jer. 44: 22. We read of the measure of the Amorites that was to be filled, (Gen. 15: 16.) of the harvest of the earth being ripe for the sickle, (Rev. 14: 15, 19.) and of sinners making an end to deal treacherously arriving at a full stature in treachery, Isa. 33: 1. Secondly, Children fill up the measure of their fathers' sins when they are gone, if they persist in the same, or the like. That national guilt which brings national ruin, is made up of the sin of many in several ages, and in the successions of societies there is a score going on; for God justly visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children that tread in the steps of it. Thirdly, Persecuting Christ and his people and ministers; is a sin that fills the measure of a nation's guilt sooner than any other. This was it that brought wrath without remedy on the fathers, (2 Chron. 36: 16.) and wrath to the utmost on the children too, 1 Thess. 2: 16. This was that fourth transgression, of which, when added to the other three, the Lord would not turn away the punishment, Amos 1: 3, 6, 9, 11, 13. Fourthly, It is just with God to give those up to their own hearts' lusts, who obstinately persist in the gratification of them. Those who will run headlong to ruin, let the reins be laid on their neck; and it is the saddest condition a man can be in on this side hell.

[2.] He proceeds to give them up to ruin as irrecoverable, v. 33. These are strange words from the mouth of Christ, into whose lips grace was poured. But He can and will speak terror, and in those words He explains and sums up the eight woes He had denounced against the scribes and Pharisees.

Here is, First, the description; Ye serpents. Doth Christ call names? Yes, but this doth not warrant us to do so. He infallibly knew what was in man, and knew them to be subtle as serpents cleaving to the earth, feeding on dust; they had a specious outside, but were within malignant, had poison under their tongues; the seed of the old serpent. They were a generation of vipers; they, and those that went before them, they, and those that joined with them, were envenomed, enraged, spiteful adversaries to Christ and his Gospel. They loved to be called of men, Rabbi, rabbi, but Christ calls them serpents and vipers; for He gives men their true characters, and delights to put contempt on the proud.

Secondly, Their doom. He represents their condition as very sad and desperate; How can ye escape the damnation of hell? Christ Himself preached hell and damnation, for which his ministers have often been reproached by those that care not to hear of it. Note, 1. The dam-and rejoicing, because a miracle was there performed." The same is said of the tomb of Esther. Benjamin of Tudela says, "Before one of the synagogues are the tombs of Mordecai and Esther." The opinion was prevalent, at that time, that the souls of the dead hovered about the tombs which inclosed the bodies, and that help from God could be obtained with more facility by their intercession. The sepulchre of Moses was concealed, lest this folly should take place." YTRINGA.

ance; 'Ye are a generation of vipers,' not likely to escape the damnation of hell; one would think it should follow, 'Therefore you shall never have a prophet sent to you any more;' but no, 'Therefore I will send unto you prophets, to see if you will yet at length be wrought upon, or else to leave you inexcusable, and to justify God in your ruin.' It is therefore ushered in with a note of admiration, behold! Observe,

It is Christ that sends them; I send. By this, He avows Himself to be God, having power to gift and commission prophets. It is an act of kingly office; He sends them as ambassadors to treat with us about the concerns of nation of hell will be the fearful end of all impenitent sinners. This doom, coming from Christ, was more terrible than coming from all the prophets and ministers that ever were; for He is the Judge into whose hands the keys of hell and death are put, and his saying they were damned, made them so. 2. There is a way of escaping this damnation implied here; some are delivered from the wrath to come. 3. Of all sinners, those who are of the spirit of the scribes and Pharisees are least likely to escape this damnation; for repentance and faith are necessary to that escape; and how will they be brought to these, who are so conceited of themselves, and so prejudiced against Christ and his Gospel, as they were? How could they be healed and saved, who would not bear to have their wound searched, nor the balm of Gilead applied? Publicans and harlots, who were sensible of their disease, and applied to the Physician, were more likely to escape the damnation of hell than those, who, though they were in the high road to it, were confident they were in the way to heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26-33. There is no tracing all the absurdities of 'blind guides' and hypocritical professors of religion. In general, they inculcate a peculiar regard to the gold of the temple and to the oblations; in which their own interest and credit are more concerned, than in the purity of doctrine, and the due administration of sacred ordinances. They often teach men to trifle with oaths, subscriptions, and solemn engagements; and to disregard important duties, in order to attend on comparatively little matters, which distinguish them from other parties. But they must be 'blind guides,' who on any pretence, by doctrine or example, teach men to neglect the weightier matters of the law, and dispense with justice, mercy, and truth, that they may draw their attention to disputed sentiments, forms, and external observances, and thus 'strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.' The important matters ought surely first to be attended to: yet the others ought not to be left undone, provided they be agreeable to the word of God.—Too many, who seem to be religious, cleanse only 'the outside' by a decent behavior before men; whilst their hearts are full of covetousness, pride, sensuality, malice, and all uncleanness; their secret actions are infected by these evils, and all their duties corrupted with them. But let us seek to have our 'hearts washed from wickedness, that evil thoughts may not lodge within;' and then our outward conduct will become clean also. Otherwise we shall be like painted sepulchres; and God will at length lay us open, and expose the filthiness contained within to the view of the whole world.—We should, however, at the same time, recollect, that religion must be very valuable, to be thus worth counterfeiting. A hypocrite could not make so good a mask of the appearance, if the reality were not sterling gold in the secret judgment of men in general. Indeed this appears by the conduct of many wicked men, who hate the living servants of God, yet honor the memories of those who lived in other ages and nations. They are ready to build their sepulchres, or be lavish in their commendation; but not to copy their examples, or to profit by their instructions. Thus, notwithstanding their avowed respect to their memories, and exclamations against their persecutors, they continually testify against themselves, that 'they are the children of those who killed the prophets;' and their temper and conduct often evince it to their own consciences; and when the whole shall be made known, the severest language, and most tremendous sentence, of the Judge against them, will appear most just and reasonable, nor will there be any possible way for them of 'escaping the damnation of hell.'

It has been before observed, that there are reasons, which may induce us to think, that Zechariah the prophet is here meant. (Note, Zech. 1:1.) But it is objected, that 'this Zechariah could not be one of the minor prophets: he lived when the temple was in ruins, and neither altar nor temple were set up again.' Whitby. Dr. Hammond makes the same objection. Now the fact is, that the altar was set up immediately after the Jews came from Babylon. (Ezra 3:2.) and the temple was finished in the sixth year of Darius. (Ezra 4:14, 15.) No prophecy indeed of Zechariah is expressly dated later than the fourth year of Darius; (Zech. 7:1.) but nothing is said of his death; he delivered many important prophecies, recorded in the latter part of his book, which are not dated; he was a young man, in the second year of Darius; (Zech. 2:4.) there is great reason to think that he lived many years afterwards; and certainly some of his concluding prophecies were exceedingly calculated to exasperate the hypocritical Jews. A second objection against this, (that Zechariah the son of 'Jehoiada is meant,' is, that he being slain by Joash so long ago, could not fitly be set down as the last of that catalogue whose blood brought down judgment on the Jews; it being reasonable that beginning so high as righteous Abel, the speech should descend much lower than Zechariah; and it is not easy to give a probable answer to this.) Hammona. 'All the martyrs from Abel to Zechariah, seems to have been a proverb; and it might naturally arise from observing, that Abel was the first, and Zechariah in Chronicles the last eminently good man, of whose murder the Scripture speaks.' Doddridge. (Note, Chron. 24:19-22.) But here is not the shadow of a proof, that such a proverb was used; and it is worthy of notice, that the Old Testament in general terms speaks of the prophets being murdered; but mentions very few particular instances. In fact, I cannot recollect a single specified instance from Abel to Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada; and but one after him, namely, Urijah the son of Shemaiah. (Jer. 26:20-23.) This shows, that the silence of the Scripture respecting Zechariah, the son of Baruch, is no conclusive proof that he was not martyred, and the other Zechariah might more properly be called the first eminently good man, whom the Jews, as distinguished from the kingdom of Israel, murdered, than the last; as we have reason to conclude, that far greater numbers were slain between his time and the Babylonian captivity, than before his days; that is, in Judah. 'When Jeremiah introduced the Jews speaking thus, "Behold, O Lord, &c." (Lam. 2:20.) the Targum introduces the house of judgment answering, Was it fit for you, even in the day of propitiation, to kill a priest and a prophet, as you did Zechariah, the son of Iddo, in the house of the sanctuary of the Lord, because he would have withdrawn you from your evil ways?' Whitby. Whatever the compilers of this Targum meant, it is plain, that a tradition prevailed when it was written, that one Zechariah, the son of Iddo, had been thus slain. Now Zechariah, the son of Baruch, is repeatedly called the son of Iddo; but Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, is never called so. (Ezra 5:1. 6:14. Zeph. 1:1,7.)

Zecharias, the father of John Baptist, as others say; but, as is most probable, Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, who was slain in the court of the Lord's house; 2 Chron. 24: 20, 21. His father is called Barachias, which signifies much the same with Jehoiada; and it was usual among the Jews for the same person to have two names; whom ye slew, ye of this nation, though not of this generation. This is specified, because the requiring of that is particularly spoken of, (2 Chron. 24: 22) as that of Abel's is. The Jews imagined that the captivity had sufficiently atoned for that guilt; but Christ lets them know that it was not yet fully accounted for, but remained on score. And some think that this is mentioned with a prophetic hint, for there was one Zecharias, the son of Baruch, whom Josephus speaks of, (De Bello Judaico, lib. 5. cap. 1.) who was a just and good man, killed in the temple, a little before it was destroyed by the Romans. Archbishop Tillotson thinks that Christ both alludes to the history of the former Zecharias in Chronicles, and kill and crucify them. It is no less than the life-blood that they thirst after; their lust is not satisfied with any thing short, Exod. 15: 9. They killed the two James's, crucified Simon, son of Cleophas, and scourged Peter and John; thus did the members partake of the sufferings of the Head; He was killed and crucified, and so were they. Christians must expect to resist unto blood.

2. Their unwearied industry; Ye shall persecute them from city to city. As the apostles went from city to city, to preach the Gospel, the Jews haunted them, and stirred up persecution against them, Acts 14: 19. 17: 13. They that did not believe in Judea, were more bitter than any other, Rom. 15: 31.

3. The pretence of religion in this; they scourged them in their synagogues, as a piece of service to the church; cast them out, and said, Let the Lord be glorified, Ps. 66: 5. John 16: 2.

III. He imputes the sin of their fathers to them, because they imitated it, v. 35, 36. Though God bear long with a persecuting generation, He will not bear always; and patience abused, turns into the greatest wrath. The longer sinners have been heaping up treasures of wickedness, the deeper and fuller will the treasures of wrath be; and the breaking of them up will be like breaking up the fountains of the great deep.

Observe, 1. The extent of this imputation; it takes in all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, that is, the blood shed for the goodness' sake, which has been laid up in God's treasury, and not a drop of it lost, for it is precious, Ps. 72: 14. He dates the account from the blood of righteous Abel, called righteous Abel, because he obtained witness from heaven that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts. How early did martyrdom come into the world!

The first that died, died for his religion, and, being dead, he yet speaketh. His blood not only cried against Cain, but continues to cry against all that walk in the way of Cain, and hate and persecute their brother, because his works are righteous. He extends it to the blood of Zecharias, the son of Barachias, (v. 36.) not Zecharias the prophet, (as some would have it,) though he was the son of Barachias, (Zech. 1: 1.) nor foretells the death of this latter in Josephus. Though the latter was not yet slain, yet, before this destruction comes, it would be true that they had slain him; so that all shall be put together from first to last.

2. The effect of it; All these things shall come; all the guilt of this blood, all the punishment of it, shall come upon this generation. The misery and ruin coming on them shall be so very great, that, though, considering the evil of their own sins, it was less than even those deserved; yet, comparing it with other judgments, it will seem to be a general reckoning for all the wickedness of their ancestors, especially their persecutions, to all which God declared this ruin to have special reference and relation. The destruction shall be so dreadful, as if God had once for all arraigned them for all the righteous blood shed in the world. It shall come upon this generation; which intimates that it shall come quickly; some here shall live to see it. Note, The sorer and nearer the punishment of sin is, the louder is the call to repentance and reformation.

IV. He laments the wickedness of Jerusalem, and justly upbraids them with the many kind offers He had made them, v. 37. See with what concern He speaks of that city; O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! The repetition is emphatical, and bespeaks abundance of commiseration. A day or two before, Christ had wept over Jerusalem, now He sighed and groaned over it. Jerusalem, the vision of peace, (so it signifies,) must now be the seat of war and confusion. Jerusalem, that had been the joy of the whole earth, must now be a hissing, and an astonishment, and a by-word: Jerusalem, that has been a city compact together, shall now be shattered and ruined by its own intestine broils. Jerusalem, the place that God has chosen to put his name there, shall now be abandoned to the spoil and the robbers, Lam. 1: 1. 4: 1. But wherefore will the Lord do all this to Jerusalem? Why? Jerusalem hath grievously sinned, Lam. 1: 8.

1. She persecuted God's messengers; Thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee. This sin is especially charged on Jerusalem, because there the sanhedrim, or great council, sat, who took cognizance of church-matters, and therefore a prophet could not perish but in Jerusalem, Luke 13: 33. It is true, they had not now a power to put any man to death, but they killed the prophets in popular tumults, mobbed them, as Stephen, and set on the Roman powers to kill them. At Jerusalem, where the Gospel was first preached, it was first persecuted, (Acts 8: 1.) and that place was the head-quarters of the persecutors; thence warrants were issued to other cities, and thither the saints were brought bound, Acts 9: 2. Thou stonest them; a capital punishment, in use only among the Jews. By the law, false prophets and seducers were to be stoned, (Deut: 13: 10.) under color of which law, they put true prophets Wetstein. Now assuredly this the Jews did evince, inasmuch that (as Josephus says) they permitted no kind of wickedness to be peculiar to those who had preceded them, but had carefully imitated, and even exceeded, all the most atrocious deeds of their ancestors. That there is no hyperbole in these words his own history shows. Wetstein observes, that they contain a prediction of what the Jews should commit and suffer in the temple. He then produces the following passages from Josephus, which are most strikingly illustrative of the predictions. Jos. B. 4: 3, 12. 6: 1, 4. 6: 3. 1: 3. 9: 4. 6: 2, 1. 4: 4, 6, and 5: 1.

'He speaketh of the outward ministry; and, as He was promised for the saving of this people, so was He also careful for it, even from the time that the promise was made to Abraham.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. a, o.—Notes, 4: 5-7, v. 5 Is. 1: 21-24. Es. 22: 3-6. Zeph. 3:

1-4.) Our Lord, with immense tenderness and dignity, declares the miseries, which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were bringing on themselves by crucifying Him; without taking the least notice of the sufferings which He Himself was so soon to endure. The emblem of a hen gathering her chickens under her wings' is similar to what is said, with respect to JEHOVAH, in several places of the Old Testament, (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, Ruth 2: 11, 12.) Nor does all nature afford a more apt emblem of the Savior's tender love, and faithful care of his redeemed people; but his power is also adequate to the confidence imposed in Him. He bore the storm of divine justice against our sins, in order to save us from it; and 'suffered being tempted, that He might succor us when tempted.' He calls sinners to take refuge under his protection; and there keeps them safe, and nourishes them unto eternal life. He had for ages, by his prophets, repeatedly invited the children of Jerusalem, or the Jews, to take shelter under his almighty wings, before He came to call them by his personal ministry; 'but they would not come;' so that their ruin was wholly owing to their obstinate unbelief and rebellion. (Marg. Ref. p.) Does not this language manifestly show, that He who used it was truly 'the Lord God of Israel,' who sent his prophets to that people? Many indeed, during his personal ministry, came to Him for spiritual and eternal salvation; and great numbers afterwards did; but the ruin of the nation was absolutely determined; the temple would soon be levelled with the ground, together with the city; and the Jews would be cast out of the church, and excluded from the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom, till they became willing to submit to Him who came to them 'in the name of the Lord, and to be thankful for his spiritual kingdom and salvation. No doubt but that their present dispersion and unbelief and their future conversion to Christ, are here predicted.

chickens under her wings! Thus kind and condescending are the offers of gospel-grace, even to Jerusalem's children, the little ones not excepted, bad as the inhabitants are.

[1.] The favor proposed, was the gathering of them. Christ's design is, to gather poor souls to Himself, as the Centre of unity; for to Him must the gathering of the people be. He would have taken the whole body of the Jewish nation into the church, and so gathered them all (as the Jews used to speak of proselytes) under the wings of the Divine Majesty. It is here illustrated by a humble similitude; as a hen clucks her chickens together. Christ would have gathered them, First, With such a tenderness of affection as the hen does, which has, by instinct, a peculiar concern for her young ones. Christ's gathering of souls comes from his love, Jer. 31:3. Secondly, For the same end. The hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, for protection and safety, warmth and comfort; poor souls have in Christ both refuge and refreshment. The chickens naturally run to the hen for shelter, when threatened by birds of prey; perhaps Christ refers to that promise, (Ps. 91:4.) He shall cover thee with his feathers. There is healing under Christ's wings; (Mal. 4:2.) that is more than the hen has for her young.

[2.] The forwardness of Christ to confer this favor. His offers are, First, Very free; I would have done it. Jesus Christ is truly willing to receive and save poor souls that come to Him. He desires not their ruin, He delights in their repentance. Secondly, Very frequent; How often! Christ often came up to Jerusalem, preached, and wrought miracles there, and the meaning of all this was, He would have gathered them. He keeps account how often his calls have been repeated. As often as we have heard the sound of the Gospel, or felt the strivings of the Spirit, so often Christ would have gathered us.

[3.] Their wilful refusal of this grace and favor; Ye would not. How emphatically is their obstinacy opposed to Christ's mercy! I would, and ye would not. He was willing to save, but they were not willing to be saved. Note, It is wholly owing to the wicked wills of sinners, that they are not gathered under the wings of the Lord Jesus. They did not like the terms on which Christ proposed to gather them; they loved their sins, and yet trusted to their righteousness; they would not submit either to the grace of Christ or to his government.

V. He reads Jerusalem's doom; (v. 33, 39.) Therefore behold, your house is left unto you desolate. Both the city and the temple, God's house and their own, all shall be laid waste. But it is especially meant of the temple, which they boasted of, and trusted to; that holy mountain because of which they were so haughty. Note, They that will not be gathered by the love and grace of Christ, shall be consumed and scattered by his wrath; Israel would none of Me, so I gave them up, Ps. 81:11, 12.

1. Their house shall be deserted; Christ was now departing from the temple, and never came into it again, but by his word abandoned it to ruin. They doated on it, would have it to themselves; Christ must have no room or interest there. 'Well,' saith Christ, 'it is left to you; I will never have any thing more to do with it.' They had made it a house of merchandise, and a den of thieves, and so it is left to them. Not long after this, the voice was heard in the temple, 'Let us depart hence.' When Christ went, Ichabod, the glory departed. Their city also was left to them, destitute of God's presence and grace; He was no longer a Wall of fire about them, nor the Glory in the midst of them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31-39. What a lamentable proof of human depravity does the history of the church exhibit! What men have ever hated, persecuted, and murdered, like the prophets and apostles of the Lord? And this has been more frequently perpetrated by professed worshippers of God, than by avowed idolaters; so that the guilt of all 'the righteous blood, which hath been shed from the days of Abel,' will fall, rather on the visible church, than on the world at large. Jerusalem and her children had a great share of this guilt, and their punishment has been made a signal for a warning to all others. But the Christian church, so called, has far exceeded them, the crucifixion of Christ alone excepted; and ere long that generation will arise, on whom the accumulated guilt will fall of all the blood shed by antichristian persecutors of every name, and in every age.

2. It shall be desolate; It is left unto you desolate; it is left a wilderness. (1.) It was immediately, when Christ left it, in the eyes of all that understood themselves, a very dismal place. Christ's departure makes the best furnished, best replenished place a wilderness. (2.) It is the temple, the chief place of concourse; for what comfort can there be where Christ is not? Though there may be a crowd of other contentments, yet if Christ's special spiritual presence be withdrawn, that soul, that place, is become a wilderness, a land of darkness, as darkness itself. This comes of men's rejecting Christ, and driving Him from them.

(2.) It was, not long after, destroyed and ruined, and not one stone left upon another. The lot of her enemies will now become Jerusalem's lot, to be made of a city a heap, of a defended city a ruin, (Isa. 25:2.) a lofty city laid low, even to the ground, Isa. 26:5. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, became desolate. When God goes out, all enemies break in.

Lastly, Here is the final farewell that Christ took of them and their temple; Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh. This bespeaks,

1. His departure. The time was at hand, when He should leave the world to go to his Father, and be seen no more. After his resurrection, He was seen only by a few chosen witnesses, and they saw Him not long, but He soon removed to the invisible world, and there will be till the time of the restitution of all things, when his welcome at his first coming will be repeated with loud acclamations. Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord. Christ will not be seen again till He come in the clouds, and every eye shall see Him; (Rev. 1:7.) and then, even they, who, when time was, rejected and pierced Him, will be glad to come in among his adorers; then every knee shall bow to Him, even those that had bowed to Baal; and even the workers of iniquity will then cry, Lord, Lord, and will own, when his wrath is kindled, that blessed are all they that put their trust in Him. Would we have our lot in that day with those that say, Blessed is He that cometh, let us be with them now, with them that truly worship, and truly welcome, Jesus Christ.

2. Their continued blindness and obstinacy; Ye shall not see Me, that is, not see Me to be the Messiah, (for otherwise they did see Him on the cross,) nor see the light of the truth concerning Me, nor the things that belong to your peace, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh. They will never be convinced, till Christ's second coming convince them, when it will be too late to make an interest in Him, and nothing will remain but a fearful looking for of judgment. Note, (1.) Wilful blindness is often punished with judicial blindness. If they will not see, they shall not see. With this word He concludes his public preaching. After his resurrection, which was the sign of the prophet Jonas, they should have no other sign given them, till they should see the sign of the Son of man, ch. 24:30. (2.) When the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints, He will convince all, and force acknowledgments from the proudest of his enemies of his being the Messiah.

By the parable of a fig-tree, He shows the certainty of the prediction, 32-33. No man knows the day or hour, which shall come suddenly, 34-41. run themselves into confusion Here is,

1. Christ's quitting the temple, and his public work there. He had said, (ch. 23. 38.) Your house is left unto you desolate; and here He made his words good, v. 1. The manner of expression is observable: He not only went out of the temple, but departed from it, took his final farewell of it; and then immediately follows a prediction of its ruin. Note, That house is left desolate indeed, which Christ leaves. Woe unto them when I depart, Hos. 9: 12, Jer. 6: 8. It was now time to groan out their Ichabod, The glory is departed, their defence is departed. Three days after this, the veil of the temple was rent; when Christ left it, all became common and unclean; but Christ departed not till they drove Him away; did not reject them, till they first rejected Him.

II. His private discourse with his disciples. When He left the temple, his disciples left it too, and came to Him. Note, It is good being where Christ is, and leaving what He leaves. They came to Him, to be instructed in private, when his public preaching was over; for the secret of the Lord is not to them that fear Him. He had spoken of the destruction of the Jewish church to the multitude in parables, which here, as usual, He explains to his disciples. Observe,

1. His disciples came to Him, to show Him the buildings of the temple. It was a stately and beautiful structure, one of the wonders of the world. It came short of Solomon's, and its beginning was small, yet its latter end did greatly increase. It was richly furnished with gifts and offerings, to which continual additions were made. They desired Christ to notice these things, either,

CHAP. XXIV. v. 1, 2. According to Josephus, these [the buildings] were exceedingly magnificent and beautiful, and constructed with the greatest stability; so that it was extremely improbable they should be entirely destroyed, except in a very long course of time: no one, therefore, who was not conscious of speaking with divine authority, would have ventured to deliver such a prediction, as that which follows. (See Luke 21:5.) But the Redeemer, with a peculiar dignity, as one conversant with spiritual and heavenly glories, and regardless of exterior splendor, simply assured the disciples, that 'not one stone would be left upon another,' of all this magnificent and stately pile of buildings. When Jerusalem was taken, Titus, the Roman general, desired exceedingly to preserve the temple, either from regard to its sanctity, or as a monument of his victory; but the pertinacity of the infuriated Jews, and the fierce revenge of the soldiers, defeated his purpose. The temple was repeatedly set fire to, contrary to his strict orders and menaces; and at last the fire could not be extinguished: and when it had done its utmost, the residue of the structure was demolished, and the materials removed, in order to search for the treasure which was buried under its ruins: so that, in the event, the very foundations were subverted, and the ground on which it stood was ploughed up. Thus the prophecy received an exact and literal accomplishment, in less than forty years after it was uttered. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—See Luke 21: 6.)

(1.) It is a very common practice in the prophetic writings, to carry on two subjects together, a principal and a subordinate one. In Isaiah, says Lowth, there are no less than three subjects, the restoration of the Jews from Babylonish captivity, the call of the Gentiles to the Christian covenant, and the redemption of man by the Messiah, which are frequently adumbrated under the same figures and images, and are so blended and interwoven together, that it is extremely difficult to separate them from each other. In the same manner, our Savior seems to ah, and even they shall be found liars to Him. They that would not now come at his call, shall then be forced to depart with his curse. The chief priests and scribes were displeased with the children for crying hosanna to Christ; but the day is coming, when proud persecutors would gladly be found in the condition of the meanest and poorest they now trample on. They who now reproach and ridicule the hosannas of the saints, will be of another mind shortly; it were therefore better to be of that mind now. Some make this to refer to the conversion of the Jews to the faith of Christ; then they shall see Him, and own Him, and say, Blessed is He that cometh; but it seems rather to look further, for the complete manifestation of Christ, and conviction of sinners, are reserved to be the glory of the last day.

CHAP. XXIV. v. 1-3. Christ's preaching was mostly practical; yet, in this chapter, we have a prophetic discourse, but of a practical tendency, and intended, not to gratify the curiosity of his disciples, but to guide their consciences and conversations; it is therefore concluded with a practical application. The church has always had particular prophecies, beside general promises, both for direction and for encouragement to believers: but it is observable, Christ preached this prophetic sermon in the close of his ministry, as the Apocalypse is the last book of the New Testament, and the prophetic books of the Old Testament are placed last, to intimate to us, that we must be well grounded in plain truths and duties, and those must first be well digested, before we dive into those things that are dark and difficult; many by beginning their Bible at the wrong end.

(1.) As being greatly pleased with them themselves, and expecting He should be so too. They had lived mostly in Galilee, at a distance from the temple, had seldom seen it, and therefore were the more struck with admiration at it, and thought He should admire, as much as they did, all this glory; (Gen. 31: 1.) and they would have Him divert Himself, after his preaching, and from his sorrow, perhaps, with looking about Him. Note, Even good men are apt to be too much enamored with outward pomp and gayety, and to overvalue it, even in the things of God. The temple was indeed glorious, but, [1.] Its glory was sullied and stained with the sin of the priests and people; that wicked doctrine of the Pharisees, which preferred the gold before the temple that sanctified it, was enough to deface the beauty of all its ornaments. [2.] Its glory was eclipsed by the presence of Christ in it, who was the Glory of this latter house, (Hag. 2: 9.) so that the buildings had no glory, in comparison with that Glory which exelled.

Or, [2.] As grieving that this house should be left desolate; they showed Him the buildings, as if they would move Him to reverse the sentence; 'Lord, let not this holy and beautiful house, where our fathers praised Thee, be made a desolation.' They forgot how many providences, concerning Solomon's temple, had manifested how little God cared for that outward glory which they had so much admired, when the people were wicked, 2 Chron. 7: 21. This house, which is high, sin will bring low. Christ had lately looked on the precious souls and wept for them, Luke 19: 41. The disciples look on the pompous buildings, and are ready to weep for them. In this, as in other things, his thoughts are not like ours. It was weakness, and meanness of spirit, in the disciples, to be so fond of fine buildings. To a great mind nothing is great. Seneca.

2. Christ, hereupon, foretells the utter ruin and destruction that were coming on this place, v. 2. Note, A believing foresight of the defacing of all worldly glory, will help to take us off from admiring and overvaluing it. The most beautiful body will be shortly food for worms, the most beautiful building a ruinous heap. And shall we then set our eyes on that which so soon is not, and look on that with so much admiration, which ere long we shall certainly look upon with so much contempt? See ye not all these things? They would have Christ look on them, and be as much in love with them as they were; He would have them look on them, and be as dead to them as He was. There is such a sight of these things as will do us good.

Christ, instead of reversing the decree, ratifies it, v. 2.

He speaks of it as a certain ruin; 'I say unto hold out the destruction of Jerusalem, which is his principal subject, as a type of the dissolution of the world, which is the under-part of the representation. By thus judiciously mingling together these two important catastrophes, He gives at the same time a most interesting admonition to his immediate hearers, the Jews, and a most awful lesson to all his future disciples; and the benefit of his predictions, instead of being confined to one occasion, or to one people, is by this admirable management extended to every subsequent period of time, and to the whole Christian world.'

PORTRETS.

(2.) 'It seemed exceedingly improbable that this should happen in that age, considering the peace of the Jews with the Romans, and the strength of their citadel, which forced Titus himself to acknowledge that it was the singular hand of God which compelled them to relinquish fortifications, that no human power could have conquered. Chandler justly observes, that no impostor would have foretold an event so unlikely and so disagreeable.'

DODDRIGE.

'The temple was destroyed justly, because of the sins of the Jews mercifully, to take away from them the occasion of continuing in Judaism; and mysteriously, to show that the ancient sacrifices were abolished, and that the whole Jewish economy was brought to an end, and the Christian dispensation introduced.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

'We shall perceive still more the force of the expression, "not one stone shall be left upon another;" if we bear in mind that these king-stones, fifty feet long, twenty-four broad and sixteen thick, Josephus says were bound together with lead, and fastened with strong iron cramps, [See notes, Mark 13: 1.]

Josephus says, 'Cesar gave orders that they should demolish the whole city and temple, except the western wall of the city, and the three highest towers. Phasaelus, Hippicus, and Mariamne; but all the rest was laid so completely even with the ground, by those who dug it up from the foundation, that there was nothing left to make those who came thither believe it had ever been inhabited.'

the foundation they laid, and frightened away the builders. Now this prediction of the final and irreparable ruin of the temple, includes a prediction of the period of the Levitical priesthood and the ceremonial law.

3. The disciples inquire more particularly of the time when it should come to pass, and the signs of its approach, v. 3. Observe,

(1.) Where they made this inquiry; privately, as He sat upon the mount of Olives; probably, He was returning to Bethany, and there sat down by the way to rest Him; the mount of Olives directly faced the temple, and from thence He might have a full prospect of it at some distance; there He sat, and thus passed sentence on the temple and city. We read (Ezek. 11: 23.) of the removing of the glory of the Lord from the temple to the mountain; so Christ, the great Shechinah, here removes to this mountain.

(2.) What the inquiry itself was; v. 3. Here are three questions.

[1.] Some think, they all point to one and the same thing—the destruction of the temple, and the period of the Jewish church and nation, (spoken of ch. 16: 28.) and which would be the consummation of the age, (for so it may be read,) the finishing of that dispensation. Or, they thought the destruction of the temple must needs be the end of the world; for the rabbins used to say, that the house of the sanctuary was one of the seven things for the sake of which the world was made; and they think, if so, the world will not survive the temple.

[2.] Others think their question, When shall these things be? refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the other two to the end of the world; or Christ's coming may refer to his setting up his gospel-kingdom, and the end of the world to the day of judgment. I incline to think their question looked to further than the event Christ now foretold; but it appears, by other passages, that they had very confused thoughts of future events; so that perhaps it is not possible to put any certain construction on their question.

But Christ, in his answer, though He does not expressly rectify the mistakes of his disciples, (that must be done by the pouring out of the Spirit,) yet looks further than their question, and instructs his church, not only concerning the great events of that age, the destruction of Jerusalem, but concerning his second coming at the end of time, which here he insensibly slides into a discourse of, and of that, it is plain, He speaks in the next chapter, which is a continuation of this sermon.

Perhaps they had a general idea, that He would go from them for a time, before He set up his kingdom; that He would at length come in a very glorious manner, according to several intimations which He had given them; that He would then execute the predicted vengeance on his enemies, destroy the temple, terminate that dispensation, and introduce his own glorious reign as the Messiah. Some expositors suppose that to be the meaning of the phrase translated, 'the end of the world.' (Marg. Ref. h.) But it is difficult to determine what opinions the disciples held at this time concerning that subsequent dispensation: and perhaps they scarcely knew the precise meaning of their own questions; for their views were as yet very obscure and perplexed. Some suppose, that they thought the day of judgment, and 'the end of the world,' should be immediately connected with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and that our Lord did not see good explicitly to undeceive them. Indeed, this is not improbable; for the latter part of the chapter is couched in language very applicable to those events; and it is proper for prophecy to be in some measure obscure, till it is accomplished. The general import, however, of their inquiry was, when the events before intimated would take place; and what signs would indicate their approach. 'Being asked by the disciples, when these things, which He had intimated concerning the desolation of the temple, should take place, He set before them the order of the times, first concerning the Jews, till the destruction of Jerusalem; and then concerning men in general, till the end of the world.' Tertullian. (Marg. Ref.—See Mark 13: 1-8, v. 3, 4. Acts 1: 4-8, c. 7. 3: 19-21.)

End of the world.] 'Or, present age. Abp. Tillotson and many other excellent writers would retain our translation, and suppose here are two distinct questions: What should be the sign of his coming to punish the ungrateful inhabitants of Jerusalem? and What the sign of his final appearance to the universal judgment? And that Christ answers the first question in the former, and the second in the latter [242]

V. 4-31. The disciples had asked concerning the times, When these things should be. Christ gives them no answer to that, for it is not for us to know the times; (Acts 1: 7.) but they had asked, What shall be the sign? and to that He answers fully, for we are concerned to understand the signs of the times, ch. 16: 3. Now the prophecy primarily respects the events near at hand—the destruction of Jerusalem, the period of the Jewish church and state, the calling of the Gentiles, and the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world; but as the prophecies of the Old Testament, which have an immediate reference to the affairs of the Jews and the revolutions of their state, under the figure of them, do certainly look further, to the gospel-church and the kingdom of the Messiah, and are expounded in the New Testament; and such expressions are found in those predictions as are peculiar thereto, and not applicable otherwise; so this prophecy, under the type of Jerusalem's destruction, looks as far forward as the general judgment; and, as is usual in prophecies, some passages are most applicable to the type, and others to the antitype; and toward the close, as usual, it points more particularly to the latter. It is observable, that what Christ here saith to his disciples, tends more to engage their caution than to satisfy their curiosity; more to prepare them for the events that should happen, than to give them a distinct idea of the events themselves. This is that good understanding of the times we should all covet, thence to infer what Israel ought to do: and so this prophecy is of lasting use to the church, and will be so to the end of time; for the thing that has been, is that which shall be, (Eccl. 1: 5, 6, 7, 9.) and the series, connection, and presages of events, are much the same still that they were then; so that upon the prophecy of this chapter, pointing at that event, moral prognostications may be made, and such constructions of the signs of the times, as the wise man's heart will know how to improve.

I. Christ here foretells the going forth of deceivers; Take heed that no man deceive you. They expected to be told when these things should be; but this caution is a check to their curiosity; 'What is that to you? Mind your duty, and be not seduced from following Me.' Those that are most inquisitive concerning the secret things which belong not to them, are most easily imposed on by seducers, 2 Thess. 2: 3. The disciples, when they heard that the Jews, their most inveterate enemies, should be destroyed, might be in danger of falling into security; 'Nay,' saith Christ, 'you are more exposed other ways.' Seducers are more dangerous enemies to the church than persecutors.

Three times in this discourse He mentions the part of the chapter; though where the transition is made, has been much debated. Others have supposed the apostles took it for granted the world was to be at an end when Jerusalem was destroyed; and that Christ was solicitous to undeceive them, as their error might make them so much the more watchful; and therefore answers in ambiguous terms, which might suit either of these events. But it seems much more natural to conclude, that they expected the wicked persecutors of Christ (in which number most of the magistrates and priests were) would by some signal judgment be destroyed; and that hereupon He would erect a most illustrious kingdom, and probably a more magnificent temple, which they might think described in Ezekiel: an expectation they did not entirely quit even to the day of his ascension. See Acts 1: 6. Our Lord, with perfect integrity and consummate wisdom, gives them an account of the prognosticating and concomitant signs of the destruction of Jerusalem; and then, without saying one word of any temporal kingdom to be erected, raises their thoughts to the final judgment, (to which the figures used in the former description might be applied, and sets before them a heavenly kingdom, and eternal life, as the great object of their pursuit. Matt. 25: 34, 46. This I take to be the key to this whole discourse.)

Verse 5.

In the reign of Nero, when Felix was procurator of Judea, such a number of these impostors made their appearance, that many of them were seized and put to death every day. Ep. Porcius. These deceivers, promising the Jews deliverance from the Roman yoke, and temporal dominion, drew after them many followers, and excited great insurrections. This exasperated the Romans: numbers perished miserably, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem were accelerated by these commotions. At the same time, they took off men's attention from the Gospel, and occasioned many to perish by neglecting so great salvation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 23-25. Luke 21: 7-11, 8.)

extraordinary prophecy in this chapter, with deep conviction of the truth of our divine religion, let us apply it to our edification, by considering the events predicted as typical of far more important transactions.—In prospect of the approaching season of final retribution, we must grieve, if we be indeed real Christians, to see such innumerable multitudes deceived into a presumptuous hope and fallacious peace. Wars, insurrections, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, which desolate nations, will also excite our sympathizing concern; yet we should not be too much discomposed at bearing of them; for the Lord is thus carrying on his grand designs, in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy. (See John 14: 1, 27, 28, p. 27.) It is a vain superstition to conclude from such events, that the end of the world is at hand; for they have occurred, again and again, in different ages, to answer some wise and righteous purposes: but we are not competent to know the designs of God, in his mysterious dispensations.—To ungodly men, the most tremendous temporal calamities are but "the beginnings of sorrows" and the prevalence of impiety is, in fact, a far more awful dispensation than any other judgment.

it, even those that were thought to stand fast. Men's knowledge, gifts, learning, eminent station, and long profession, will not secure them; nothing but the almighty grace of God, pursuant to his eternal purpose, will be a protection. Secondly, The safety of the elect, which is taken for granted in that parenthesis, If it were possible, plainly implying that it is not possible, for they are kept by the power of God, that the purpose of God, according to the election, may stand. It is possible for those that have been enlightened to fall away, (Heb. 6: 4, 5, 6.) but not for those that were elected. If God's chosen ones be deceived, God's choice is defeated, which is not to be imagined, for whom He did predestinate, He called, justified, and glorified, Rom. 8: 30. They were given to Christ; and of all that were given to Him, He will lose none, John 10: 28. Grotius will have this to be meant of the great difficulty of drawing the primitive Christians from their religion, and quotes it as used proverbially by Galen; when he would express a thing very difficult and morally impossible, he saith, 'You may sooner draw away a Christian from Christ.'

(4.) The repeated cautions our Savior gives to his disciples to stand on their guard against them, p. 25. He that is told before where he will be assaulted, may save himself, as the king of Israel did, 2 Kings 6: 9, 10. Note, Christ's warnings are designed to engage our watchfulness; and though the elect shall be preserved from delusion, yet it shall be by the use of appointed means, and a due regard to the cautions of the word; we are kept through faith, faith in Christ's word, which He has told us before.

[1.] We must not believe those that say, Lo, here is Christ; or, Lo, He is there, v. 23. We believe that the true Christ is at the right hand of God, and that his spiritual presence is where two or three are gathered together in his name; believe not those therefore who would draw you off from a Christ in heaven, by telling you He is any where on earth; or draw you off from the true church on earth, by telling you He is here, or there; believe it not. Note, There is not a greater enemy to true faith than vain credulity. The simple believes every word, and runs after every cry. Beware of believing.

[2.] We must not hearken to every empiric and pretender, nor follow every

Verses 9-14.

The persecutions, to which the disciples would themselves be exposed, formed the next sign of the times. (Marg. Ref. s.) When these should be excited, many professed believers would be stumbled, and apostatize for fear of suffering; and then, to ingratiate themselves with the persecutors, they would become traitors, and bitter enemies to the Christians, and concur in apprehending them, and exercising cruelties on them. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, 10: 16-23. 13: 20, 21. Mark 13: 9-13.) At the same time, many false prophets would appear among the Christians, as distinct from the false Christs above mentioned, 'speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them.' These would deceive many souls, and bring an additional odium on the cause by their corrupt tenets and practices. (Note, 2 Pet. 2: 1-3.) And, through the prevalence of treachery, injustice, cruelty, and all kinds of wickedness, many, who did not openly apostatize, would become lukewarm: they would lose their apparent zeal for the cause, and love to their brethren, and become shy of them, and afraid of showing them any favor. (Notes, Rev. 2: 2-5, v. 4. 3: 14-16.) Yet some would continue steadfast in the midst of these multiplied and varied difficulties; and they would be preserved from all real evil, and saved for ever. (Marg. Ref. a.) Notwithstanding all these commotions and scandals, the Gospel would soon be preached through the various nations of the Roman empire, and in the different parts of the then known world; for a witness to them, that the Messiah was come, to be 'a Light to lighten the Gentiles,' and 'to be for salvation to the ends of the earth;' and when this should be accomplished, the end of the Jewish church and state would come. 'It appears from the most credible records, that the Gospel was preached in Idumea, Syria, and Mesopotamia, by Jude; in Egypt, Marmarica, Mauritania, and other parts of Africa, by Mark, Simon, and Jude; in Ethiopia, by Candace's eunuch and Matthias; in Pontus, Galatia, and the neighboring parts of Asia, by Peter; in the territories of the seven Asiatic churches, by John; in Parthia, by Matthew; in Scythia, by Philip and Andrew; in the northern and western parts of Asia, by Bartholomew; in Persia, by Simon and Jude; in Media, Carmania, and several eastern parts, by Thomas; through the vast tract from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum, by Paul, as also in Italy, and probably in Spain, Gaul, and Britain; in most of which places Christian churches were planted, in less than thirty years after the death of Christ, which was before the destruction of Jerusalem.' Doddridge. 'The world and Satan furiously raving in no purpose; the Gospel shall be every where propagated, would draw you to serve other gods, or believe in other Christs, for the Lord your God proeth you. But these were lying wonders wrought by Satan, (God permitting him,) 2 Thess. 2: 9. It is not said, They shall work miracles, but, They shall show great signs; they are but a show; either they impose on men's credulity by false narratives, or deceive their senses by tricks of legerdemain, or arts of divination, as the magicians of Egypt by their enchantments.

(3.) Their success.

[1.] They shall deceive many, (v. 5.) and again, v. 11. Note, The devil and his instruments may prevail far in deceiving souls; few find the strait gate, but many are drawn into the broad way. Note, Neither apparent miracles nor multitudes are certain signs of a true church; for all the world wonders after the beast, Rev. 13: 3.

They shall deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, v. 24. This bespeaks, First, The strength of the delusion; many shall be carried away by one that puts up the finger to point us to a new Christ, and a new gospel; 'Go not forth, you are in danger of being taken by them; therefore keep out of harm's way, be not carried about with every wind; many a man's vain curiosity to go forth hath led him into a fatal apostasy; your strength at such a time is to sit still, to have the heart established with grace.'

II. He foretells wars and great commotions among the nations, v. 6, 7. When Christ was born, there was a universal peace in the empire, the temple of Janus was shut; but think not that Christ came to send, or continue, such a peace; (Luke 12: 51.) no, his city and his wall are to be built in troublesome times, and even wars shall forward his work. From the time that the Jews rejected Christ, the sword never departed from their house, because He had given it a charge against a hypocritical nation and the people of his wrath, and by it brought ruin on them.

Here is, 1. A prediction of the events of the day. You will now shortly hear of wars and rumors of wars: every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, Isa. 9: 5. See how terrible it is, (Jer. 4: 10.) Thou hast heard, O my soul, the alarm of wars! Even the quiet, and the least inquisitive, cannot but hear the rumors of war. See what comes of refusing the Gospel! Those that will not hear the messengers of peace, shall be made to hear the messengers of war. God has a sword ready to avenge the quarrel of his covenant, his new covenant. Nation shall rise up against nation, that is, one part or province of the Jewish nation against another; (2 Chron. 15: 5, 6.) so that they shall be destroyed one of another, Isa. 9: 19, 21.

2. A prescription of the duty of the day; See that ye be not troubled. Is it possible to hear such sad news, and not be troubled? Yet, where the heart is fixed, trusting in God, it is kept in peace, and is not afraid, no, not of the evil tidings of wars, and rumors of wars. Be not troubled; Be not put into confusion or commotion. Note, It is against the mind of Christ, that his people should have troubled hearts even in troublous times, and there is need of constant care and watchfulness accordingly.

We must not be troubled, for two reasons:

(1.) Because we are bid to expect this; the Jews must be punished; the justice of God and the honor of the Redeemer must be asserted; therefore all those things must come to pass; the word is gone out of God's mouth, and it

'and they that constantly believe it shall be saved. When Jerusalem shall be utterly destroyed, the church, so far from being desolated, shall be extended to the utmost borders of the earth.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. b-d.)

(9.) Shall deliver you up, &c. 'Peter and John were called before the sanhedrim, (Acts 4: 6, 7.) James and Peter before Herod, (Acts 12: 2, 2.) and Paul before Nero, as well as before Gallio, Felix and Festus.'

DODDRIDGE. 'In the persecution under Nero, Peter and Paul, besides numberless others, suffered martyrdom; and it was, as Tertullian says, a war against the very name.'

Ye shall be hated by all, &c. 'That not only the apostles but all the primitive Christians were in general more hated and persecuted than any other religious sect, is notorious to all acquainted with ecclesiastical history: a fact which might seem unaccountable, when we consider what their temper and conduct was, and how friendly an aspect their tenets had on the security of any government under which they lived. Warburton has shown, that the true reason of this opposition was, that while the different pagan religions, like the confederated demons honored by them, sociably agreed with each other, the Gospel taught Christians, not only, like the Jews, to bear their testimony to the falsehood of them all, but also with the most fervent zeal to urge the renunciation of them as a point of absolute necessity; requiring all men, on the most tremendous penalties, to believe in Christ, and in all things to submit themselves to his authority. A demand which bore so hard on the pride and licentiousness of their princes, and the secular interests of their priests, that it is no wonder they raised such a storm against it; which, considering the character and prejudices of the populace, it must be very easy to do.'

DODDRIDGE. (10.) And shall betray one another. 'Tacitus, speaking of the persecution under Nero, says, "At first several were seized, who confessed, and then, by their discovery, a great multitude of others were convicted and executed."

BURDER. Offended.] 'Will abandon their Christian profession. Thus Phygellus, Hermogenes, Demas, and many more, doubtless, not on record.'

GROSVENOR. 'None are more bitter enemies to true religion than those who have abandoned it: either because God avenges their contempt of the light, by permitting them to fall into the grossest mental darkness; or because they omit nothing that may free them from suspicion of attachment to their former principles.'

11 And *many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many 12 And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.

13 But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.

5:24, 7:15, Mark 13:22, Acts 20:30, 1 Tim. 4:1, 2 Pet. 2:1, 1 John 2:19, 36, 41, Jude 4, Rev. 19:20, Jan. 4:1-4, 5:1-6, Rev. 2:1-5, 3:15-16, 6:10, 10:2, Mark 13:13, Luke 8:15, Rom. 2:7, 1 Cor. 13, Heb. 3:14, 10:39, Rev. 2:10.

more judgments than one to bring down the Jewish power; more vials of wrath must yet be poured out; but one woe is past, more woes are yet to come; therefore sink unto the present burthen, but rather gather in all the strength and spirit you have, to encounter what is yet before you. Be not troubled to hear of wars and rumors of wars; for then what will become of you when the famines and pestilences come? If it be a vexation to be to understand the report, (Isa. 28: 19.) what will it be to feel the stroke, when it toucheth the bone and the flesh? If we be frightened at a little brook in our way, what shall we do in the swellings of Jordan? Jer. 12: 5.

III. He foretells other judgments more immediately sent of God—Famines, pestilences, and earthquakes. Famine is often the effect of war, and pestilence of famine. These were the three judgments which David was to choose one out of; and he was in a great strait, for he knew not which was the worst: but what dreadful desolations will they make, when they all pour in together! Beside war, there shall be,

1. Famine, signified by the black horse under the third seal, Rev. 6: 5, 6. We read of a famine in Judea, not long after Christ's time, which was very impoverishing; (Acts 11: 28, 29.) but the sorest famine was in Jerusalem during the siege. See Lam. 4: 9, 10.

2. Pestilences, signified by the pale horse, and Death on him, and the grave at his heels, under the fourth seal, Rev. 6: 7, 8. This destroys without distinction, and in a little time lays heaps upon heaps.

3. Earthquakes in divers places, or from place to place, pursuing those that flee from them, as in the days of Uzziah, Zech. 14: 5. Great desolations have sometimes been made by earthquakes. In the apocalyptic visions, it is observable, that earthquakes bode good, and no evil, to the church, Rev. 6: 12. Compare v. 15. 11, 12, 13, 19. 16: 17—19. When God shakes terribly the earth, (Isa. 2: 21.) it is to shake the wicked out of it, (Job 38: 13.) and to introduce the Desire of all nations, Hag. 2: 6, 7. But here they are spoken of as dreadful judgments, and yet but the beginning of sorrows, of travelling pains, quick, violent, yet tedious too. Note, When God judgeth, He will overcome; when He begins in wrath, He will make a full end, 1 Sam. 3: 12. When we look forward to the eternity of misery that is before the obstinate refusers of Christ and his Gospel, we may truly say, concerning the greatest temporal judgments, 'They are but the beginning of sorrows.'

IV. He foretells the persecution of his own people and ministers, and a general apostasy and decay in religion, thereupon, v. 9, 10, 12, 13. Observe,

1. The cross itself foretold, v. 9. Note, Of all future events, we are as much concerned, though commonly as little desirous, to know of our own sufferings as of any thing else. Then, when famines and pestilences prevail, then they shall impute them to the Christians, and make that a pretence for persecuting them; Away with Christians to the lions. Christ had told his disciples what hard things they should suffer, but they had hitherto experienced little of it; now, He reminds them, that the less they had suffered, the more there was behind to be filled up, Col. 1: 24.

(1.) They shall be afflicted with bonds and imprisonments, cruel mockings and scourges, as blessed Paul; (2 Cor. 11: 23, 25.) not killed outright, but killed all the day long, in deaths often, killed so as to feel themselves die, made a spectacle to the world, 1 Cor. 4: 9, 11.

(2.) They shall be killed; so cruel are the church's enemies, that nothing less will satisfy them than the blood of the saints, which they thirst after, suck, and shed, like water.

(3.) They shall be hated of all nations for Christ's name's sake, as He had told them before, ch. 10: 22. The world was generally leavened with enmity and malignity to Christians; the Jews, though spiteful to the heathen, were never persecuted by them so as the Christians were; they were hated by the Jews that were dispersed among the nations, were the common butt of the world's malice. What shall we think of this world, when the best men had the worst usage in it? It is the cause that makes the martyr, and comforts him; it was for Christ's sake that they were thus hated; their professing and preaching his name increased the nations so much against them; the devil finding a fatal shock thereby given to his kingdom, and that his time was likely to be short, came down having great wrath.

2. The offence of the cross, v. 10, 12. Satan thus carries on his interest by force of arms, though Christ, at length, will bring glory to Himself out of the sufferings of his people and ministers. Three ill effects of persecution are here foretold:

(1.) False prophets. (2.) False teachers. It appears probable these were Jews, but Rosenmüller interprets this of Christians to whom it may be added, for even in that early age they had begun grievously shall be accomplished in its season. Note, The consideration of the unchangeableness of the divine counsels, which govern all events, should compose and quiet our spirits, whatever happens. God is but performing the thing that is appointed for us, and our inordinate trouble is an interpretative quarrel with that appointment. Let us therefore acquiesce, because these things must come to pass; not only as the product of the divine counsel, but as a mean in order to a further end. The old house must be taken down, (though it cannot be done without noise, and dust, and danger,) ere the new fabric can be erected; the things that are shaken, must be removed, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain, Heb. 12: 27.

(2.) Because we are still to expect worse; The end is not yet, and while time lasts, we must expect trouble; the end of one affliction will be but the beginning of another; or, The end of these troubles is not yet; there must be

(1.) The apostasy of some. When the profession of Christianity begins to cost men dear then shall many be offended; they will begin to quarrel with their religion, sit loose to it, grow weary of it, and at length revolt from it. Note, [1.] It is no new thing (though a strange thing) for those that have known the way of righteousness, to turn aside out of it. Paul often complains of deserters. They were with us, but went out from us, because not truly of us, 1 John 2: 19. We are told of it before. [2.] Suffering times are shaking times; and those fall in the storm, that stood in fair weather, like the stony-ground hearers, ch. 13: 21. Many will follow Christ in the sunshine, who will shift for themselves, and leave Him to do so too, in the cloudy, dark day. They like their religion while they can have it cheap, but, if their profession cost them any thing, they quit it presently.

(2.) The malignity of others. When persecution is in fashion, envy, enmity, and malice are strangely diffused into the minds of men by contagion; and charity, tenderness, and moderation are looked on as singularities. Then they shall betray one another, that is, 'Those that have treacherously deserted their religion, shall hate and betray those who adhere to it, for whom they have pretended friendship.' Apostates have commonly been the most bitter and violent persecutors. Note, Persecuting times are discovering times. Wolves in sheep's clothing will then throw off their disguise, and appear wolves: they shall betray one another, and hate one another. The times must needs be perilous, when treachery and hatred, two of the worst things that can be, because directly contrary to two of the best, (truth and love,) shall have the ascendant. This seems to refer to the barbarous treatment which the several contending factions among the Jews gave to one another; and justly were they left thus to bite and devour one another, till they were consumed one of another; or it may refer to the mischiefs done to Christ's disciples by those that were nearest to them, as ch. 10: 21. The brother shall deliver up the brother to death.

(3.) The general declining and cooling of most, v. 12. In seducing times, when false prophets arise, in persecuting times, when the saints are hated, expect these two things:

[1.] The abounding of iniquity; the world always lies in wickedness, yet there are times in which it may be said, that iniquity doth in a special manner abound; as when violence is risen up to a rod of wickedness, (Ezek. 7: 11.) so that hell seems to be broke loose in blasphemies against God, and enmities to the saints.

[2.] The abating of love; this is the consequence of the former; v. 12. Understand it in general of true godliness, which is all summed up in love; it is too common for professors of religion to grow cool in their profession, when the wicked are hot in their wickedness; as the church of Ephesus in bad times left her first love, Rev. 2: 4. Or, it may be understood more particularly of brotherly love. When iniquity abounds, this grace commonly waxes cold. Christians begin to be shy and suspicious one of another, affections are alienated, distances created, parties made, and so love comes to nothing. The devil is the accuser of the brethren, not only to their enemies which makes persecuting iniquity abound, but of one to another, which makes the love of many to wax cold.

This gives a melancholy prospect of the times, that there shall be such a great decay of love; but, First, It is of the love of many, not of all. In the worst times, God has his remnant that hold fast their integrity, and retain their zeal, as in Elijah's days, when he thought himself left alone. Secondly, This love is grown cold, but not dead; it abates, but is not quite cast off. There is life in the root, which will show itself when the winter is past. The new nature may wax cold, but shall not wax old, for then it would decay and vanish.

3. Comfort administered in reference to this offence of the cross, for the support of the to corrupt the orthodox doctrines. Grotius instances Hymeneus and Philetus, Simon Magus, Carpocrates, Cerinthus, Ebion, and others.

14 And ^bthis gospel of the kingdom ^cshall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; ^dand then shall the end come.

15 When ^eye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of ^fby Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place; (^gwhoso readeth, ^hlet him understand:)

V. He foretells the preaching of the Gospel in all the world; v. 14. Observe here, 1. It is called the Gospel of the kingdom, because it reveals the kingdom of grace, which leads to the kingdom of glory, sets up Christ's kingdom in this world, and secures ours in the other. 2. This Gospel, sooner or later, is to be preached in all the world, to every creature, and all nations are to be disciplined by it; for in it Christ is to be Salvation to the ends of the earth; for this end the gift of tongues was the first fruits of the Spirit. 3. The Gospel is preached for a witness to all nations, that is, a faithful declaration of the mind and will of God, concerning the duty which God requires from man, and the recompense which man may expect from God. It is a record, (1 John 5:11.) a witness, for those who believe, that they shall be saved, and against those who persist in unbelief, that they shall be damned. See Mark 16:16. But how does this come in here?

(1.) It is intimated that the Gospel should be, if not heard, yet at least heard of throughout the then known world, before the destruction of Jerusalem; it at the Old-Testament church should not be quite dissolved till the New-Testament was pretty well settled. Better is the face of a corrupt degenerate church than none at all. Within forty years after Christ's death, the sound of the Gospel was gone forth to the ends of the earth, Rom. 10:13. Paul fully preached the Gospel from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum; and the other apostles were not idle. The persecuting of the saints at Jerusalem helped to disperse them, so that they went every where preaching the word, Acts 8:1, 4. And when the tidings of the Redeemer are sent over all parts of the world, then shall come the end of the Jewish state. Thus, that which they thought to prevent, by putting Christ to death, they thereby procured; all men believed on Him, and the Romans came, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9-15. In this evil world, believers must experience, as well as witness, afflictions; not only in common with other men, but many peculiar to themselves. If we escape persecution, we must expect contempt, reproach, and hatred. This sharp trial is often increased, by our being called to weep over such as are fallen, and to tremble for ourselves lest we also be offended.—Apostates often prove the most treacherous and rancorous enemies of those with whom they formerly associated: for the evil spirit has returned with seven others more wicked than himself; and their last state must be worse than the first. (Notes, 12:43-45. 2 Pet. 2:20-22.) These things loudly call upon us to pray for ourselves and our brethren, and to dread the least beginning of negligence, in attending on the great concerns of our souls.—But besides the greedy wolves, sometimes let loose to waste the flock, men ^dalso arise from among ourselves speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them; ^ewhose pernicious tenets and unholy lives bring still greater scandal on the cause of Christ. (Note, Acts 20:29-31.) When iniquity thus abounds, ^f'the love of many,' nay, of most professors of the Gospel, is apt to wax cold; they grow lukewarm and selfish, devoid of heavenly zeal or brotherly affection; and only warm in fierce disputes and controversies with each other, instead of uniting against their common enemies. Yet, in the midst of all these evils, there is a remnant, who endure every trial, as gold abides the fire; these, and these only, continue unto the end, and are saved, being ^g'kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.'—Notwithstanding all the efforts of earth and hell, and all the evils in the church, the Gospel must be preached in all the world, and with most glorious success through all nations, before ^h'the end come'; and let us endeavor so to understand the prophecies relating to these events, as to know our duty according ⁱ'to the signs of the times' we live in.—While we remember that the abominations of idolatry, within the Christian church, are sure indications of approaching desolations, or spiritual judgments still more to be dreaded, let us learn to separate from the corruptors, and shun all approaches to these corruptions of our holy faith.

SCOTT.

(14.) The world. (Luke 2:1. 4:5. 21:26. Acts 11:28. Rom. 10:18. Heb. 1:6. Rev. 3:10.) It properly signifies the whole inhabitable earth, whether inhabited or not: but it is sometimes used for the Roman empire: (See Luke 2:1.) and is by many restricted to that sens. in this place, perhaps improperly. (Mark 16:15. Col. 1:6, 23.)

VERSES 15-18.

'An abomination' is the scriptural term for idols and idolatry, and in various ways these tended to desolate the church; but 'the abomination of desolation' here signifies, the Roman armies with their idolatrous standards, encamping on the holy ground, which was supposed to extend to some furlongs distance from Jerusalem, on every side. (Marg. Ref. c. f.—Luke 21:20.) This approach of the Roman armies to besiege the city was pointed out to the Christians, as the signal for them to retire to a place of safety, and they were exhorted to apply [246] took away their place and nation. John 11:43. Paul speaks of the Gospel being come to all the world, and preached to every creature, Col. 1:6, 23.

(2.) It is likewise intimated, that, even in times of temptation, trouble, and persecution, the Gospel shall be preached and propagated, and force its way through the greatest opposition, though enemies grow very hot, and many friends very cool. And even then, when many fall by sword and flame, and many do wickedly, and are corrupted by flatteries, yet then the people that know their God shall be strengthened to do the greatest exploits of all, in instructing many; see Dan. 11:32, 33. and see an instance, Phil. 1:12-14.

(3.) That which seems chiefly intimated here, is, that the end of the world shall not be till the Gospel has done its work in the world; then cometh the end, when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father; whe. the mystery of God shall be finished, the mystica body completed, and the nations either converted and saved, or convicted and silenced; then shall the end come, of which He had said before, (v. 6, 7.) not yet, not till those intermediate counsels be fulfilled.

VI. He foretells more particularly the ruin that was coming on the Jews, their city, temple, and nation, v. 15, &c. Here He comes more closely to answer their question concerning the desolation of the temple; and what He said here would be of use to his disciples, both for their conduct and for their comfort, in reference to that great event; He describes the several steps of that calamity, such as are usual in war.

1. The Romans setting up the abomination of desolation in the holy place, v. 15. Now, (1.) Some understand by this, an image, or statue, set up in the temple by some of the Roman governors, which was very offensive to the Jews, provoked them to rebel, and so brought the desolation upon them. The image of Jupiter Olympius, which Antiochus caused to be set on the altar of God, is called, The abomination of desolation, the very word here used by the historian, 1 Mac. 1:54. Since the captivity in Babylon, nothing was, nor could be, more distasteful to the Jews, than an image in the holy place, as appeared by the mighty opposition they made when Herod offered to set up his statue there; but Herod did set up an eagle over the temple-gate; and, some say, the statue of Titus was set up in the temple. (2.) Others choose to expound it by the parallel their minds, that they might understand what they read. 'By the special providence of God, after the Romans under Cestius Gallus, n. a. s. their first advance towards Jerusalem, they suddenly withdrew again, in a most unexpected, and indeed impolitic manner; at which Joseph psestifles his surprise, since the city might then have easily been taken. By this mean, they gave, as it were, a signal to the Christians to retire: which in regard to this admonition they did, save to Pella, and others to mount Libanus, and thereby preserved their lives. Doddridge. 'Josephus also informs us, that when Vespasian was drawing his forces towards Jerusalem, a great multitude fled from Jericho into the mountainous country, for their security.' Bp Porteus. 'Then the Christians fled to Pella, a mountainous country and other places under the government of King Agrippa, where they found safety.' Whittly. (Marg. Ref. g-k.—Notes Mark 13:14-23, v. 14. Luke 17:33-37. 21:20-24.)

would both confirm his prediction, and take off the odium of it. They might likewise from thence gather the time of it—soon after the cutting off Messiah the Prince; the sin that procured it—their rejecting Him, and the certainty of it—it is a desolation determined. As Christ by his precepts confirmed the law, so by his predictions He confirmed the prophecies of the Old Testament, and it will be of good use to compare both together.

Reference being here had to a prophecy, which is commonly dark and obscure, Christ inserts this memorandum, 'Whoso readeth let him understand; whoso readeth the prophecy of Daniel, let him understand that it is to have its accomplishment now shortly in the desolations of Jerusalem.' Note, Those that read the Scriptures should labor to understand them, else their reading is to little purpose; we cannot use that which we do not understand. See John 5:39. Acts 8:30. The angel, that delivered this prophecy to Daniel, stirred him up to know and understand, Dan. 9:25. And we must not despair of understanding even dark prophecies; the great New-Testament prophecy is called a revelation, not a secret. Now, things revealed belong to us, and therefore must be humbly and diligently searched into. Or, Let him understand, not only the Scriptures which speak of those things, but, by the Scriptures, let him understand the times, 1 Chron. 12:32. Let him observe and take notice; so some read it; let him be assured, that, notwithstanding the vain noises with which the deluded people feed themselves, the abominable armies will make desolate.

2. The means of preservation which thinking men should betake themselves to: (v. 16, 20.) Then let them which are in Judea flee. We may take this,

(1.) As a prediction of the ruin itself; that it should be irresistible. It speaks that which Jeremiah so much insisted on, but in vain, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, that it would be to no purpose to resist, but that it was their wisdom to yield and capitulate; so Christ here, to show how fruitless it would be to stand it out, bids every one make the best of his way.

(2.) We may take it as a direction to the followers of Christ what to do, not to say, A confederacy with those who fought and warred against the Romans for the preservation of their city and nation, only that they might consume the wealth of both on their lusts; (for to this very affair the struggles of the Jews against the Roman power, some years before their final overthrow, the apostle refers, (Jam. 4:1-3,) but let them acquiesce in the decree that was gone forth, and with all speed quit the city and country, as they would quit a falling house or a sinking ship, as Lot quitted Sodom, and Israel the tents of Dathan and Abiram; He shows them,

[1.] Whither they must flee—from Judea to the mountains; not the mountains round about Jerusalem, but those in the remote corners of the land, which would be some shelter to them, not so much by their strength as by their secrecy. Israel is said to be scattered upon the mountains; (2 Chron. 18:16.) and see Heb. 11:38. It would be safer among the lions' dens, and the mountains of the leopards, than among the seditious Jews, or the enraged Romans. Note, In times of imminent peril and danger, it is not only lawful, but our duty, to seek our own preservation by all good and honest means; and if God opens a door of escape, we ought to make our escape, otherwise we do not trust God, but tempt Him. There may be a time when even those that are in Judea, where God is known, and his name is great, must flee to the mountains; and while we only go out of the way of danger, not out of the way of duty, we may trust God to provide a dwelling for his outcasts, Isa. 16:4, 5. In times of public calamity, when it is manifest that we cannot be serviceable at home, and may be safe abroad, Providence calls us to make our escape.

[2.] What haste they must make, v. 17, 18. The life will be in danger, in imminent danger, the scourge will slay suddenly; and therefore he that is on the house-top, when the alarm comes, let him not come down into the house, to look after his effects there, but go the nearest way down, to make his escape; and so he that shall be in the field will find it his wisest course to run immediately, and not return to fetch his clothes or the wealth of his house; for, First, Packing up his things would delay his flight. Note, When death is at the door, delays are dangerous; it was the charge to Lot, Look not behind thee. Those that are convinced of their sin and ruin, and, consequently, of the necessity of fleeing to Christ, must take heed, lest, after all, they perish eternally by delays. Secondly, The carrying of his clothes, and his other movables and valuables, would but burthen him, and clog his flight. The Syrians, in their flight, cast away their garments, 2 Kings 7:15. At such a time we must be thankful if our lives be given us for a prey, though we can save nothing, Jer. 45:4, 5. For the life is more than meat, ch. 6:25. Those who carried off least, were safest in their flight. The penniless traveller can lose nothing by robbers. It was to his own disciples that Christ recommended this forgetfulness of their house and clothes, who had a habitation in heaven, treasure there, and durable clothing, which the enemy could not plunder them of. I have all my property with me, said Bios the philosopher, in his flight, empty-handed. He that has grace in his heart, carries his all along with him, when stripped of all.

Now, of all the twelve, John only lived to see this dismal day; the rest needed not to be hidden in the mountains, (Christ hid them in heaven;) but they left the direction to their successors in profession, who pursued it, and it was of use to them; for, when the Christians in Jerusalem and Judea saw the ruin coming on, they all retired to a town called Pella, on the other side Jordan, where they were safe; so that, of the many thousands that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, there was not so much as one Christian. See Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. 3. cap. 5. Thus the prudent man foresees the evil, and hides himself, Prov. 22:3. Heb. 11:7. This warning was not kept private. Matthew's Gospel was published long before that destruction, so that others might have taken the advantage of it; but their perishing through their unbelief of this, was a figure of their eternal perishing through their unbelief of the warnings Christ gave, concerning the wrath to come.

[3.] Whom it would go hard with at that time; v. 19. To this same event that saying of Christ at his death refers, Luke 23:29. They shall say, Blessed are the wombs that never bare, and the paps that never gave suck. Happy are they that have no children to see the murder of; but most unhappy they whose wombs are then bearing, their paps then giving suck; they of all others will be in the most melancholy circumstances. First, To them the famine would be most grievous, when they should see the tongue of the sucking child cleaving to the roof of his mouth for thirst, and themselves by the calamity made more cruel

[15.] Flee to the mountains. For defence as well as refuge, for which purpose we perpetually find the mountains used. There is mention made in Josephus of the hill-fortresses, which were so strong, that Titus thought they would have been impregnable, without the help of God.

[16-18.] Judea. All the southern parts of Palestine, both the plain and the hill countries, which at this time had received the appellation of Judea. Mountains. The countries on the eastern side of the river Jordan.

[17.] Not come down. In the eastern walled cities, the narrowest houses had stairs on the outside, and usually formed continued terraces from one end of the city to the other: which terraces terminated at the gates. So that it was not necessary to come down into the street or the house.

[18.] Turn back. To take up his clothes which he had deposited at the other end of the field, perhaps to work with greater ease, [this adds force to the words,] an image of great liveliness.

away his wrath, no, not if Noah, Daniel, and Job stood before Him. Let it suffice thee, speak no more of that matter, but labor to make the best of that which is; and when you cannot in faith pray that you may not be forced to flee, yet pray that the circumstances of it may be graciously ordered. Christ's bidding them pray for this favor, intimates his purpose of granting it; and in a general calamity we must not overlook a circumstantial kindness, but see and own wherein it might have been worse. Christ still bids his disciples to pray for themselves and their friends, that, whenever they were forced to flee, it might be in the most convenient time. Note, When trouble is in prospect, it is good to lay in a stock of prayers beforehand; they must pray, First, That their flight, if it were the will of God, might not be in the winter, when the days are short, the weather cold, the ways dirty, and therefore travelling very uncomfortable, especially for whole families. Paul hastens Timothy to come to him before winter, 2 Tim. 4: 21. Note, Though the ease of the body is not to be mainly consulted, it ought to be duly considered; though we must take what God sends, and when He sends it; yet we may pray against bodily inconveniences, and are encouraged to do so, in that the Lord is for the body. Secondly, That it might not be on the Sabbath day; not on the Jewish sabbath, because travelling then would give offence to them who were angry with the disciples for plucking the ears of corn on that day; not on the Christian Sabbath, because being forced to travel on that day would be a grief to themselves. This intimates Christ's design, that a weekly Sabbath should be observed in his church, after the preaching of the Gospel to all the world. We read not of any of the ordinances of the Jewish church, which were purely ceremonial, that Christ ever expressed any care about, because they were all to vanish; but for the Sabbath He often showed a concern. It intimates likewise that the Sabbath is ordinarily to be observed as a day of rest from travel and worldly labor; but that, according to his own explication of the fourth commandment, works of necessity were lawful on the Sabbath day, as this of fleeing from an enemy to save our lives: had it not been lawful, He would have said, 'Whatever becomes of you, do not flee on the Sabbath day, but abide by it, though you die by it.' For we must not commit the least sin, to escape the greatest trouble. But it intimates, likewise, that it is very uneasy and uncomfortable to a good man, to be taken off by any work of necessity from the solemn service and worship of God on the Sabbath day. We should pray that we may have quiet, undisturbed Sabbaths, and may have no other work than sabbath work to do on Sabbath days; that we may attend on the Lord without distraction. It was desirable, that, if they must flee, they might have the benefit and comfort of one Sabbath more to help to bear their charges. To flee in the winter is uncomfortable to the body; but to flee on the Sabbath day is so to the soul, and the more so when it remembers former Sabbaths, as Ps. 42: 4.

3. The greatness of the troubles which should immediately ensue; (v. 21.) then when the measure of iniquity is full; then when the servants of God are sealed and secured, come the troubles; nothing can be done against Sodom till Lot is entered into Zoar, and then look for fire and brimstone immediately. The snows, which are then not unfrequent, scarcely continue through the day, except on the mountains; the ice is thin and melts as soon as the sun ascends to any considerable height. The north winds are chill, and the cold, particularly on the mountains, which are covered with snow, is intense. Verses 21, 22.

At the predicted season, there would be such tribulations, for extremity, variety and continuance, as no nation had ever experienced from the beginning of the world, or ever would to the end of it. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Dan. 9: 12. 12: 1. Luke 21: 20—24. v. 22.) For indeed all history cannot furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews: rapine and murder, famine and pestilence, within, fire and sword, and all the terrors of war, without. Our Savior wept at the foresight of these calamities; and it is almost impossible for persons of any humanity, to read the relation of them in [298] in the city plague and famine raged, and (worse than either) faction and division, so that every man's sword was against his fellow; then, and there, it was, that the hands of the pitiful women flayed their own children. Without the city was the Roman army, ready to swallow them up, with a particular rage against them, not only as Jews, but as rebellious Jews. This was the only one of the three sore judgments that David excepted against; but that was it by which the Jews were ruined; and there were famine and pestilence in extremity, besides. Josephus's History of the Wars of the Jews has in it more tragical passages than perhaps any history whatsoever.

(1.) It was a desolation unparalleled, such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be. Many a city and kingdom has been made desolate, but never any like this. Let not daring sinners think that God has done his worst. He can heat the furnace seven times, and yet seven times hotter, and will, when He sees greater and still greater abominations. The Romans, when they destroyed Jerusalem, were degenerated from the honor and virtue of their ancestors, which had made even their victories easy to the vanquished. And the wilfulness and obstinacy of the Jews themselves contributed much to the increase of the tribulation. No wonder that the ruin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin, when the sin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin—even their crucifying Christ. The nearer any people are to God in profession and privileges, the greater and heavier will his judgments be on them, if they abuse those privileges, and he false to that profession, Amos 3: 2.

(2.) It was a desolation which, if it should continue long, would be intolerable, so that no flesh should be saved, v. 22. So triumphantly would death ride, in so many dismal shapes, and with such attendants, that there would be no escaping, but, first or last, all would be cut off. He that escaped one sword, would fall by another, Isa. 24: 17, 18. The computation which Josephus makes of those that were slain in several places amounts to above two millions. No flesh shall be saved; He doth not say, 'No soul shall be saved,' for the destruction of the flesh may be for the saving of the spirit in the day of the Lord Jesus; but temporal lives will be sacrificed so profusely, that one would think, if it last a while, it would make a full end.

But here is one word of comfort in the midst of all this terror—that, for the elect's sake these days shall be shortened, not made shorter than what God had determined, (for that which is determined shall be poured upon the desolate, Dan. 9: 27.) but shorter than what He might have decreed, if He had dealt with them according to their sins; shorter than what the enemy designed, who would have cut all off, if God, who made use of them to serve his own purpose, had not set bounds to their wrath; shorter than one, who judged by human proba-

'Josephus, without weeping too' Bp. Newton. 'If the misfortune of all, from the beginning of the world, were compared with those of the Jews, they would appear much inferior upon the comparison.' Josephus. 'Is not this precisely what our Savior says, "There shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, nor, nor ever shall be"?' It is impossible, one would think, 'even for the most stubborn infidel, not to be struck with the great similarity of the two passages; and not to see, that the prediction of our Lord, and the accomplishment of it as described by the historian, are exact counterparts of each other, and seem almost as if they had been written by the same person. Yet Josephus was not born, till after our Savior was crucified; and he was not a Christian, but a Jew, and certainly never meant to give any testimony to the truth of our religion.' Bp. Porteus. Eleven hundred thousand Jews are recorded to have perished in this siege; besides immense numbers slain in other parts of the world about the same time. So that 'no flesh could have been saved;' that is, the whole nation must have been extirpated, had these calamities continued much longer. But as God intended to bring forth 'an elect people' in after-ages, of their descendants. He was pleased to shorten these days, and to preserve a remnant of that nation, as a separate people, even to this day. (Marg. Ref. o. p.—Notes, Is. 6: 13. 65: 3—16.) Many learned men explain this last clause, of the Jews who had embraced Christianity; but it does not appear, that the continuance of these tribulations, in the smallest degree, tend to exterminate them; indeed it is not known, that any Christians lost their lives by means of them. The Jews, therefore, and their descendants, who should in any age of the world embrace Christianity, must be meant by 'the elect;' a remnant according to the election of grace. (Notes, Mark 13: 14—23, p. 20.)

22 And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened.

23 Then if any man shall say unto you, 'Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not.

24 For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders: insomuch that, 'if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.

the Gospel in the world, about the time of these great events; v. 27, 28. It comes in here, as an antidote against the poison of those seducers that said, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, He is there; compare Luke 17:23, 24. Hearken not to them, for the coming of the Son of man will be as the lightning.

1. It seems primarily to be meant of his coming to set up his spiritual kingdom in the world; where the Gospel came in its light and power, there the Son of man came, and in a way quite contrary to the fashion of the seducers and false Christs, who came creeping in the desert, or the secret chambers; (2 Tim. 3:6.) whereas Christ comes not with such a spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. The Gospel would be remarkable for two things:

(1.) Its swift spreading; as the lightning; so shall the Gospel be preached and propagated. The Gospel is light; (John 3:19.) and it is not in this as the lightning, that it is a sudden flash, and away; but it is as lightning in these respects:

(1.) It is light from heaven, as the lightning. It is God, and not man, that sends the lightnings, that they may go, and say, Here we are, Job 38:35. It is God that directs it; Job 37:3. To man it is one of nature's miracles, above his power to effect, and one of nature's mysteries, above his skill to account for, but is from above; Ps. 97:4.

(2.) It is visible and conspicuous as the lightning. The seducers carried on their depths of Satan in the desert, and the secret chambers, shunning the light; heretics were called light-shunners. But truth seeks no corners, however it may sometimes be forced into them as the woman in the wilderness, though clothed with the sun, Rev. 12:1, 6. Christ preached his Gospel openly, (John 18:20.) and his apostles on the house-top, (ch. 10:27.) not in a corner, Acts 26:26. See Ps. 98:2.

(22.) Except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved, &c. ["There were many circumstances which seemed likely to protract and delay the siege. On the one hand, the rebellion of the chiefs, and the departure of Vespasian from Judea, to enter upon the imperial dignity: on the other hand, the obstinacy of the Jewish nation, together with their hatred of the Romans: a successful engagement with Cestius, and the then increased hope of assistance from God, and their countrymen on the other side of the Euphrates; Jerusalem, a city of extreme strength, both by nature and art, and well provided with every requisite for sustaining a long siege: add to this, the counsels of Titus's generals, who advised him to wait for famine to do the work." Josephus. "All these circumstances threatened utter extinction to the Jews, but by the interposition of Divine Providence, affairs took another direction. For, as says Tacitus, the siege did indeed come on, and somewhat than any expected, since the Jewish tyrants fell by mutual slaughter, burnt up their provisions, and miserably deserted places most strongly fortified, of their own accord." Welsheim. It is justly remarked by Grotius, that unless a speedy period had been put to the siege of the city, into which were collected all the worst soldiers, not only of Judea, but also of Galilee and Idumea, and unless the whole war had been finished in six months' time (one season) without doubt, every soul in Judea would have perished either by secret assassins, or mutual slaughter. The consequence of long-protracted hostilities would probably have been the universal destruction of the Jews: first at home by the Romans, who were exceedingly enraged against them; and even by their own countrymen, the Sicarii, zealots, &c. who put a death upon him who did not unite in the same desperate hostility with them. Welsheim. (says Josephus,) who agreed in nothing but in butchering all this war: worthy of being preserved, and were peaceably inclined. But for the preservation of the sound portion, however small, of the Jews, and especially the Christians, God by his providence shortened the duration of the war, as by the same providence, He had before ordained the commencement of it, in order to give the Christians time to escape."] Bloomfield.

hilities would have imagined. Note, [1.] In times of common calamity, God manifests his favor to the elect remnant; his jewels which He will then make up; his peculiar treasure, which He will secure when the lumber is abandoned to the spoiler. [2.] The shortening of calamities is a kindness God often grants for the elect's sake. Instead of complaining that our afflictions last so long, if we consider our defects, we shall see reason to be thankful that they do not last always; when it is bad with us, it becomes us to say, 'Blessed be God that it is no worse; blessed be God that it is not hell, endless and remediless misery.' It was a lamenting church that said, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed; and it is for the sake of the elect, lest their spirit should fail before them, if He should contend forever, and lest they should be tempted to put forth, if not their heart, yet their hand, to iniquity.

And now comes in the repeated caution, which was opened before, to take heed of being insinuated by false Christs, and false prophets, (v. 23, &c.) who would promise them deliverance, as the lying prophets in Jeremiah's time, (Jer. 14:13. 23:16. 17:27. 28:2.) but would delude them. Times of great trouble are times of great temptation, and therefore we have need to double our guard then. If they shall say, Here is a Christ, or there is one, that shall deliver us from the Romans, do not heed them, it is all but talk; such a deliverance is not to be expected, and therefore not such a deliverer.

VII. He foretells the sudden spreading of the Gospel in the world, about the time of these great events; v. 27, 28. It comes in here, as an antidote against the poison of those seducers that said, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, He is there; compare Luke 17:23, 24. Hearken not to them, for the coming of the Son of man will be as the lightning.

(2.) Its strange success in those places to which it was spread; it gathered in multitudes, not by external compulsion, but as it were, by such a natural instinct, as brings the birds of prey to their prey; for where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together, (v. 28.) where the slain are, there is she, (Job 39:30.) where Christ is preached, souls will be gathered in to Him. The lifting up of Christ from the earth, that is, the preaching of Christ crucified, which, one would think, should drive all men from Him, will draw all men to Him, (John 12:32.) according to Jacob's prophecy, that to Him shall the gathering of the people be, Gen. 49:10. See Isa. 60:8. Eagles are said to have a strange sagacity and quickness of scent to find out the prey, and then fly swiftly to it, Job 9:26. So those, whose spirits God shall stir up, will be effectually drawn to Jesus Christ, and as eagles will distinguish what is

The artifice of man, and the power of Satan, if permitted, can doubt less produce effects which appear miraculous, though they will not bear to be compared with the incontestable miracles wrought by Christ and his apostles. (Marg. Ref. q-a.-Notes. Deut. 13:1-5. 2 Thes. 2:8-12, v. 9, 10.) Professed Christians in general cannot here be meant by 'the elect' for many of these actions were described and apostatized. (Note. 9-14.) Their election of God, and that grace by which He effected his merciful purposes concerning them, were the security of real Christians; and the same cause would secure from fatal deception those, whom 'God had foreknown' and chosen, but who were not yet called to the knowledge of Christ and his salvation. (See Luke 22:31-34, v. 32. John 10:26-31. Rom. 8:23-39. 1 Thes. 1:1-4, v. 3, 4. 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. 1 Pet. 1:3-5.) The arguments against this interpretation, which some learned men have used, go on the erroneous suppositions, that all the elect know themselves to be so; that there are other methods of 'making our calling and election sure,' and possessing 'the full assurance of hope unto the end,' besides vigilance and diligence in every duty and means of grace; and that God preserves his elect, without their own willing concurrence, instead of 'working in them to will and to do of his good pleasure,' and so exciting in us 'to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling.' (See John 6:36-40. Phil. 2:12, 13. 2 Pet. 1:10, 11.) The instances in Scripture, in which this expression, 'if it be possible,' is used, are not many; but they all imply that the persons spoken of, at least doubted, whether it would be possible for them to obtain their requests, or accomplish their purposes, in the thing might not be in itself impossible. The Jews were so corrupt and degenerate, that they were become a carcass, obnoxious to the righteous judgment of God: they were also so factious and seditious, and every way so provoking to the Romans, that they had made themselves obnoxious to their resentments, and an inviting prey to them. [2.] The Romans were as an eagle, and the ensign of their armies was an eagle. The army of the Chaldeans is said to fly as the eagle that hasteth to eat, Hab. 1:8. The ruin of the New-Testament Babylon is represented by a call to the birds of prey to come and feast on the slain, Rev. 19: 17, 18. Notorious malefactors have their eyes eaten out by the young eagles, Prov. 30: 17. The Jews were hung up in chains, Jer. 7: 33. 16: 4. [3.] The Jews can no more preserve themselves from the Romans, than the carcass can secure itself from the eagles. [4.] The destruction shall find out the Jews, wherever they are, as the eagle scents the prey. Note, When a people by their sin make themselves carcasses, putrid and loathsome, nothing can be expected, but that God should send eagles among them, to devour and destroy them.

3. It is very applicable to the day of judgment, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in that day, and our gathering together unto Him, 2 Thess. 2: 1. Now see here,

(1.) How He shall come; as the lightning. The time was now at hand, when He should depart out of the world, to go to the Father. Therefore those that inquire after Christ must not go into the desert or the secret places, nor listen to every one that beckons them to a sight of Christ; but let them look up, for the heavens must contain Him, and thence we look for the Saviour (Phil. 3: 20.) He shall come in the clouds, as the lightning doth, and every eye shall see Him, as they say it is natural for all living creatures to turn their faces toward the lightning, Rev. 1: 7. Christ will appear to all the world, from one end of heaven to the other; nor shall any thing be hid from the light and heat of that day.

(2.) How the saints shall be gathered to Him; as the eagles are to the carcass by natural instinct, and with the greatest swiftness and alacrity imaginable. Saints, when they shall be fetched to glory, will be carried as on eagles' wings, Exod. 19: 4. They shall mount up with wings, like eagles, and, like them, renew their youth.

VIII. He foretells his second coming at the end of time, v. 29, 30, 31. The sun shall be darkened, &c.

1. Some understand this only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation; the darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, denotes the eclipse of the glory of that state, its convulsions, and the general confusion that attends that desolation. Great slaughter and devastation are in the Old Testament thus set forth; (as Isa. 13: 10. 34: 4. Ezek. 32: 7. Joel 2: 31.) or by the sun, moon, and stars, may be meant the temple, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, which should all come to ruin. The sign of the Son of man, (v. 30.) means a signal appearance of the power and justice of the Lord Jesus in it, avenging his own blood on them that imprecated the guilt of it on them and their children; and the gathering of the elect, (v. 31.) signifies the delivering of a remnant from this sin and ruin.

2. It seems rather to refer to Christ's second coming. The destruction of the particular enemies of the church was typical of the complete con-proper for them from that which is not; so those who have spiritual senses exercised, will know the voice of the good shepherd from that of a thief and a robber. This is applicable to the desires that are wrought in every gracious soul after Christ, and communion with Him. A living principle of grace is a kind of natural instinct in all the saints, drawing them to Christ.

2. Some understand these verses of the coming of the Son of man to destroy Jerusalem, Mal. 3: 1, 2, 5. So much was there of an extraordinary display of divine power and justice in that event, that it is called the coming of Christ.

Now here are two things intimated concerning it.

(1.) That to the most it would be as unexpected as a flash of lightning, which indeed gives warning of the clap of thunder which follows, but is itself surprising.

(2.) That it might be as justly expected as that the eagle should fly to the carcasses; though they put far from them the evil day, yet the desolation will come as certainly, as the birds of prey to a dead carcass in the open field. [1.]

[2.] That there shall be then a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies; v. 29. The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun, from whom she borrows her light, is turned into darkness, she must fail of course. The stars shall fall; they shall lose their light, and disappear, and be as if they were fallen; and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. This intimates,

1st, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new. Then shall be the restitution of all things, when the heavens shall not be cast away as a rag, but changed as a resture, to be worn in a better fashion, Ps. 102: 26. They shall pass away with a great noise, that there may be new heavens, 2 Pet. 3: 10, 13.

2dly, It shall be a visible change, such as shall be noticed of all the world; like the darkening of the sun and moon, an amazing change; for the heavenly bodies are not so liable to alteration as the creatures of this lower world. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, express that which is lasting and unchangeable; (as Ps. 89: 29, 36, 37.) yet they shall thus be shaken.

3dly, It shall be a universal change. If the sun be turned into darkness, and the powers of heaven be shaken, the earth cannot but be turned into a dungeon, and its foundation made to tremble. Hovel, fir-trees, if the cedars be shaken. When the stars of heaven drop, no marvel if the everlasting mountains melt, and the perpetual hills bow. Nature shall sustain a general shock and convulsion, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of quest of them all; and therefore what was done really, at the great day, may be applied metaphorically to those destructions: but still we must attend to the principal scope of them; and, while we are all agreed to expect Christ's second coming, what need is there to put such strained constructions, as some do, on these verses, which speak of it so clearly, and so agreeably to other Scriptures, especially when Christ is here answering an inquiry concerning his coming at the end of the world, which Christ was never shy of speaking of to his disciples?

The only objection against this, is, that it is said to be immediately after the tribulation of those days; but, as to that, (1.) It is usual, in the prophetic style, to speak of things great and certain as near and just at hand, only to express the greatness and certainty of them. Enoch spake of Christ's second coming as within ken, Behold, the Lord cometh, Jude 14. (2.) A thousand years are, in God's sight, but as one day, 2 Pet. 3: 8. It is there urged, with reference to this very thing, and so it might be said to be immediately after. The tribulation of those days includes not only the destruction of Jerusalem, but all the other tribulations which the church must pass through; while the nations are torn with wars, and the church with schisms, delusions, and persecutions, we cannot say that the tribulation of those days is over; but when the church's tribulation is over, her warfare accomplished, and what is behind of the sufferings of Christ filled up, then look for the end.

Now, concerning Christ's second coming, it is here foretold,

[1.] That there shall be then a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies; v. 29. The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun, from whom she borrows her light, is turned into darkness, she must fail of course. The stars shall fall; they shall lose their light, and disappear, and be as if they were fallen; and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. This intimates,

1st, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new. Then shall be the restitution of all things, when the heavens shall not be cast away as a rag, but changed as a resture, to be worn in a better fashion, Ps. 102: 26. They shall pass away with a great noise, that there may be new heavens, 2 Pet. 3: 10, 13.

2dly, It shall be a visible change, such as shall be noticed of all the world; like the darkening of the sun and moon, an amazing change; for the heavenly bodies are not so liable to alteration as the creatures of this lower world. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, express that which is lasting and unchangeable; (as Ps. 89: 29, 36, 37.) yet they shall thus be shaken.

3dly, It shall be a universal change. If the sun be turned into darkness, and the powers of heaven be shaken, the earth cannot but be turned into a dungeon, and its foundation made to tremble. Hovel, fir-trees, if the cedars be shaken. When the stars of heaven drop, no marvel if the everlasting mountains melt, and the perpetual hills bow. Nature shall sustain a general shock and convulsion, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of

The apostles were here cautioned, and instructed to caution the converts to Christianity to disregard all the reports, which were circulated to this effect: whether they were informed, that the Messiah was in the desert, waiting to be joined by the people, in order to march for the deliverance of Jerusalem; or whether He was said to be in some 'secret chamber,' among his friends, and about to make his more public appearance. We find from history that such deceivers actually arose, some collecting followers in the wilderness, and others caballing with their adherents in secret chambers; and that they greatly accelerated and aggravated the ruin of their country. Josephus mentions one of 'these pretenders, who declared to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that God commanded them to go up into some particular part of the temple, and there they should receive the signs of deliverance. A multitude of men, women, and children went up accordingly; but instead of deliverance, the place was set on fire by the Romans, and six thousand perished miserably in the flames, or by endeavoring to escape them.' Bp. Porteus. The Christians, if they had not been forewarned, might have been deceived on another ground; for they expected their Lord to come, not to deliver, but to destroy Jerusalem; they were therefore reminded that his coming, for this purpose, would not be secret, or local; but like the 'lightning, which shineth' at once from east to west; for in his righteous providence, He would, with conspicuous and irresistible energy, desolate the whole land. The Roman armies entered Judea by the east, and carried their victorious ravages to the west, in a very rapid and tremendous manner. Our Lord further aided, 'Wherever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.' The Jewish nation, spiritually dead and about to be given up to destruction, was the carcass, which was doomed to be the prey of the Roman armies: these were represented by the most ravenous birds of prey, to denote their force and fury, and perhaps because they had eagles for their standards. The history of those times records the multiplied massacres and devastations of the Jews, in different parts of the world; as if they had attracted the destroying sword of the Romans, wherever they resided, or whithersoever they flit for safety. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. 28: 49—57 Job 39: 26—30.) SCOTT

28 For whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.

[Practical Observations.]

29 ¶ Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken:

1 Deut. 28:49, Job 39:27-30. Jer. 16:16. Am. 9:1-4. Luke 17:37. e. 6. Mark 13:24, 25. 4 Is. 13:10. 34:23. Jer. 4:23-28. Ez. 32:7, 8. Joel 2:30, 31. 3:15. Am. 5: 20. Zeph. 1:14, 15. Luke 21:25, 26. Acts 2:19, 20. Rev. 6:12-17.

6thly, The sun and moon shall be then darkened, because there will be no more occasion for them. To sinners that choose their portion in this life, all comfort will be eternally denied; as they shall not have a drop of water, so not a ray of light. Now God causeth his sun to rise on the earth, but then darkness must be their portion. To the saints that had their treasure above, such light of joy and comfort will be given, as shall supersede that of the sun and moon. What need is there of vessels of light, when we come to the Fountain and Father of light? See Isa. 60: 19. Rev. 22: 5.

[2.] That then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, v. 30. At his first coming. He was set for a sign that should be spoken against; (Luke 2: 34.) but, at his second coming, a sign that should be admired. Ezekiel was a son of man, set for a sign, Ezek. 12: 6. Some make this a prediction of the harbingers and forerunners of his coming, a light shining before Him, and the fire devouring. (Ps. 50: 3. 1 Kings 19: 11, 12.) the beams coming out of his hand, where had long been the hiding of his power, Hab. 3: 4. It is a groundless conceit of some of the ancients, that this sign of the Son of man will be the sign of the cross displayed as a banner. It will certainly be such a clear convincing sign, as will dash in fidelity quite out of countenance, and fill their faces with shame, who said, Where is the promise of his coming?

[3.] That then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, v. 30. See Rev. 1: 7. 'All the kindreds of the earth shall then wail because of Him; some of all tribes and kindreds; for the greater part will tremble at his approach, while the chosen remnant, one of a family and two of a tribe, shall lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, and their Redeemer. Note, Sooner or later, all sinners will be mourners: penitent sinners after a godly sort; impenitent sinners after a devilish sort, in endless horror and despair.

[4.] That then they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. Note, 1st, The judgment of the great day will be committed to the Son of man, both in pursuance, and in recompense, of his great undertaking for us as Mediator, John 5: 22, 27. 2dly, The Son of man will at that day come in the clouds of heaven. Christ went to heaven in a cloud, and will in like manner come again, Acts 1: 9, 11. Behold He cometh in the clouds, Rev. 1: 7. A cloud will be the Judge's chariot, (Ps. 104: 3.) his robe, (Rev. 10: 1.) his pavilion, (Ps. 18: 11.) his throne, Rev. 14: 14. When the world was destroyed by water, the judgment came in the clouds of heaven, for the windows

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16-23. If the danger of temporal calamities render it reasonable for men to leave all and flee for their lives, how proper is it for us to forsake all, 'that we may win Christ,' and be 'delivered from the wrath to come!' He that believes will take warning, and without delay 'flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before him;' but the unbeliever, having been often warned in vain, will at length perish without remedy. (Note, Prov. 29: 1.)—If a man would rather save his life, without money or clothes, than be slain in going back to fetch them, what is he profited, who gains the whole world, and loses his own soul? (See Luke 24-23, v. 26.) We should then avoid even those lawful things, which have an evident or a probable tendency to prevent our eternal good: and we ought to pray earnestly to the great Disposer of events, 'to keep us from all things hurtful to our salvation, and give us all things profitable to the same.' The greatest tribulation which ever was or ever shall be witnessed on earth, befel those who 'crucified the Lord of glory,' and persisted in rejecting his Gospel. How then shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation, as is set before us in his Word! The future punishment of un-believers will doubtless be so dire, that all the complicated miseries ever known on earth cannot give us an adequate idea of it: nor will the days of that only evil be shortened; as none of the elect will be exposed to it, that for their sake it should be mitigated or terminated. Let us then 'give diligence to make our calling and election sure;' then we may know that no enemy or deceiver shall ever prevail against us; and 'let us abide in Christ, and seek to have his words abide in us,' that we may be aware of the various methods Satan and his instruments will take to impose on us. If we remember what He 'has told us before,' we shall not listen to those deceivers, who, having new modelled the Gospel, cry out, 'Lo, here is Christ!' or, 'lo, He is here!' when in fact He is to be found only in his word and ordinances, and on his 'throne of grace.' Such persons as deal in imposition or pretended miracles, love to perform their exploits in unfrequented deserts, or secret chambers; for their ambiguous performances shrink from investigation, which real miracles have ever challenged. This suffices to convince the judicious Christian, that he ought to disregard them. In whatever way Christ comes, light, not darkness, is his garment: his operations are conspicuous and illustrious: the establishment of his kingdom will illuminate the earth from east to west, and from pole to pole; and wherever the obstinate enemies of his cause are found, there will the executioners of his vengeance be gathered together, with speed and rapacity like the eagles's.

SCOTT.

(23.) Eagle.] The Greek word here used is the same with the Hebrew, (Gen. 15: 11. Is. 13: 6. 46: 11. Ezek. 39: 4.) translated 'fowls,' a ravenous bird, and collectively 'ravenous birds.' But the Sept. does not, in these texts, use the word translated 'eagle' in the N. T., but uniformly applies it in the translation of Job. 39: 27. Lev. 11: 13. Deut. 32: 11. Ezek. 17: 3, 7. Deut. 32: 49. Jer. 4: 13. &c. and Mic. 1: 16. where it is said to have a bald head, and seems to be the 'bearded eagle,' of Linnaeus, called by Bruce the 'golden eagle,' by the Ethiopians 'father long beard,' from a tuft of hair which grows below his beak, and by Salt, 'the African bearded eagle.' The eagle proper is unknown in Palestine—while this bird, a sort of eagle, is common. The assertion, however, of some, that the eagle does not feed on carcasses, is disproved by Michaelis, says Bloomfield. Eo.

It is the opinion of most interpreters, that the prophecy respecting the destruction of Jerusalem, containing an answer to the first and second question of the disciples, closes here, on account of Mark 13: 21. and Luke 21: 25. Christ had spoken thus far of those things which were to precede the destruction of the city. But now follows a poetic description of the overthrow of that and of the Jewish state.

ROSENEM.

Verses 29-31.

The clause, 'Immediately after the tribulation of those days,' restricts the primary sense of these verses to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the events consequent to it. (Marg. Ref. 1. m.—Notes, Is. 13: 9, 10. 34: 3-7. Jer. 4: 19-27, v. 23-25. Joel 2: 23-32, v. 31, 32. Acts 2: 14-21, v. 19, 20.) The darkening of the sun and moon, the falling of the stars, and the shaking of the powers of the heavens, denote the utter extinction of the light of prosperity and privilege to the Jewish nation; the unbinding of their whole constitution in church and state; the violent subversion of the authority of their princes and priests; the abject miseries to which the people in general, especially their chief persons, would be reduced; and the moral or religious darkness to which they would be consigned. This would be an evident 'sign' and demonstration of the Son of man's exaltation to his throne in heaven; whence He would come in his divine providence, as ruling on 'the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory,' to destroy 'his enemies, who would not have Him to reign over them,' at which events 'all the tribes of the land' would mourn and lament, whilst they saw the tokens, and felt the weight, of his terrible indignation. (Marg. Ref. e.g.—Notes, Dan. 7: 13, 14. Rev. 1: 7.) At the same time, He would send forth his angels, (or messengers, the preachers of the Gospel, Marg. Ref. 1. k.) as with a great sound of a trumpet, proclaiming the year of jubilee, 'the acceptable year of the Lord.' Thus He would 'gather his elect' into his church, from every quarter, all over the world. (Marg. Ref. 1. m.—Note, Is. 65: 1-3.) The remarkable appearances in the heavens which attended these transactions, might be alluded to, and the extensive promulgation of the Gospel, about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, was predicted; but the whole passage will have a more literal and far more accurate accomplishment, at the day of judgment. (Notes, Mark 13: 24-31. Luke 21: 25-28.)

(29.) The sun shall be darkened.] It was customary with the prophets, as it still is with the Eastern writers, to describe the utter ruin of states and kindreds, not only in general by a universal darkness, but also by such strong figures as those here used, which all have their foundation in that way of speaking. ered, the chosen remnant, who are but few in comparison with the many that are only called. This is the foundation of the saints' eternal happiness, that they are God's elect. The gifts of love to eternity follow the thoughts of love from eternity; and The Lord knows them that are his. 2dly. The angels shall be employed to bring them together, as Christ's servants, and as the saints' friends; we have the commission given them, Ps. 50: 5. Gather my saints together unto me; nay, it will be said to them, These are your brethren; for the elect will then be equal to the angels, Luke 20: 36. 3dly. They shall be gathered from one end of heaven to the other; the elect of God are scattered abroad, (John 11: 52.) there are some in all places, in all nations; (Rev. 7: 9.) but when that great gathering day comes, there shall not one of them be missing; distance of place shall keep none out of heaven, if distance of affection do not. Heaven is equally accessible from every place. See ch. 8: 11. Isa. 43: 6. 49: 12.

V. 32-51. We have here the practical application of the foregoing prediction; in general, we must expect and prepare for the events here foretold.

I. We must expect them; v. 32, 33. There is a certain series in the works of Providence, as there is in the works of nature. The signs of the times are compared with the prognostics of the face of the sky, (ch. 16: 3.) so here with those of the face of the earth; when that is renewed, we foresee that summer is coming, not immediately, but at some distance; it is coming; 'so likewise ye, when the gospel-day shall dawn, count upon it, that through this variety of events, which I have told you of, the perfect day will come. The things revealed must shortly come to pass; (Rev. 1: 1.) they must come in their own order, in the order appointed for them. Know that it is near.' He does not here say, what, but it is that which the hearts of his disciples are upon, and which they are inquisitive after, and long for; the kingdom of God is near, so it is expressed in the parallel place, Luke 21: 31. Note, When the trees of righteousness begin to bud and blossom, when God's people promise faithfulness, it is a happy presage of good times. In them God begins his work, first prepares their heart, and then He will go on with it; for, as for God, his work is perfect; and He will revive it in the midst of their years.

Now, touching the events foretold here, which we are to expect,

1. Christ here assures us of the certainty of them; v. 35. Note, The word of Christ is more sure and lasting than heaven and earth. See 1. Pet. 1: 24, 25. It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than the word of Christ; so it is expressed, Luke 16: 17. Compare Isa. 54: 10. The accomplishment of these prophecies might seem to be delayed, and intervening events to disagree with them; but do not think that therefore the word of Christ is fallen to the ground, for that shall never pass away: though it be not fulfilled, either in the time or in the way that we have prescribed; yet, in God's time, and in God's way, which are the best, it shall certainly be fulfilled. Every word of Christ is very pure, and therefore very sure.

2. He instructs us as to the time of them, v. 34, 36. As to this, it is well observed by the learned Grotius, that there is a manifest distinction made between these things, (v. 34.) and that day and hour, (v. 36.) which will help to clear this prophecy.

(1.) As to these things—the wars, seditions, and persecutions, here foretold, and especially the ruin of the Jewish nation; 'There are those now alive (v. 34.) that shall see Jerusalem destroyed, and the Jewish church brought to an end.' Because it might seem strange, He backs it with a solemn asseveration; Verily, I say unto you, these things are at the door. Christ often speaks of the nearness of that desolation, the more to affect people, and quicken them to prepare for it. Note, There may be greater trials and troubles yet before us, in our own day, than we are aware of. They that are old, know not what sons of Anak may be reserved for their last encounters.

(2.) But as to that day and hour which will put a period to time, that knows no man, v. 36. Therefore take heed of confounding these two, as they did, who, from the words of Christ, and the apostles' letters, inferred, that the day of Christ was at hand, 2 Thess. 2: 2. No, it was not; this generation, and many another, shall pass, before that day and hour come. Note, [1.] There is a certain day and hour fixed for the judgment to come; it is called the day of the Lord, because so unalterably fixed. None of God's judgments are adjoined, without the appointment of a certain day. [2.] That day and hour are a great secret. No man knows it; nor the wisest, nor the best; nor do even the angels; they dwell at the fountain head of light, and are (30.) In the clouds of heaven. 1. 'Sudden and irresistible destruction, in which much of the hand of God evidently appears, is often expressed by God's coming in the clouds.' Whitley, Comp. Ps. 18: 9. 50: 3, 4. 97: 2. 3. 104: 3. Is. 19: 1. 26: 21. 66: 15. But I think the celestial appearances described by Josephus, lead us into the exactest interpretation of this text, and greatly illustrate the propriety of these expressions here.

'A splendid image, familiar to the Hebrew poets, signifying to come with majesty, &c.'

Verses 32-35.

Our Lord here answers the former part of the apostles' question, concerning the time when these events would take place (3.) In general He assured them, that the approach of them would be as certainly determined, by the signs which He had mentioned, as the approach of summer was by the budding, and the tender branch, of the fig-tree; and that they would all be accomplished, before that generation had passed away. This absolutely restricts our primary interpretation of the prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem, which took place within forty years. To this I^a added, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.' The performance and effects of his words would be found more stable and durable, than the visible creation; which would at length wax old, and vanish away; but not a tittle of his word would fail of its accomplishment, and the effects of it will suit to all eternity. This is as applicable to all the words of Christ as to this prediction, and to every part of the Word of God. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. 102: 25-28. Is. 51: 4-6. 55: 10. Matt. 5: 17, 18. Heb. 1: 10-12. 2. Pet. 3: 10-13. Rev. 20: 11-15.) It is indisputable that the three gospels, in which the substance of this prophecy is given, were extant and widely dispersed, a considerable time before the siege of Jerusalem was begun, and that the Christians, believing the words of their Lord, left Judea and were preserved.

The siege was laid to Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, when they were met at the passover in the midst of their mirth: like the men of Laish, they dwelt careless when the ruin arrested them, Judg. 18:7, 27. (2.) To the eternal judgment; so the judgment of the great day is called, Heb. 6:2. Though notice has been given of it from Enoch, yet, when it comes, it will be unlooked for by most men; the latter days, which are nearest to that day, will produce scoffers, that say, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Pet. 3:3, 4. Luke 13:8. Thus it will be when the world that now is shall be destroyed by fire; for thus it was when the old world, being overflowed by water, perished, 2 Pet. 3:6, 7. Christ here shows what were the temper and posture of the old world when the deluge came.

[1.] They were sensual and worldly, v. 38. It is not said, they were killing and stealing, and whoring and swearing; (these were indeed the horrid crimes of some of the worst of them; the earth was full of violence;) but they were all of them, except Noah, over head and ears in the world, and regardless of the word of God; and this ruined them. Note, Universal neglect of religion is a more dangerous symptom to any people, than particular instances here and there of daring in religion. Eating and drinking are necessary to the preservation of man's life; marrying, and giving in marriage, to the preservation of mankind; but these lawful things undo us, unlawfully managed. First, They were unreasonable and inordinate; wholly taken up with these things; they were in them as in their element, as if they had their being in no other end, (Isa. 56:12.) eating and drinking, when they should have been repenting and praying. This was to them, as to Israel afterwards, the unpardonable sin, (Isa. 22:12, 14.) especially, because, in defiance of those warnings, by which they should have been awakened, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die; if it must be a short life, let it be a merry one.' The apostle James speaks of this as the general practice of the wealthy Jews, before the destruction of Jerusalem; when they should have been weeping for the miseries they were coming upon them, they were living in pleasure, and nourishing their hearts as in a day of slaughter, Jam. 5:1, 5.

[2.] They were secure and careless, v. 39. Know not! Surely, they could not but know. Did not God, by Noah, give them fair warning of it? Did He not call them to repentance while his long-suffering waited? 1 Pet. 3:19

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 29-35. Ere long the expected end shall come: then the 'sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, the stars shall fall from heaven,' and nature seem to expire in convulsions. The tokens of the Savior's coming will be perceived. He will come, with divine power and glory, in the clouds of heaven; and 'all the tribes of the earth shall mourn because of Him' whom now they despise and disobey. But before He executes his righteous vengeance on his enemies, He will employ his holy 'angels to gather his elect' from every part of the earth, as with the sound of a mighty trumpet, that they may 'be forever with the Lord.' It is not for us 'to know the times and seasons' of this grand event: but we may easily perceive the token of our own approaching dissolution. Within the space of thirty or forty years, or probably in a far shorter time, the writer, and most of the readers, of these observations, will have done with all things here below, and be fixed in an eternal and unchangeable state. Let this thought induce us to attend more diligently to the words of Christ and, whilst we meditate on his declarations concerning 'the things which accompany salvation,' on his promises, his denunciations, and his discoveries of the final event, respecting the righteous and the wicked, let us still recollect, that 'heaven and earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away.'

For the complete conquest of Jerusalem, Titus had a triumphal arch erected at Rome to his honor, which still exists. On it are represented the spoils of the temple of God, such as the golden table of the shewbread, the golden candlestick, with its seven branches, the ark of the covenant, the two golden trumpets, &c. On this occasion, a medal was the legend, JUDÆA CAPTA. Senatus Consultus, at the bottom. This is not only an extraordinary fulfilment of our Lord's prediction, but a literal accomplishment of a prophecy delivered about eight hundred years before; (Is. 3:25.) And she desolate shall sit on the ground.

Verse 35.

'The New Testament, given by the inspiration of God,' and handed down uncorrupted from father to son, by both friends and enemies, perfect in its credibility and truth, inexhaustible in its evidences, and astonishingly circumstantial in details of future occurrences, which the wisdom of God alone could foreknow—that New Testament is the record of these predictions. The history of the Romans, written by so many hands, that of the Jews, written by one, of themselves; triumphal arches, coins, medals, and public monuments of different kinds, are the evidence by which the fulfilment of the record is demonstrated.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Some expositors explain these words exclusively of the day of judgment, as being emphatically 'that day'; and the context denotes that Christ intended to lead the thoughts of the hearers, and of those who should ever read this prediction, to that solemn occasion: (Notes, 42-51, 25.) but might not this be done, with reference also to the precise day and hour of Jerusalem's destruction? Even this was not declared either to man or angel, so far as we can learn; but the disciples were warned to expect and be ready for its approach, and to mark the signs which had been given them. (Note, Mark 13:32.) For it would resemble the deluge, in that it was expressly predicted, and some general intimations were given concerning the appointed season when it would take place, with instructions how to escape. Yet men in general would not believe, or take warning; but, being occupied about the employments and satisfactions of life, they would be overwhelmed and destroyed by its unexpected coming; just as the inhabitants of the old world had been by the flood. Even when two persons were in the same place, or about the same business, one of them would be destroyed, and the other escape; as one would be watching and observing 'the signs of the times,' and the other carelessly neglecting them. This is more emphatically applicable to the day of judgment, or the time of death, which is to every one in effect the same thing. (Mrg. Ref., Notes, Gen. 7:10-23. Ez. 9:20, 21. Luke 17:24-37. be like the coming of the deluge, a destruction from which there is no fleeing.

2. It will be a separating day; v. 40, 41. Then shall two be in the field.

Two ways this may be applied.

(1.) We may apply it to the success of the Gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; some believed the things which were spoken, and were taken to Christ; others believed not, and were left to perish in their unbelief. Those of the same age, place, capacity, employment, and condition, those of the same family, nay, joined in the same bond of marriage, were, one effectually called, the other passed by, and left in the gall of bitterness. This is that division, that separating fire, which Christ came to send. Luke 12: 49, 51. This renders free grace the more obliging, that it is distinguishing; to us, and not to the world, (John 14:22.) nay, to us, and not to those in the same field, the same mill, the same house.

When ruin came on Jerusalem, a distinction was made by Divine Providence, according to that which had been before made by divine grace; for all the Christians among them were saved from perishing in that calamity, by the special care of Heaven. Thus the meek of the earth are hid in the day of the Lord's anger, (Zeph. 2: 3.) either in heaven, or under heaven. Note, Distinguishing preservations, in times of general destruction, are special tokens of God's favor, and ought to be acknowledged. If we are safe when

20. But they know not, that is, they believed not; they might have known, but would not know. First, Therefore they were sensual, because they were secure. Note, The reason why people are so eager in the pursuit, and so entangled in the pleasures of this world is, because they do not know, and believe, and consider, the eternity which they are on the brink of. Secondly, Therefore they were secure, because they were sensual; therefore they knew not that the flood was coming, because they were so taken up with things seen and present, that they had neither time nor heart to mind the things not seen as yet, which they were warned of. Note, As security bolsters men up in their brutal sensuality, so sensuality rocks them asleep in their carnal security. They knew not until the flood came. 1. The flood came, though they would not foresee it. Note, Those that will not know by faith, shall be made to know by feeling, the wrath of God revealed from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteousness. The evil day will be the further off for men's putting it far off from them. 2. They did not know it till it was too late to prevent it, as they might have done, if they had known it in time, which made it so much the more grievous. Judgments are most terrible and amazing to the secure, and those that have made a jest of them.

The application of this, concerning the old world, we have in these words; So shall the coming of the Son of man be; that is, (1.) In such a posture shall He find people, eating and drinking, and not expecting Him. Note, Security and sensuality are likely to be the epidemical diseases of the latter days. All slumber and sleep, and at midnight the bridegroom comes. (2.) With such a power, and for such a purpose, will He come upon them. As the flood took away the sinners of the old world, irresistibly and irrecoverably, so shall secure sinners, that mocked at Christ and his coming, be taken away by the wrath of the Lamb, when the great day of his wrath comes; which will be like the coming of the deluge, a destruction from which there is no fleeing.

2. It will be a separating day; v. 40, 41. Then shall two be in the field.

Two ways this may be applied.

(1.) We may apply it to the success of the Gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; some believed the things which were spoken, and were taken to Christ; others believed not, and were left to perish in their unbelief. Those of the same age, place, capacity, employment, and condition, those of the same family, nay, joined in the same bond of marriage, were, one effectually called, the other passed by, and left in the gall of bitterness. This is that division, that separating fire, which Christ came to send. Luke 12: 49, 51. This renders free grace the more obliging, that it is distinguishing; to us, and not to the world, (John 14:22.) nay, to us, and not to those in the same field, the same mill, the same house.

When ruin came on Jerusalem, a distinction was made by Divine Providence, according to that which had been before made by divine grace; for all the Christians among them were saved from perishing in that calamity, by the special care of Heaven. Thus the meek of the earth are hid in the day of the Lord's anger, (Zeph. 2: 3.) either in heaven, or under heaven. Note, Distinguishing preservations, in times of general destruction, are special tokens of God's favor, and ought to be acknowledged. If we are safe when thousands fall on our right hand and on our left, so that we are as brands plucked out of the fire, we have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies, and it is a great mercy.

(2.) We may apply it to the second coming of Jesus Christ, and the separation which will be made on that day. He had said before, (v. 31.) that the elect will be gathered together. Here He tells us, that, in order to that, they will be distinguished from those who were nearest to them in this world; the choice and chosen ones taken to glory, the other left to perish eternally; two in the same grave, one taken to everlasting life, the other left to shame and everlasting contempt, Dan. 12: 2. Here it is applied to them who shall be found alive. Christ will come unlooked for, will find people busy at their usual occupations, in the field, at the mill; and then, according as they are vessels of mercy, prepared for glory, or vessels of wrath, prepared for ruin, so it will be with them; the one taken to meet the Lord and his angels in the air, to be forever with Him and them; the other left to the devil and his angels, who, when Christ has gathered out his own, will sweep up the residue. This aggravates the condemnation of sinners, and speaks abundance of comfort to the Lord's people. [1.] Are they mean and despised in the world, as the man-servant in the field, or the maid at the mill? Exod. 11: 5. Yet they shall not be forgotten or overlooked in that day. The poor in the world, if rich in faith, are heirs of the kingdom. [2.] Are they dispersed in distant and unlikely places, where one would not expect to find the heirs of glory, in the field, at the mill? Yet the angels will find them there, (hidden, as Saul among the stuff, when they are to be enthroned,) and fetch them thence; and well may they be said to be changed, for a very great change will it be, to go to heaven from ploughing and grinding. [3.] Are they weak, and unable of themselves to move heavenward? They shall be taken, or laid hold on, as Lot was taken out of Sodom, by a gracious violence, Gen. 19: 16. Those whom Christ had once apprehended and laid hold on, He will never lose his hold of. [4.] Are they linked with others, in the same habitations; societies, employments? Let not that discourage any true Christian; God knows how to separate between the precious and the vile, the wheat and the chaff, in the same floor.

III. Here is a general exhortation, to watch and be ready against that day comes, enforced by divers weighty consideration; v. 42, &c. Observe,

1. The duty required; Watch, and be ready, v. 42, 44.

(1.) Watch therefore, v. 42. Note, It is the great duty and interest of all the disciples of Christ, to watch. As a sinful state and way is compared to sleep, senseless, and inactive, (1 Thess. 5: 4.) so a gracious state and way is compared to watching and waking. We must watch for our Lord's coming to us, at our death, the ful and wise servant?—which supposes that there are but few who answer this character; one of a thousand. Those who thus distinguish themselves now by humility, diligence, and sincerity in their work, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish.

(37.) 'What follows may be understood both of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the final judgment. But the connection with what precedes favors the former reference. Christ seems to have spoken these things at different times, and on different occasions.'

(40.) Doddridge thinks the transition, from the destruction of Jerusalem to the final judgment, takes place immediately after these two verses.

2. He shall be blessed; and Christ's pronouncing him blessed makes him so. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. 14: 13. But there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found so doing. Next to the honor of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ as the martyrs, is the honor of those that die in the field of service, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping for Christ.

3. He shall be preferred; v. 47. The allusion is to the way of great men, who, if the stewards of their house conduct themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be managers of their estates: thus Joseph, Gen. 39: 4, 6. But the greatest honor the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer on his faithful, watchful servants in the world to come. What is here said by a similitude, is the same that is said more plainly, John 12: 26. Him will my Father honor. And God's servants, when thus preferred, shall be perfect in wisdom and holiness, to bear that weight of glory, so that there is no danger from these servants when they reign.

[2.] Concerning the evil servant. We have, First, His description given, (v. 48, 49), the wretch is drawn in his own colors. The vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men a wretched Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister. What is best, when corrupted becomes the worst. Wickedness in the prophets of Jerusalem is a horrible thing indeed, Jer. 23: 14. Here is,

1. The cause of his wickedness; and that is, a practical disbelief of Christ's second coming; He hath said in his heart, My Lord delays his coming; and therefore he begins to think He will never come. Observe, (1.) Christ knows what they say in their hearts, who with their lips cry, Lord, Lord, as this servant here. (2.) The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, is greatly abused by wicked people, whose hearts are thereby hardened in their wicked ways. When Christ's coming is looked upon as doubtful, or a thing at an immense distance, the hearts of men are fully set to do evil, Eccl. 8: 11. See Ezek. 12: 27. They that walk by sense, are ready to say of the unseen Jesus, as the people did of Moses, when he tarried in the mount, We wot not what is become of him, and therefore up, make us gods, the world a god, the belly a god, any thing but Him that should be.

2. The particulars of his wickedness; and they are sins of the first magnitude; he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

(1.) Persecution is here charged on him. He begins to smite his fellow-servants. Note, [1.] Even the stewards of the house are to look on all the servants of the house as their fellow-servants, and therefore are forbidden to lord reproves the greatest, and doth not respect persons.

2. He is wise to understand his duty, and the proper season of it; and in guiding of the flock there is need, not only of integrity of heart, but skilfulness of the hands. Honesty may suffice for a good servant, but wisdom is necessary to a good steward; for it is profitable to direct.

3. He is doing, so doing, as his office requires. The ministry is a good work, and they whose office it is, have always something to do; they must not indulge themselves in ease, nor leave the work undone, or carelessly turn it off to others, but be doing, and doing to the purpose; so doing, giving meat to the household, minding their own business, and not meddling with that which is foreign; so doing, as the Master has appointed, as the office imports, and as the case of the family requires; not talking, but doing. It was the motto Mr. Perkins used, You are a minister of the Word. Not only Be doing; but, Be so doing.

4. He is found doing when his master comes; which intimates, (1.) Constancy at his work. Ministers should not leave empty spaces in their time, lest their Lord should come in one of those empty spaces. As with a good God the end of one mercy is the beginning of another, so with a good man, a good minister, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. When Calvin was persuaded to remit his ministerial labors, he answered with some resentment, What, would you have my Master find me idle? (2.) Perseverance in his work till the Lord come. Hold fast till then, Rev. 2: 25. Continue in these things, 1 Tim. 4: 16. 6: 14. Endure to the end.

Thirdly, The recompense of reward intended him for this, in three things:

1. He shall be taken notice of. This is intimated in these words, Who then is that faithful. Those who thus distinguish themselves now by humility, diligence, and sincerity in their work, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish.

2. He shall be blessed; and Christ's pronouncing him blessed makes him so. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. 14: 13. But there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found so doing. Next to the honor of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ as the martyrs, is the honor of those that die in the field of service, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping for Christ.

3. He shall be preferred; v. 47. The allusion is to the way of great men, who, if the stewards of their house conduct themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be managers of their estates: thus Joseph, Gen. 39: 4, 6. But the greatest honor the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer on his faithful, watchful servants in the world to come. And God's servants, when thus preferred, shall be perfect in wisdom and holiness, to bear that weight of glory, so that there is no danger from these servants when they reign.

The vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men a wretched Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister. What is best, when corrupted becomes the worst. The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, is greatly abused by wicked people, whose hearts are thereby hardened in their wicked ways. When Christ's coming is looked upon as doubtful, or a thing at an immense distance, the hearts of men are fully set to do evil, Eccl. 8: 11. See Ezek. 12: 27. They that walk by sense, are ready to say of the unseen Jesus, as the people did of Moses, when he tarried in the mount, We wot not what is become of him, and therefore up, make us gods, the world a god, the belly a god, any thing but Him that should be.

2. The particulars of his wickedness; and they are sins of the first magnitude; he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

(1.) Persecution is here charged on him. He begins to smite his fellow-servants. Note, [1.] Even the stewards of the house are to look on all the servants of the house as their fellow-servants, and therefore are forbidden to lord it over them. If the angel call himself fellow servant to John, (Rev. 19: 10.) no marvel if John have learned to call himself brother to the Christians of the churches of Asia, Rev. 1: 9. [2.] It is no new thing to see evil servants smiting their fellow-servants; both private Christians and faithful ministers. He smites them, either because they reprove him, or because they will not bow and do him reverence he smites them with the tongue, as they smote the prophet, Jer. 18: 18. And if he get power into his hand, or can press those into his service that have, as the ten horns on the head of the beast, it goes further. Pashur the priest, smote Jeremiah, and put him in the stocks, Jer. 20: 1. The revolvers have often been, of others, most profound to make slaughter, Hos. 5: 2. The steward, when he smites his fellow-servants, does it under color of his master's authority, and in his name; he says, Let the Lord be glorified; (Isa. 66: 5.) but he shall know that he could not put a greater affront on his master.

(2.) Profaneness and immorality; He begins to eat and drink with the drunken. [1.] He associates with the worst of sinners, walks in their counsel, sits in their seat, and sings their songs. The drunken are the merry, jovial company he is for, and thus he hardens them in their wickedness. [2.] He does like them; eats, and drinks, and is drunken; so it is in Luke. This is an inlet to all manner of sin. Drunkenness is a leading wickedness; they who are slaves to that, are never masters of themselves in any thing else. The persecutors of God's people have commonly been the most vicious and immoral men. Persecuting consciences, whatever the pretensions be, are commonly the most profligate and debauched consciences. What will not they be drunk with, that will be drunk with the blood of saints? Well, this is the description of a wicked minister, who yet may have the common gifts of learning, and utterance above others.

Secondly, His doom read, v. 50, 51. The coat and character of wicked ministers will not only not secure them from condemnation, but will greatly aggravate it. They can plead no exemption from Christ's jurisdiction, whatever they pretend to in the church of Rome, from that of the civil magistrate; there is no benefit of clergy at Christ's bar. Observe,

1. The surprise that will accompany his doom; (v. 50.) The Lord of that servant will come. Note, (1.) Our putting off the thoughts of Christ's coming, will not put off his coming. Whatever fancy he deludes himself with, his Lord will come. (2.) The coming of Christ will be a most dreadful surprise to secure and careless sinners, especially to wicked ministers; He shall come in a day when he looketh not for Him. Note, Those that have slighted the warnings of the Word, and silenced those of their own consciences concerning the judgment to come, cannot expect any other warnings; and no unfairness can be charged on Christ, if He come suddenly, without giving other notice. Behold, He has told us before.

2. The severity of his doom, v. 51. It is not more severe than righteous, but carries in it utter ruin, in two dreadful words, death and damnation.

(1.) Death. His Lord shall cut him asunder, 'He shall cut him off from the land of the living,' from the congregation of the righteous, shall separate him unto evil; which is the definition of a curse, (Deut. 29: 21.) shall cut him down as a tree that cumbereth the ground; perhaps it alludes to the sentence often used in the law, That soul shall be cut off from his people; denoting an utter extirpation. Death cuts off a good man, to be grafted in a better stock; but a wicked man as a withered branch for the fire. Cuts him off from this world, which he set his

(51.) And cut him asunder. 'If this expression be understood in its primary and literal sense, it must denote that most horrible punishment of being cut in sunder whilst alive, which there is a tradition that the prophet Isaiah suffered. There are many instances in ancient writers of this method of executing criminals, and it is still practised by some nations, particularly by the western Moors in Barbary, as we are assured by Dr. Shaw. Calmet says this punishment was not unknown among the Hebrews. It came originally from the Persians or the Chaldeans. It is still in use among the Swissers, and they practised it not many years ago on one of their countrymen, guilty of a great crime, in the plain of Grenelles near Paris. Instances of it among the Persians, Thracians, and Romans, are recorded.' BURDER. Bloomfield thinks, with Doddridge and many other commentators, that the expression is hyperbolical—for severe flagellation. Ed.

that have the form, but hate the power, of godliness. [4.] Wicked ministers will have their portion in the other world with the worst of sinners, even with hypocrites, and justly, for they are the worst of hypocrites. The blood of Christ, which they have by their profaneness trampled under their feet, and the blood of souls, which they have by their unfaithfulness brought on their heads, will bear hard on them in that place of torment. Son, remember, will be as cutting a word to a minister, if he perish, as to any other sinner whatsoever. Let them, therefore, who preach to others, fear, lest they themselves be cast away.

CHAP. XXV. v. 1-13. This chapter continues and concludes our Saviour's discourse, concerning his second coming, and the end of the world. This was his farewell-sermon of caution, as that, John 14:15, and 16, was of comfort to his disciples; and they had need of both in such a world of temptation and trouble. The application of that discourse, was, Watch therefore, and be also ready. In prosecution of these serious, awakening cautions, we have here three parables, the scope of which is the same—

V. 36-51. After all the warnings and instructions of heavenly wisdom, men in general copy the example of the unbelievers in the days of Noah: they 'eat and drink, plant and build, marry and are given in marriage;' and act in every respect as if this world were all, or as if they were to live here forever. Thus death and judgment come upon them unawares, and with as terrible a surprise as the deluge came upon the inhabitants of the old world: and then, too late, they wish to be with the believer in his desired ark. Even from the same families and religious societies, death is continually taking one to heaven, and another to hell. Men labor and live together, nay, they associate in the same acts of worship: yet they are the subjects of two opposite kingdoms; and at death they are removed to the capital, so to speak, of that kingdom to which they belong. As we therefore know that our Lord will speedily come to take us hence, but cannot know when, or how soon, 'let us watch and be sober.' To us, at least, 'the end of all things is at hand;' and as we should be overwhelmed with confusion, if found, at that solemn season, indulging sloth, or sinful passions, or in the places of fashionable dissipation, and could rather wish to be found in the path of duty, or pouring out our hearts in prayer; so let us never venture on the former,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. v. 1-13. This chapter continues our Lord's discourse to his disciples; and relates to the general concerns of death and judgment, rather than to the particular events which were coming on the Jewish nation. Towards the close of the foregoing chapter, our Lord made a gradual transition, from the latter to the former of these subjects; and He here more directly enforces the need of constant vigilance, which He connects with the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, by the introductory word 'Then.' In this respect, 'the kingdom of heaven shall,' &c. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Note, 3:2. The circumstance of the parable were taken from the customs of the Jews, in celeto quicken us all with the utmost diligence to get ready for Christ's second coming, of which, in all his farewells to his church, mention was made, as in that before He died, (John 14:2.) and that at his ascension, (Acts 1:11.) and in that at shutting up the canon of Scripture, Rev. 22:20. Now it concerns us to prepare for Christ's coming: I. That we may then be ready to attend on Him; showed in the parable of the ten virgins, v. 1-13. II. That we may then be ready to give up our account to Him; showed in the parable of the three servants, v. 14-30. III. That we may then be ready to receive from Him our final sentence, and that it may be to eternal life; and this is showed in a description of the judgment, v. 31-46. These are things of awful consideration, because of everlasting concern, to every one of us.

Here, I. That in general illustrated, is, the kingdom of heaven, the external kingdom of Christ, its administration and success. Some of Christ's parables had showed us what it is like now, as ch. 13. This tells us what it shall be like, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and that kingdom delivered up to the Father. The administration of Christ's government toward the ready and the unready, in the great day, may be illustrated by this similitude; or, the professors of Christianity shall then be likened to these ten virgins, and shall be thus distinguished.

II. It is illustrated by a marriage solemnity. It was a custom sometimes among the Jews, on that occasion, that the bridegroom came, attended with his friends, late in the night, to the house of the bride, where she expected him, attended with her bride maids; who, upon notice given of the bridegroom's approach, were to go out with lamps in their hands, to light him into the house with ceremony and formality, in order to the celebration of their nuptials with great mirth. And some think that on these occasions they had usually ten virgins; for the Jews never held a synagogue, circumcised, kept the passover, or contracted marriage, but ten persons at least were present. Boaz, when he married Ruth, had ten witnesses, Ruth 4:2. Now in this parable,

1. The Bridegroom is our Lord Jesus Christ so represented in the 45th Psalm, Solomon's Song, and often in the New Testament. It speaks his singular and superlative love to, and his inviolable covenant with, his spouse, the church. Believers are now betrothed to Christ; (Hos. 2:19.) but the solemnizing or neglect the latter. 'We are not in darkness, that that day should overtake us as a thief;' therefore let us, as 'children of light,' be always expecting the coming of our Lord. (Note, 1 Thess. 5:4-11.)—Above all, the stewards of the Lord's house hold should continually be looking to Him, to make them wise, faithful, and assiduous; and to enable them to avoid all interested or ambitious pursuits and worldly pleasures; nay, even all literary avocations or engagements, not intimately connected with the grand object, that they may wholly give up themselves to their most important work. Blessed will that servant be, however neglected or despised in this vain world, 'whom his Lord, when He cometh, shall find so doing;' for He will delight to honor that servant, whose pleasure it was to do his Master's work, and seek his glory. But woe be to the presumptuous infidel, the mercenary hireling, the lordly oppressor, or the voluptuous sensualist, in the garb of a priest! The Lord of that evil 'servant will come in a day when he looketh not for Him;' and what will all his preferences, distinctions, and enjoyments do for him, when God shall cut him off, and appoint him 'his portion with the hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth?' Scott.

brating nuptials. Christ is the Bridegroom of the church; they who profess his Gospel are as the companions of his bride, who wait for his coming; and their continuance in this world constitutes the time of their waiting. (Marg. Ref. c.—*Notes, Ps. 45:13-15. Cant. 1:5, 6. 8:13, 14. John 3:27-36. v. 29. 2 Cor. 11:1-6. v. 2, 3. Those who make a credible profession of the Gospel, and act in such a manner as to give real Christians a favorable opinion of them, and so gain admittance into their society, are exclusively meant. Scott.

5 While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept.

6 And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.

7 Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

8 And the foolish said unto the wise, 'Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.

10. Go, going out. Heb. 4:1.

Now, concerning these ten virgins, we may observe, (1.) Their different character, its proof and evidence.

[1.] Five were wise, and five foolish. v. 2. Note, Those of the same denomination among men, may yet be of characters vastly different in the sight of God. Sincere Christians are the wise, and hypocrites the foolish virgins, as in another parable they are represented by wise and foolish builders.

Note, Those are wise or foolish indeed, that are so in the affairs of their souls. True religion is true wisdom, sin is folly, but especially the sin of hypocrisy, for those are the greatest fools that are wise in their own conceit, and those the worst of sinners, that feign themselves just men. Some observe, from the equal number of the wise and foolish, what a charitable decorum (it is App. Tillotson's expression) Christ observes, as if He would hope that the number of true believers were near equal to that of hypocrites, or, at least, would lead us to hope the best concerning those that profess religion, and to think of them with a bias to the charitable side. Though, in judging of ourselves, we ought to remember that the gate is strait, and few find it, yet, in judging of others, we ought to remember, that the Captain of our salvation brings many sons to glory.

[2.] The evidence of this character was in the very thing they were to attend to.

First, It was the folly of the foolish virgins, that they took their lamps, and took no oil with them, v. 3. They had just oil enough to make their lamps burn for the present, to make a show with, as if they intended to meet the bridegroom; but no cruse or bottle of oil with them for a recruit, if the bridegroom tarried; thus hypocrites,

1. They have no principle within. They have a lamp of profession in their hands, but have not in their hearts that stock of sound knowledge, rooted dispositions, and settled resolutions, necessary to carry them through the services and trials of the present state. They act under the influence of external inducements, but are void of spiritual life; like a tradesman, that sets up without a stock, or seed on stony ground, wanting root.

2. They have no prospect of, nor make provision for, what is to come. This incontinuity is the ruin of many professors; all their care is to recommend themselves to their neighbors now, not to approve themselves to Christ, whom they must hereafter appear before; as if any thing will serve, provided it will but serve for the present. Tell them of things not seen as yet, and you are like Lot to his sons-in-law, as one that mocked. They do not provide for hereafter, as the ant, nor lay up for the time to come, 2 Cor. 12:14.

the marriage is reserved for the great day, when the bride, the Lamb's wife, will have made herself completely ready, Rev. 19:7,9.

2. The virgins are the professors of religion, members of the church: here represented as her companions, (Ps. 45:14.) as elsewhere her children, (Isa. 54:1.) her ornaments, Isa. 49:18. They that follow the Lamb, are said to be virgins; (Rev. 14:4.) this denotes their beauty and purity; they are to be presented as chaste virgins to Christ, 2 Cor. 11:2. The bridegroom is a king; so these virgins are maids of honor, virgins without number, (Cant. 6:8.) yet here said to be ten.

3. The office of these virgins is to meet the bridegroom, which is as much their happiness as duty. They wait on the bridegroom when he appears, and in the mean time wait for him. See here the nature of Christianity, As Christians, we profess ourselves to be, (1.) Attendants on Christ, to do Him honor, as the glorious Bridegroom, to be to Him for a name and a praise. We must follow Him as honorary servants to their masters, John 12:26. Hold up the name, and hold forth the praise, of the exalted Jesus; this is our business. (2.) Expectants of Christ, and of his second coming.

As Christians, we profess, not only to believe and look for, but to love and long for, the appearing of Christ, and to act in our whole conversation with regard to it. The second coming of Christ is the centre in which all the lines of our religion meet, and to which the whole of the divine life hath a constant reference and tendency.

4. Their chief concern is, to have lights in their hands, when they attend the bridegroom, thus to do him honor and to do him service. Note, Christians are children of light. The Gospel is light, and they who receive it, must not only be enlightened by it themselves, but must shine as lights, must hold it forth, Phil. 2:15, 16. This in general.

Secondly, It was the wisdom of the wise virgins, that they took oil in their vessels with their lamps, v. 4. They had a good principle within, which would maintain and keep up their profession. 1. The heart is the vessel, which it is our wisdom to get furnished; for out of a good treasure there, good things must be brought; but if that root be rottenness, the blossom will be dust. 2. Grace is the oil which we must have in this vessel; in the tabernacle there was constant provision made of oil for the light, Exod. 35:14. Our light must shine before men in good works; but this cannot be, or not long, unless there be a fixed active principle in the heart, of faith in Christ, and love to God and our brethren, from which we must act in every thing we do in religion, with an eye to what is before us. They that took oil, did it on supposition that perhaps the bridegroom might tarry. Note, In looking forward, it is good to prepare for the worst, to lay in for a long siege. But remember that this oil, which keeps the lamp burning, is derived to the candlestick from Jesus Christ, the great and good Olive, by the golden pipes of the ordinances, as represented, Zech. 4:2, 3, 12. explained John 1:16. Of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace.

(2.) Their common fault, during the bridegroom's delay; They all slumbered and slept, v. 25. Observe here,

[1.] The bridegroom tarried, that is, he did not come out so soon as they expected. What we look for as certain, we are apt to think is very near; many in the apostles' times imagined the day of the Lord was at hand. Christ, as to us, seems to tarry, and yet really does not, Hab. 2:3. There is good reason for the Bridegroom's tarrying; there are many intermediate counsels and purposes to be accomplished, the elect must all be called in, God's patience must be manifested, and the saints' patience tried, the harvest of the earth ripened, and the harvest of heaven too. But, though Christ tarry past our time, He will not tarry past the due time.

[2.] While he tarried, those that waited for him grew careless, and forgot what they were attending; They all slumbered and slept. The wise virgins slumbered, and the foolish slept; so some distinguish it; however, they were both faulty. The wise virgins kept their lamps burning, but did not keep themselves awake. Note, Too many good Christians, when they have been long in profession, grow remiss in preparations for Christ's second coming; they intermit their care, abate their zeal, their graces are not lively, nor their works found perfect before God; and though all love be not lost, yet the first love is left. If it was hard to the disciples to watch with Christ an hour, much more an age. I sleep, saith the spouse, but my heart wakes. Observe, First, They slumbered, and then slept. Note, One degree of carelessness and remissness makes way for another. Those that allow themselves in slumbering, will scarcely keep themselves from sleeping; therefore dread the beginning of spiritual decays; attend to the first symptoms of disease. The ancients generally understood the virgins' slumbering and sleeping, of their dying; they all died, wise and foolish, (Ps. 49:10.) before judgment-day. So Rever. Before the Bridegroom come, all must sleep, that is, die. So Calvin.

(3.) The surprising summons given them, v. 6. Note, [1.] Though Christ seem slow, He is sure. In his first coming, He was thought long by those that waited for the consolation of Israel; yet in the fulness of time he came; so his second coming, though long deferred, is not forgotten; his enemies shall find, to their cost, that forbearance is no acquittance; and his friends shall find, to their comfort, that the (4.) Oil in their vessels. In many parts of the East, and particularly in the Indies, it is the custom, instead of torches and flambeaux, to carry a pot of oil in one hand, and a lamp, which is thus supplied with oil, in the other.

Mention is made in "The Customs of the East Indians and the Jews compared," of flambeaux (used at bridal ceremonies) made of pieces of linen squeezed hard together into a round form. Those who hold them in the hands, have in the other a bottle of oil, and pour out of it from time to time. In the linen, which otherwise gives no light.

Verbes 5-9.

The delay of the bridegroom represents the intermediate space between the real or supposed conversion of professed believers, and the coming of Christ; their slumbering and sleeping shows that the difference between real Christians and hypocrites, in many instances, consists more in the state of their hearts, than in their external conduct; (Marg. Ref. k. l.) though this at length discovers the difference between them as wise and foolish virgins. (Marg. Ref. l. v.—Notes Ps. 49: 6-9.)

(8.) Gone out.] 'Rather, "go out." BLOOMER. SCOTT

9 But the wise answered, saying, Not so: lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

10 And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut.

11 Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us.

world; Every eye shall see Him. There will be a cry from heaven, for He shall descend with a shout, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment; and a cry from the earth too, a cry to rocks and mountains. Rev. 6: 16.

(4.) The address they all made to answer this summons: (v. 7.) They all arose, and trimmed their lamps, snuffed them, and supplied them with oil, and with all expedition put themselves in a posture to receive the bridegroom. Now, [1.] This, in the wise virgins, bespeaks an actual preparation for the Bridegroom's coming. Note, Even those that are best prepared for death, have, upon the immediate arrests of it, work to do to get themselves actually ready, that they may be found in peace; (2 Pet. 3: 14.) found doing; (ch. 24: 46.) and not found naked, 2 Cor. 5: 3. When we see the day approaching, we must address ourselves to our dying work with all seriousness, renewing our repentance for sin, our consent to the covenant, our farewells to the world, and our souls must be carried out toward God in suitable breathings. [2.] In the foolish virgins, it denotes a vain confidence, and conceit of the goodness of their state, and their readiness for another world. Note, Even counterfeit graces will serve a man to make a show of when he comes to die, as well as they have done all his life long; the hypocrite's hopes blaze when they are just expiring, like a lightning before death.

(5.) The distress of the foolish virgins, v. 8, 9. This bespeaks, [1.] The apprehensions some hypocrites have of their misery, even on this side death, when God opens their eyes to see their folly, and themselves perishing with a lie in their right hand. Or, however, [2.] The real misery of their state on the other side death, and in the judgment; how far their fair, but false, profession of religion, will be from availing them any thing in the great day; see what comes of it.

1st. Their lamps are gone out. The lamps of hypocrites often go out in this life; when they who have begun in the Spirit end in the flesh, and the hypocrisy breaks out in open apostasy, 2 Pet. 2: 20. The profession withers, and the credit of it is lost; the hopes fail, and the comfort of them is gone; how often is the candle of the wicked thus put out! Job. 21: 17. Yet many a hypocrite keeps up his credit, and the comfort of his profession, such as it is, to the last; but what is it when God takes away his soul? Job 27: 8. If this candle be not put out before him, it is put out with him, Job 18: 5, 6. He shall lie down in sorrow, Isa. 50: 11. The gains of a hypocritical profession will not follow a man to judgment, ch. 7: 22, 23. The lamps are gone out, when the hypocrite's hope proves like the spider's web, (Job 8: 11, &c.) and like the giving up of the ghost, Job 11: 20.

2dly. They wanted oil. Note, Those that take up short of true grace, will certainly find the want of it one time or other. An external profession, well humored, may carry a man far, but will not carry him through; it may light him along this world, but the damps of the valley of the shadow of death will put it out.

3dly. They would not be beholden to the wise virgins for a supply; Give us of your oil. Note, The day is coming, when carnal hypocrites would gladly be found in the addition of true Christians. Those who now hate the strictness of religion, will, at death, wish for the solid comforts of it. Those who care not to live the life, would yet die the death, of the righteous.

Verse 10.

and the door was shut. At a marriage procession I saw, the bridegroom came at a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of scripture, Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. All the persons employed, now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands to fill up their stations in the procession; and those who had lost their lights, and were unprepared; but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride. [Sometimes the assembly consists of two thousand persons, all richly dressed in gold or silver tissue. At intervals during the

The day is coming, when those who now look with contempt on humble, contrite saints, and gladly get an interest in them, and would be those as their best friends and benefactors, whom now they set with the dogs of the street. Give us of your oil; that is, 'Speak a word for us;' so some; but there is no occasion for vouchers in the great day, the Judge knows what is every man's true character. But is it not well that they are brought to say this? It is so; but, 1. This request was extorted by sensible necessity. Note, Those who will see their need of grace hereafter, when it should save them, who will not see their need now, when it should sanctify and rule them. 2. It comes too late. God would have given them oil, had they asked in time; but there is no buying when the market is over.

4thly. They were denied a share in their companions' oil. It is a sad presage of a rupture with God, when they were thus repulsed by good people. The wise answered, Not so; these wise virgins would rather give a season, without a positive refusal, than (as many do) give a positive refusal, without a reason. They were well inclined to help their neighbors in distress; but, We must not, we cannot, we dare not, do it lest there be not enough for us and you; charity begins at home; but go, and buy for yourselves. Note, 1. Those that would be saved, must have grace of their own. Though we have benefit by the communion of saints, and the faith and prayers of others may now redound to our advantage, yet our own sanctification is indispensably necessary to our own salvation. The just shall live by his faith. Every man shall give account of himself, and therefore let every man prove his own work; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day. 2. Those that have most grace have none to spare; all we have is little enough for ourselves to appear before God in. The best have need to borrow from Christ. The church of Rome, which dreams of works of supererogation, and the imputation of the righteousness of saints, forgets that it was the wisdom of the wise virgins to understand that they had but oil enough for themselves, and none for others. But observe, These wise virgins did not upbraid the foolish with their neglect, nor boast of their own forecast, nor torment them with suggestions tending to despair, but gave them the best advice the case will bear, Go ye, rather to them that sell. Note, Those that deal foolishly in the affairs of their souls are to be pitied, and not insulted over; for who made thee to differ? When ministers attend such as have been mindless of God and their souls all their days, but are under death-bed convictions; and, because true repentance is never too late, direct them to repent, and turn to God, and close with Christ; yet, because late repentance is seldom true, they do but as these wise virgins did by the foolish; they can but tell them what is to be done, if it be not too late; but whether the door may not be shut before it is done, is an unspeakable hazard. It is good advice now, if it be taken in time, Go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. Note, Those that would have grace, must have recourse to, and attend on, the means of grace. See Isa. 55: 1.

(6.) The coming of the bridegroom, and the issue of all this different character of the wise and foolish virgins.

[1.] While they went out to buy, the bridegroom came. Note, With regard to time that put off their great work to the last, it is as thou said to one, they have not time to do it then. Getting grace is a work of time, and cannot be procession, guns and rockets are fired, and the spectacle is rendered grand beyond description, by a prodigious number of lighted torches and the sound of musical instruments. BURDER.] Then the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area, before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut and guarded by Sepoys and others expostulated with the door-keepers, but in vain.

15 And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.

16 Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents.

17 And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two.

18 But he that had received one, went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.

19 After a long time, the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them.

factors to our Master's stock.

The endowments of the world—estate, credit, interest, power, preferment, must be improved for the honor of Christ. The ordinances of the Gospel, and opportunities of attending them, bibles, ministers, sabbaths, sacraments, must be improved for the end, for which they were instituted, and communion with God kept up by them, and the gifts and graces of the Spirit must be exercised; and this is trading with our talents.

(2.) They were successful; they doubled their stock, and in a little time made cent. per cent. of it: he that had five talents soon made them other five. Trading with our talents is not always successful with others, but, however it shall be so to ourselves, Isa. 49: 4. Note, The hand of the diligent makes rich in graces, and comforts, and treasures of good works. There is a great deal to be got by industry in religion.

Observe, The returns were in proportion to the receivings. [1.] From those to whom God hath given five talents, He expects the improvement of five. The greater gifts any have, the more pains they ought to take. [2.] From those to whom He has given but two talents, He expects only the improvement of two; if they lay out themselves to do good according to the best of their capacity and opportunity, they shall be accepted, though they do not so much good as others.

2. The third did ill; v. 18. Though the parable represents but one in three unfaithful, yet, in a history that answers this parable, we find the disproportion quite the other way, when ten lepers were cleansed, nine hid the talent, and only one returned to give thanks, Luke 17: 17, 18. The unfaithful servant was he that had but one talent; doubtless, there are many that have five, and bury them all; but Christ would hint to us, (1.) That, if he that had but one talent be reckoned with thus for burying that one, much more will they be accounted offenders that have many, and bury them. If he that was but of small capacity was cast into outer darkness, because he did not improve as he might what he had, of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, that tramples under foot the greatest advantages? (2.) That those who have least to do for God, frequently do least of what they have to do. Some make it an excuse for their laziness, that they have not the opportunities of serving God that others have; and, because they have not wherewithal to do what they say they would they will not do what they are sure they can, and so do nothing: it is really an aggravation of their sloth, that when they have but one talent to care about, they neglect that one.

He hid the talent, for fear it should be stolen. he did not misspend, misemploy, embezzle, or squander it, but hid it. Money is like manure, (so Bacon used to say,) good for nothing in the heap, but it must be spread; yet it is an evil we have often seen under the sun, treasure heaped together, (Jam. 5: 3. Eccl. 6: 1, 2.) benefiting nobody; and so in spiritual gifts; many have them, and make no use of them for the end for which they were given. Those that have estates, and do not lay them out in works of piety and charity; that have power and interest, and do not with it promote religion in the places where they live; ministers that have capacities and opportunities for doing good, but do not stir up their gift, are slothful servants, that seek their own things more than Christ's.

He hid his lord's money; he did but his own, he might have done as he pleased; but whatever abilities and advantages we have, they are not our own, we are but stewards of them, and must give account to our Lord, whose goods they are. It was an aggravation of his slothfulness, that his fellow-servants were busy and successful in trading, and their zeal should have provoked his. Are others active, and shall we be idle?

III. The account of this improvement, v. 19. 1. The account is deferred; it is not till after a long time that they are reckoned with; not that the master neglects his affairs, or that God is slack concerning his promise; (2 Pet. 3: 9.) no he is ready to judge; (1 Pet. 4: 5.) but every thing must be done in its time and order. 2. Yet the day of account comes at last, v. 19. Note, The stewards of the manifold grace of God must shortly give account of their stewardship. We must all be reckoned with—what good we have got to our own souls, or done to others, by the advantages we have enjoyed. See Rom. 14: 10, 11. Here is,

(1.) The good account of the faithful servants; observe,

[1.] The servants giving up the account; (v. 20, 22.) 'Lord, thou deliverest to me five talents, and to me two; behold, I have gained five talents, and I two talents more.'

1st. Christ's faithful servants acknowledge with thankfulness his vouchsafements to them. Note, 1. It is good to keep a particular account of our receivings from God, and remember them, that we may know what is expected from us, and may render accordingly. 2. We must never look on our improvements but with a general mention of God's favor to us, of the honor He has put on us, in intrusting us with his goods, and of that grace which is the spring and fountain of all the good in us, or done by us. For the truth is, the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to Him for making use of us, and enabling us for his service.

2dly. They produce, as an evidence of faithfulness, what they have gained. Note, God's good stewards have something to show for their diligence: Show me thy faith by thy works. He that is a good man, let him show it, Jam. 3: 13. If we be careful in our spiritual trade, it will soon be seen by us, and our works will follow us, Rev. 14: 13. Not that the saints will, in the great day, make mention of their own good deeds; no, Christ will do that for them; (v. 35.) but it intimates, that they who faithfully improve their talents shall have boldness in the day of Christ; 1 John 2: 28. 4: 17. And it is observable, that he who had but two talents, gave up his account as cheerfully as he who had five; for his comfort, in the day of account, will be according to our faithfulness, not our usefulness; our sincerity, not our success; according to the uprightness of our hearts, not the degree of our opportunities

Verbes 19-23.

Unbelievers either conclude that Christ will never come to judgment, or that event appears to them so doubtful and distant, that it has no influence on their conduct: (Note, 24: 45-51.) and believers have need of patience, that, after they have done the will of God, they may receive the promise.' (Note, Heb. 10: 35-39, v. 35.) (M-Te. Ref. q. r.—See 18: 23-27, v. 23, 24. 24: 45-51, v. 46, 47. Luke 12: 35-46, v. 44. 16: 1-8, v. 1, 2. 19: 11-27, v. 10-13. Rev. 2: 24-28. 3: 4-6, 12, 13, 20-22.)

thou into the joy of thy Lord. Note, (1.) The state of the blessed is a state of joy, not only because all tears shall then be wiped away, but all the springs of comfort shall be opened, and the fountains of joy broken up. Where there are the vision and fruition of God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot but be a fulness of joy. (2.) This joy is the joy of our Lord; the joy He Himself has purchased and provided; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the sorrow of the Redeemer. It is the joy He Himself is in possession of, and which He had his eye on when He endured the cross, and despised the shame, Heb. 12: 2. It is the joy of which He Himself is the Fountain and Centre. It is the joy of our Lord, for it is joy in the Lord, who is our exceeding Joy. Abraham was not willing that the steward of his house, though faithful, should be his heir; (Gen. 15: 3.) but Christ admits his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint-heirs with Him. (3.) Glorified saints shall enter into this joy; shall have a full and complete possession of it, as the heir, when he comes of age, enters on his estate, or as they that were ready vented in to the marriage feast. Here the joy of our Lord enters into the saints, in the earnest of the Spirit; shortly they shall enter into and be in it to eternity, as in their element.

(2.) The bad account of the slothful servant. Observe,

[1.] His apology for himself, v. 24, 25. Though he had received but one talent, for that one he is called to account. The smallness of our receiving will not excuse us from a reckoning.

[2.] The master's acceptance and approbation of their account, v. 21, 23.

1st. He commended them, v. 21. Note, The diligence and integrity of those who approve themselves the faithful servants of Christ, will be found to praise, and honor, and glory, at his appearing, 1 Pet. 1: 7. Those that own and honor God now, He will own and honor shortly.

1. Their persons will be accepted; Thou good and faithful servant. He that knows the integrity of his servants now, will witness to it in the great day. Perhaps they were censured by men, as righteous overmuch; but Christ will give them their just characters of good and faithful. 2. Their performances will be accepted; Well done. Christ will call those only, good servants, that have done well; for it is by patient continuance in well-doing, we seek for this glory and honor; and if we seek, we shall find; if we do that which is good, and do it well, we shall have praise of the same. Some masters are so morose, that they will not commend their servants, though they do their work ever so well; it is thought enough not to chide; but Christ will commend his servants that do well; and if we have the good word of our Master, the matter is not great what our fellow-servants say of us; as, on the contrary, not he who commendeth himself, or whom his neighbors commend, is approved, but whom the Lord commends.

2dly. He rewards them, which is here expressed two ways.

1. In one expression agreeable to the parable, v. 21. Christ is a Master that will prefer his servants who acquit themselves well. Christ has honor in store for those that honor Him—a crown, (2 Tim. 4: 8.) a throne, (Rev. 3: 21.) a kingdom, ch. 25: 34. Here they are beggars, in heaven they shall be rulers. The upright shall have dominion; Christ's servants are all princes.

Observe the disproportion between the work and the reward; there are but few things in which the saints are serviceable to the glory of God, but there are many things wherein they shall be glorified with God. What charge we receive from God, what work we do for God in this world, is but little, very little, compared with the joy set before us. Put together all our services, sufferings, improvements, all the good we do to others, all we get to ourselves, and they are but few, next to nothing, not worthy to be compared, not fit to be named, with the glory to be revealed.

2. In another expression, which slips out of the parable into the thing signified by it; Enter into the joy of thy Lord. Note, (1.) The state of the blessed is a state of joy, not only because all tears shall then be wiped away, but all the springs of comfort shall be opened, and the fountains of joy broken up. Where there are the vision and fruition of God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot but be a fulness of joy. (2.) This joy is the joy of our Lord; the joy He Himself has purchased and provided; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the sorrow of the Redeemer. It is the joy He Himself is in possession of, and which He had his eye on when He endured the cross, and despised the shame, Heb. 12: 2. It is the joy of which He Himself is the Fountain and Centre. It is the joy of our Lord, for it is joy in the Lord, who is our exceeding Joy. Abraham was not willing that the steward of his house, though faithful, should be his heir; (Gen. 15: 3.) but Christ admits his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint-heirs with Him. (3.) Glorified saints shall enter into this joy; shall have a full and complete possession of it, as the heir, when he comes of age, enters on his estate, or as they that were ready vented in to the marriage feast. Here the joy of our Lord enters into the saints, in the earnest of the Spirit; shortly they shall enter into and be in it to eternity, as in their element.

(21.) The joy. 'That is, "Share the joyful banquet prepared by 'his master'." Or, "Receive the means of happiness, which thy Lord can give as a reward." The word here translated "joy," is used in the Greek of Esther 9: 19, for "banquet." Le Clerc. Ignorius says that banqueting-rooms have the word joy inscribed on them.' HEWLETT.

The joy of the Lord. 'The happiness of heaven is represented under the notion of pleasure. The pleasures of this life seldom satisfy; and when they do, they surfeit. They enfeeble the body, and relax the soul. Corruption and shame mix with them. They begin in anxiety, and end in repentance. They were given to answer certain ends in this present state: we pursue them beyond those natural ends to our confusion and ruin. But the happiness of heaven shall be that of an Observe, 1st. What he confides in. He comes to the account with great assurance, relying on the plea, 'Lo, there thou hast that is thine; if have not made it more, as the others, yet this I can say, I have not made it less.' Thus, he thinks, may serve to bring him off, if not with praise, yet with safety.

Note, Many a one goes very securely to judgment, presuming on the validity of a plea that will be overruled as vain and frivolous. Slothful professors, that are afraid of doing too much for God, yet hope to come off as well as those that take so much pains in religion. Thus the sluggard is wiser in his own conceit, than seven men that can render a reason, Prov. 26: 16. This servant thought his account would pass well enough, because he could say, Thou hast that is thine. 'Lord, I was no spendthrift, no prodigal, no profaner of sabbaths, no opposer of good ministers and good preaching; Lord, I never ridiculed my Bible, nor bantered religion, nor abused my power to persecute any good man; I never drowned my parts, nor wasted God's good creatures in drunkenness and gluttony, nor ever, to my knowledge, did injury to any.' Many, that are called Christians, build great hopes for heaven on their being able to make such an account; yet all this amounts to no more than, There thou hast that is thine; as if no more were required, or could be expected.

2dly. What he confesses. He owns the burying of his talent, I hid thy talent in the earth. He speaks as if that were no great fault; nay, as if he deserved praise for his prudence in putting it in a safe place, and running no hazards with it. Note, It is common for people to make a very light matter of that which will be their condemnation in the great day. Or, if conscious of fault, it intimates how easily slothful servants will be convicted in the judgment; there will need no great search for proof, for their own tongue shall fall on them.

3dly. What he makes his excuse; I knew that thou wast a hard man, and I was afraid. Good thoughts of God would beget love, and that love would make us diligent and faithful; but hard thoughts of God beget fear, and that fear makes us slothful and unfaithful. His excuse he speaks,

1. The sentiments of an enemy; I knew thee, that thou art a hard man. This was like that wicked saying of the house of Israel, The way of the Lord is not equal, Ezek. 18: 25. Thus the foolishness of man perverteth his way, and then, as if that would mend the matter, his heart fretteth against the Lord. This is covering the transgression, as Adam, who implicitly laid the fault on God Himself; The woman which Thou gavest me. Note, Carnal hearts are apt to conceive false and wicked opinions of God, and with them to harden themselves in their evil ways. Observe how confidently he speaks; I knew thee to be so. How could he know Him to be so? What iniquity have we or our fathers found in Him? Jer. 2: 5. Wherein has He wearied us with our work, or deceived us in his wages? Mic. 6: 3. Has He been a wilderness to us, or a land of darkness? Thus long God has governed the world, and may as, with more reason than Samuel himself could, Whom have I defrauded, or whom oppressed? Does not all the world know the contrary, that He is so far from being a hard Master, that the earth is full of his goodness: so far from reaping where He sowed not, that He sows a great deal where He reaps nothing? For He causes the sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful, and fills their hearts with food and gladness, who say to the Almighty

24 Then he which had received the one talent came and said, "Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed :

25 And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth; lo, there thou hast that is thine.

26 His lord answered and said unto him, "Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed ;

27 Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury.

28 Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents.

29 For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath.

loss, yet thou mightest have put it into the hands of the exchangers, or goldsmiths, mightest have brought it into the bank, and then at my coming, if I could not have had the greater improvement, by trade and merchandise, (as of the other talents,) yet I might have had the lesser improvement, of bare interest, and should have received my own with usury. Note, If we could not, or durst not, do what we would, yet that excuse will not serve, when it will be made to appear that we did not do what we could and durst. Something is better than nothing, and our Master will not despise the day of small things. Or thus, (3.) 'Suppose I did reap where I sowed not, yet that is nothing to thee, for I had sowed upon thee, and the talent was my money, which thou wast intrusted with, not only to keep, but to improve.' Note, At the day of account, wicked and slothful servants will be left quite without Depart from us. This suggestion bespeaks the common reproach wicked people cast on God, as if all the blame of their sin and ruin lay at his door, for denying them his grace; whereas it is certain that never any, who faithfully improved the common grace they had, perished for want of special grace; nor can any show what could in reason have been done more for an unfruitful vineyard, than God has done in it. God does not demand brick, and deny straw; no, whatever is required in the covenant, is promised in it; so that if we perish, it is owing to ourselves.

2. The spirit of a slave; I was afraid. This ill affection toward God arose from false notions of Him; and nothing is more unworthy of God, nor more hinders our duty to Him, than slavish fear. This has bondage and torment, and is directly opposite to that entire love which the great commandment requires. Note, Hard thoughts of God drive us from, and cramp us in, his service. Those who think it impossible to please Him, and in vain to serve Him, will do nothing to purpose in religion.

(2.) His Lord's answer to this apology. His plea is overruled, nay, made to turn against him. Here we have

1st. His conviction, v. 26, 27. He is convicted of two things:

1. Slothfulness, v. 26. Note, Slothful servants are wicked servants, and will be reckoned with as such by their Master; for he that is slothful in his work, and neglects the good that God has commanded, is brother to him that is a great traitor, by doing the evil that God has forbidden, Prov. 18:9. He that is careless in God's work, is near akin to him that is busy in the devil's work, To do no good is to incur very serious blame. Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; slothfulness makes way for wickedness; all become filthy, for there is none that doeth good, Ps. 14:3. When the house is empty, the unclean spirit takes possession. Those that are idle in the affairs of their souls, are not only idle, but sometimes worse, 1 Tim. 5:13. When men sleep, the enemy sows tares.

2. Self-contradiction, v. 26, 27. Note, The hard thoughts sinners have of God, so far from justifying their wickedness and slothfulness, will rather aggravate and add to their guilt. Three ways this may be taken; (1.) 'Suppose I had been so hard a Master, shouldst not thou therefore have been the more diligent and careful to please Me, if not for love, yet for fear, and for that reason oughtest not thou to have minded thy work?' If our God be a consuming fire, in consideration of that, let us study how to serve Him. Or, thus, (2.) 'If thou didst think me to be a hard Master, and therefore durst not trade with the money thyself, for fear of losing by it, and being made to stand to the excuse; frivo. ms. pleas will be overruled, and every mouth stopped; and those who now stand so much on their own justification, will not have one word to say for themselves.

2dly. His condemnation. The slothful servant is sentenced,

1. To be deprived of his talent, v. 28. The talents were first disposed of by the master, as an absolute owner, but this was now disposed of by him as a judge; he takes it from the unfaithful servant, to punish him, and gives it to him that was eminently faithful, to reward him. And the meaning of this part of the parable we have in the reason of the sentence, v. 29. This may be applied, (1.) To the blessings of this life. These we are intrusted with, to be used for the glory of God, and the good of those about us. Now he that hath these things, and useth them for these ends, he shall have abundance; perhaps abundance of the things themselves, at least, abundance of comfort in them, and of better things: but from him that hath not, that is, that hath these things as if he had them not, had not power to eat of them, or to do good with them, (The miser may be considered as destitute of what he has, as well as of what he has not,) they shall be taken away. Solomon explains this, (Prov. 11:24.) There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty. Giving to the poor, is trading with what we have, and the returns will be rich; it will multiply the meal in the barrel, and the oil in the cuseb; but the sordid, and niggardly, and uncharitable, will find that riches, so got, perish by evil travel, Eccl. 5:13, 14. Sometimes Providence strangely transfers estates from those that do no good with them, to those that do; they are gathered for him that will pity the poor, Prov. 28:8. See Prov. 13:22. Job 27:19, 17. Eccl. 2:26. (2.) We may apply it to the means of grace. They who are diligent in improving the opportunities they have, God will enlarge them, will set before them an open door, (Rev. 3:8.) but they who know not the day of their visitation, shall have the things that belong to their peace hid from their eyes. For proof of this, go see what God did to Shiloah, Jer. 7:12. (3.) We may apply it to the common gifts of the Spirit. He that hath these, and doeth good with them, shall have abundance: these gifts improve by exercise, and brighten by use; the more we do, the more we may do, in religion; but those who stir not up their gift, who do not exert themselves according to their capacity, their gifts decay, and go out like a neglected fire. From him, that hath not a living principle of grace in his soul, shall be taken away the common gifts he hath, as the lamps of the foolish virgins went out for want of oil, v. 8. Thus the man of the idle shepherd, which he had sluggish, folded up in his bosom, comes to be dried up, and his right eye, which he had carelessly or wilfully shut, becomes utterly darkened, as is threatened, Zech. 11:17.

2. He is sentenced to be cast out, v. 30. Here,

(1.) His character is that of an unprofitable servant. Note, Slothful servants will be reckoned with as unprofitable servants, who do nothing to the purpose of their coming into the world, nothing to answer the end of their birth, who are no way serviceable to the glory of God, the good of others, or the salva-

Verses 24, 25.

These verses describe the heart and inward workings of many decent and plausible hypocrites, and the motives of their slothfulness. They are 'carnally minded,' and at enmity with the holy character and law of God; they murmur against his providence, sovereignty and method of salvation; they disbelieve his promises, suppose his service to be perilous, unprofitable, and detrimental; they complain that He requires more than they are capable of performing, and that he punishes men for what they cannot help; they pervert the oracles of revelation to support these conclusions, and confound the want of inclination to what is good, with a want of natural ability. Thus they excuse their sloth and selfishness, and cast the blame of their misconduct, on God; and they suppose their unfruitfulness to be justifiable, because they are no outwardly so immoral as some other persons. Marg. Ref. s—u—See. Luke 15:25-32, p. 29, 30. Scott.

(24.) He that received the one talent. 'Our Lord placed the example of negligence in him to whom the least was committed, probably intimate,' says Doddridge, 'that we are accountable for the smallest with which we are intrusted: but it cannot imply, that they who have received much will ordinarily pass their account best; for it is too plain, in fact, that most of those whose dignity, wealth and genius give them the greatest opportunities of service, seem to forget that they have a Master in heaven to serve, or any future reckoning to expect; and many render themselves much more criminal than this wicked and slothful servant, who hid his talent in the earth.' GREENFIELD.

Exchangers.] 'These discharged not only the office of our bankers, that of receiving and giving out money, or of taking or giving interest upon it, but also of exchanging coins, and distinguishing genuine from forged money.'

Usury.] 'Rather, its produce.'

Sciently, the import of the word usury, was no other than prof., whether great or small, allowed to the lender for the use of borrowed money. But as this practice often gave rise to great extortion, the very name at length became odious.'

CAMPBELL.

30 And ^a cast ye the unprofitable servant into ^b outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

[Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ When ^c the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, ^d then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory:

32 And ^e before him shall be gathered all nations; and ^f he shall separate them one from another, as a tion of their own souls. A slothful servant is a withered member in the body, a barren tree in the vineyard, an idle drone in the hive, he is good for nothing. In one sense, we are all unprofitable servants; (Luke 17: 10,) we cannot profit God, Job 22: 2. But to others, and to ourselves, it is required that we be profitable; if we be not, Christ will not own us as his servants; it is not enough not to do hurt, we must do good, must bring forth fruit, and though thereby God is not profited, yet He is glorified, John 15: 8.

(2.) His doom is, to be cast into outer darkness. Here, as in what was said to the faithful servants, our Savior slides insensibly out of the parable into the thing intended by it, and it serves as a key to the whole; for, outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth, is, in Christ's discourse, the common periphrasis of the miseries of hell. The state is, [1.] Very dismal; outer darkness. Darkness is uncomfortable and frightful; it was one of the plagues of Egypt. In hell there are chains of darkness, 2 Pet. 2: 4. In the dark no man can work, a fit punishment for a slothful servant. It is outer darkness, out from the light of heaven, out from the joy of their Lord, into which the faithful servants were admitted; out from the feast. Compare ch. 18: 12. 22: 13. [2.] Very doleful; there is weeping, which bespeaks great sorrow; and gnashing of teeth, which bespeaks great vexation and indignation. This will be the portion of the slothful servant.

V. 31—46. We have here a description of the process of the last judgment. Some passages in it are parabolical; as the separating between the sheep and the goats, and the dialogues between the Judge and the persons judged: but there is no thread of similitude carried through the discourse, and therefore it is rather to be called a draught or delineation of the final judgment, than a parable; it is, as it were, the explanation of the former parables. And here we have,

1. The placing of the Judge on the judgment seat; v. 31. Observe here,

1. That there is a judgment to come, in which every man shall be sentenced, by the rule of the everlasting Gospel, to a state of everlasting happiness, or misery, in the world of retribution, according to what he did in this world of probation.

2. The administration of the judgment is committed to the Son of man; for by Him God will judge the world, (Acts 17: 31.) and to Him all judgment is committed. Here, as elsewhere, when the last judgment is spoken of, Christ is called the Son of man, because He is to judge the sons of men; and because his wonderful condescension to take on Him our nature, will be recompensed by his exaltation in that day, and an honor put on the human nature.

3. Christ's appearing to judge the world will be splendid and glorious; the Sun of righteousness shall then shine in his meridian lustre, and the Prince of the kings of the earth shall show the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honors of his excellent majesty; and all the world shall see what only the saints now believe—that He is the brightness of his Father's glory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—30. In some respects, 'the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man travelling into a far country, and delivering his goods unto his own servants.' Whatever any one possesses is intrusted to him by the great Lord of all, who will at length call him to an account for the use which he has made of it. The holy law requires us to devote the whole, in perfect love, to the service of God, and to the benefit of our neighbor, and denounces its awful curse on every one who, in any instance, or at any time, fails of so doing; but the Gospel inwardly teaches and disposes the true believer to attempt this sincerely, though feebly, from the time when he begins in any degree to experience 'the joy of God's salvation.' He believes his word respecting the future judgment, and its important consequences; and he gives implicit credit to his promises and threatenings. By faith he perceives his danger as a sinner, and fears and flees from it; and at the same time he discovers his Refuge, and in hope repairs to it. Having obtained peace with God, and peace of conscience, through the atoning blood of Christ, his 'faith works by love,' and his language is, 'What shall I render to the Lord, for all his benefits?' This humble love and gratitude, uniting with hatred of sin, contempt of the world, love to the brethren, and compassion for perishing sinners, impel him to devote himself, and all his abilities and advantages, to the service of Christ, and to do good in his church and in the world, according to his opportunity, and in exact proportion to the vigor of his faith and hope. This obedience distinguishes the real disciple of Christ from every other man: the self-righteous Pharisee, the self-wise infidel, the careless sinner, the formal professor of the Gospel, are alike unacquainted with these evangelical principles of devoted diligence, in the service of a crucified Savior.—It is the real Christian's liberty, privilege, honor, interest, and satisfaction, to be employed as the Redeemer's servant, and as his instrument in promoting his glory and the benefit of his people: and 'the love of Christ even constrains him, to live no longer to himself, but to Him that died for him, and rose again.' (2 Cor. 5: 13—15.) According to the number of his talents, he become a blessing to others, by his example, influence, conversation and labors; by the use which he makes of his time, money and abilities; by his relative conduct in his family; and by serving the Lord, as a minister, magistrate or private Christian: and whether he has had five talents, two, one, or only a small portion of one, 'he will not be ashamed, but have confidence before Christ at his coming.' Nay, he may now humbly 'rejoice in the testimony of his conscience;' and, giving the Lord all the glory, he may look forward to death and judgment, assured of being then received with 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' 'Let us not then be weary of well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.'—But let every one dread the doom of the unprofitable servant; for it is not enough, that men do not spend their Lord's goods on their lusts, or waste their time and talents in sin; even those who 'bury them in the earth,' will be left without excuse. Whatever they may profess, they dislike the character and word of the Lord; they count his service irksome and unprofitable; they dare not trust his promise, and they are dissatisfied with his providence; and, because they may not have the pre-eminence, or take the lead, and manage things in their own way, they sit down in sullen discontent, and will do nothing, because they cannot do every thing. But many of those excuses and objections which pass current here, will be refuted and silenced at last; and every unfruitful professor will be condemned out of his own mouth, and consigned to 'outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth.' For whatever else men may possess, who are destitute of sanctifying grace, they will soon be deprived of it, and have nothing but the additional condemnation of having been ungrateful for so many mercies. But the most indigent believer is rich, and shall have abundance, and his felicity will be forever increasing. Let us not then envy sinners, or covet any of their perishing and dangerous possessions.

SCOTT

(14.—30.) Many arguments are held concerning, and even against, man's responsibility to God. We do not hear of these objections in the natural world; men obey from necessity and with alacrity the 'laws of nature,' as they are called, knowing it would be the height of folly and even insanity not to obey; why then refuse a willing service and obedience to the rest of the system of the almighty Legislator? What but misery can result, if happiness be thus thrown away? We are to use every talent to know and do his will, whether revealed in his works or word. Eo.

Verses 31—33.

In order more fully to explain and confirm the foregoing parabolical representations, our Lord next spake one of the most interesting and sublime discourses, which we meet with even in the holy Scriptures; and it is wonderful, that any person can read it, and yet suppose the Speaker to be an ordinary man: when there is such a divine authority and dignity in it, as, we may venture to say, could never have, with propriety, been assumed by any mere creature, however exalted. Having previously, and by degrees, drawn the attention of the disciples to the great season of retribution, He here spake concerning it in the character of the sovereign Judge. (Marg. Ref. f. g.) There will not be the least danger of his mistaking any man's character, motives, or state; nor any possibility of opposition or escape; nor any danger lest any one should be overlooked, or remain disguised before Him. (See John, 6: 36—40. v. 39, 40.) What less than omnipotence and omniscience can effect such an exact separation of the whole human species? This being done, He will set the sheep (the proper emblem of his harmless, gentle, useful, and holy people) on his right hand, in token of their acceptance and honor; and the goats (the emblem of the unholiness and character of unbelievers,) at his left hand, as rejected and exposed to condemnation. (Marg. Ref. h—l.)

(31.) When the Son of man, &c. Comparing these words with ch. 24: 30, 31, it may seem that Christ teaches his disciples to expect of his first coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, as a kind of emblem of his final appearance in judgment; and consequently we are authorized to use some of the texts in the former chapter, as an discourse of that great and important day.

4. It is prepared from the foundation of the world. This happiness was designed for the saints, and they for it, before time began, from all eternity, Eph. 1:4. The end, which is last in execution, is first in intention: Infinite Wisdom had an eye to the eternal glorification of the saints, from the first founding of the creation; All things are for your sakes, 2 Cor. 4:15. Or, it denotes the preparation of the place of this happiness, which is to be the seat and habitation of the blessed, in the very beginning of the work of creation, Gen. 1:1. There, in the heavens of heavens, the morning stars were singing together, when the foundations of the earth were fastened, Job 38:4-7.

2ly. The good tenure by which they shall hold it. What we come to by inheritance, is not got by any procurement of our own, but purely by the act of God. It is God that makes heirs, heirs of heaven. We come to an inheritance by virtue of our sonship, our adoption; if children, then heirs. A title by inheritance is the sweetest and surest title; it alludes to possessions in owed Me, hearing the cross, now come with Me wearing the crown. The blessed of my Father are the beloved of my soul, that have been too long at a distance from Me; come now, come into my bosom, come into my arms, come into my dearest embraces! Oh, with what joy will this fill the hearts of the saints in that day! We now come boldly to the throne of grace, but we shall then come boldly to the throne of glory; and this word holds out the golden sceptre, with an assurance that our requests shall be granted to more than half of the kingdom. Now the Spirit saith, Come, in the word; and the bride saith, Come, in prayer; and the result hereof is a sweet communion: but the perfection of bliss will be, when the King shall say, Come.

[2.] The admission of the saints into the blessedness and kingdom of the Father, v. 34.

1st. The happiness they shall be possessed of, is very rich; we are told what it is by Him who had reason to know it, having purchased it for them, and possessed it Himself.

1. It is a kingdom: which is reckoned the most valuable possession on earth; yet this is but a faint resemblance of the felicities of the saints in heaven. They that here are beggars, prisoners, accounted as the off-scouring of all things, shall then inherit a kingdom, Ps. 143:7. Rev. 2:26, 27.

2. It is a kingdom prepared: the happiness must be great, for it is the product of the divine counsels. Note, Great preparation is made for the entertainment of the saints in the kingdom of glory. The Father designed it for them in his thoughts of love, and provided it for them in the greatness of his wisdom and power. The Son purchased it for them, and is entered as the Forerunner to prepare a place, John 14:2. And the blessed Spirit, in preparing them for the kingdom, in effect, is preparing it for them.

3. It is prepared for them. This bespeaks, (1.) Its suitability; it is in all points adapted to the nature of a soul, and to the new nature of a sanctified soul. (2.) Their property and interest in it. It is prepared on purpose for them; not only for such as you, but for you, you by name, you personally and particularly, who the land of Canaan, which passed by inheritance, and would not be alienated longer than to the year of jubilee. Thus is the heavenly inheritance indefeasible, and unalienable. Saints, in this world, are as heirs under age, tutored and governed till the time appointed of the Father; (Gal. 4:1.) and then they shall be put in full possession of that which now through grace they have a title to; Come, and inherit it.

(2.) The ground of this, (v. 35, 36.) For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat. We cannot hence infer that any good works of ours merit the happiness of heaven, by any intrinsic worth or excellency in them, our goodness extends not to God; but it is plain that Jesus Christ will judge the world by the same rule by which He governs it, and therefore will reward those that have been obedient to that law; and mention will be made of their obedience, not as their title, but as their evidence of an interest in Christ and his purchase. This happiness will be adjudged to obedient believers, not on an estimate of merit, but upon the promise of God purchased by Jesus Christ. An estate made by deed or will on condition, when the condition is performed, according to the true intent of the donor or testator, becomes absolute; and then, though the title be built purely upon the deed or will, yet the performing of the condition must be given in evidence; and so it comes in here; for Christ is the Author of eternal salvation to those only that obey Him, and patiently continue in well-doing.

Now, the good works here mentioned are such as we commonly call works of charity to the poor; one instance of sincere obedience being put for all the rest; teaching us this in general, that faith working by love is all in all in Christianity; Show me thy faith by thy works. The good works here described imply three things, which must be found in all that are saved.

[1.] Self-denial, and contempt of the world reckoning the things of the world good no further than as we are enabled to do good with them. and those who have not wherewithal to do good must show the same disposition, by being contentedly and cheerfully poor. Those are fit for heaven that are mortified to earth.

[2.] Love to our brethren; the second great commandment, the fulfilling of the law, and an excellent preparative for the world of everlasting love. We must give proof of this love by our readiness to do good, and to communicate good wishes are but mockeries without good works, Jam. 2:15, 16. 1 John 3:17. Those that have not to give, must show the same disposition some other way.

[3.] A believing regard to Jesus Christ. That which is here rewarded, is the relieving of the poor for Christ's sake, out of love to Him, and with an eye to Him. This puts an excellency on the good work, when in it we serve the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31-40. When we hear of pious persons being sick, or in prison, and wanting advice, attendance, or other relief, we should suppose that Jesus is in these circumstances, and sends to us, by name, to come and minister unto Him. Let us then renounce our own ease, interest, convenience, indulgence and decoration, that we may show our ardent gratitude for his salvation, by abounding in this work of faith, and labor of love; and should we even be mistaken in the character of those, for whom we thus deny ourselves from love to Christ, He will certainly accept and recompense our services.—But alas! how little do we see of these fruits of the Spirit even among professed Christians! Who does not think, that he should have counted it an honor to have entertained Christ when on earth? But how few are willing to retrench greatly from their unnecessary expenses, to relieve these his representatives and brethren! Many, however, will even part with their money, who will not subject themselves to the hardship and inconvenience of visiting the sick, and such as are in prisons, or other recesses of misery and distress; by which means their bounty is distributed at random, does comparatively little good, and will often be shown to spring, rather from an easy temper, than from a disinterested, self-denying love of others, for the sake of Christ.

This fire will be 'everlasting' which would be an unmeaning addition, if the wicked were not to continue in it eternally. (Marg. Ref. f.-i.) No doubt, impenitent sinners of every age and nation will then be judged; but those, to whom the Scriptures are sent, are here chiefly concerned: therefore our Lord represents nothing more than the ground on which false professors of Christianity will be condemned. These however will be as ready to deny or palliate their guilt, as true believers to disclaim all merit in their services; but the Judge will prove his charge, and stop their mouths. 'It is not sufficient to preserve us from that dreadful sentence, "Depart from Me," &c. that we have done no evil, if we have been deficient in those acts of charity and mercy we owe to the members of Christ's body.' Theophylact. Re.

ing therefore evidently proved to be under the condemnation of the law, and entitled to no benefit from the Gospel; nay, exposed to deeper condemnation for their neglect of it, or their hypocrisy and abuse of their privileges; they will be left without plea, or the least power of resistance or escape, and be constrained to 'go away into everlasting punishment,' whilst the righteous will be received into everlasting life and felicity. (Marg. Ref. k.-o.) The original word is the same in both clauses; and he must be blinded by Satan in no ordinary degree, who will risk his immortal soul and its eternal interests in interpreting the same word temporary in one clause, and eternal in another, of the same verse; and if the punishment be eternal, there can be no place for annihilation, or for final restitution. The contrast also between 'punishment,' and 'life,' is carefully to be observed. (Notes, Rom. 8:20, 21. 6:21-23.)

46 And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.

Lord Christ, which those may do, that work for their own living, as well as those that help to keep others alive. See Eph. 6: 5-7. Those good works shall then be accepted, which are done in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. 3: 17.

I was hungry, that is, my disciples and followers were so, and you gave them meat. Note, 1st. Providence so variously orders the circumstances of his people in this world, that while some are in a condition to give relief, others need it. It is no new thing for those that are feasted with the dainties of heaven to want daily food; for those at home in God, to be strangers in a strange land; for those that have put on Christ, to want clothes to keep them warm; for those that have helpful souls, to have sickly bodies; and for those to be in prison, that Christ has made free. 2dly. Works of charity and beneficence, according to our ability, are necessary to salvation; and there will be more stress laid on them in the judgment of the great day, that is commonly imagined; these must be the proofs of our love, and of our professed subjection to the Gospel of Christ, 2 Cor. 9: 13. But they that show no mercy shall have judgment without mercy.

Now this reason is modestly excepted against by the righteous, but is explained by the Judge Himself.

1. It is questioned by the righteous, (v. 37-39) not as if they were loath to inherit the kingdom, or ashamed of their good deeds, or had not the testimony of their own consciences concerning them; but, (1.) The expressions are parabolical, designed to introduce and impress these great truths, that Christ has a mighty regard to works of charity, and is especially pleased with kindnesses done to his people for his sake. Or, (2.) They speak the humble admiration of glorified saints, that such poor worthless services, as theirs, are so highly celebrated and richly rewarded; v. 37. Note, Gracious souls are apt to think meanly of their own good deeds; especially as unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed. Far from this is the temper of those who said, Wherefore have we fasted, and 'hous seest not? Isa. 58: 3. Saints in heaven will wonder what brought them thither, and that God should so regard them and their services. 'It even put Nathanael to the blush, to hear Christ's encomium of him: Whence knowest thou me? John 1: 47, 48. See Eph. 3: 20. When saw we Thee an hungred? We have seen the poor in distress many a time; but when saw we Thee? Note, Christ is more among us than we think He is; surely the Lord is in this place, by his Word, his ordinances, his ministers, his Spirit, yea, and his poor, and we know it not; When wast under the fig tree, I saw thee, John 1: 48.

2. It is explained by the Judge Himself; v. 40. The good works of the saints, when they are produced in the great day, (1.) Shall all be remembered; nor one of the least be overlooked, no, not a cup of cold water. (2.) They shall be interpreted most to their advantage, and the best construction be put on them. As Christ

(1.) The sentence passed on them, v. 41 Every word has terror in it, like that of the trumpet at mount Sinai, waxing louder and louder, every accent more and more doleful, and exclusive of comfort.

[1.] In this world they were often called to come to Christ for life and rest; but they turned a deaf ear to his calls; justly therefore are they now bid to depart from Christ. 'Depart from me, the Fountain of all good, from me the Savior, and therefore from all hope of salvation; I will never have any thing more to say to you, or to do with you.' Now they say to the Almighty, Depart from us; then He will say to them, Depart from Me. Note. It is the hell of hell to depart from Christ.

[2.] If they must depart from Christ, might they not be dismissed with a blessing. No, Depart, ye cursed. They that would not come to Christ, to inherit a blessing, must depart from Him, under the burthen of a curse, Gal. 3: 10. As they loved cursing, so it shall come unto them. But observe, The righteous are called the blessed of my Father: for their blessedness is owing purely to the grace of God and his blessing, but the wicked are called only ye cursed, for their damnation is of themselves. Hath God sold them? No, they have sold themselves, have laid themselves under the curse Isa. 50: 1.

[3.] If they must depart with a curse, may they not go into some place of ease and rest? Will it not be misery enough for them to bewail their loss? No, there is a punishment of sense as well as loss; they must depart into fire, into torment as grievous as that of fire is to the body and much more. This fire is the wrath of the eternal God, fastening on the guilty souls and consciences of sinners, that have made themselves fuel for it. Our God is a consuming Fire, and sinners fall immediately into his hands, Heb. 10: 21. Rom. 2: 8, 9.

[4.] If into fire, may it not be some light or gentle fire? No, it is prepared fire; it is a punishment ordained of old, Isa. 33: 33. The damnation of sinners is often spoken of as an act of the divine power; He is able to cast into hell. In the vessels of wrath He makes his power known: it is a destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

[5.] If into prepared fire, oh, let it be but of short continuance, let them but pass through fire! No, the fire of God's wrath will be an ever lasting fire; a fire, that, fastening and preying on immortal souls, can never go out for want of fuel; and, being kindled and kept burning by the wrath of an immortal God, can never go out for want of being blown, and stirred up; and, the streams of mercy and grace being forever excluded, there is nothing to extinguish it.

[6.] If they must be doomed to such a state of endless misery, yet may they not have some good company there? No, none but the devil and his angels, their sworn enemies, that helped to bring them to this misery, and will triumph over them in it. They served the devil while they lived, and therefore are justly sentenced to be where he is, as those that served Christ are taken to be with Him where He is. Observe here, First, Christ intimates that there is a prince of the devils, and the rest are his angels by whose agency He supports his kingdom. Christ and his angels will in that day triumph over the dragon and his, Rev. 12: 7. Secondly, The fire is said to be prepared, not primarily for the wicked, as the kingdom for the righteous; but originally for the devil and his angels; if sinners make themselves associates with Satan, makes the best of their infirmities, so He makes the most of their services.

We see what recompenses Christ has for those that feed the hungry, and clothe the naked; but what will become of the godly poor, that had not wherewithal to do so? Must they be shut out? No, [1.] Christ will own them, even the least of them, as his brethren, Heb. 2: 11. Thus He will confess them. ch. 10: 32. [2.] He will take the kindnesses done to them, as done to Himself; Ye have done it to Me. Note, Christ espouses his people's cause, and interests Himself in their interests, and reckons Himself received, and loved, and owned in them. If Christ Himself were among us in poverty, how readily would we relieve Him? In prison, how frequently would we visit Him? We are ready to envy the honor they had, who ministered to Him of their substance, Luke 8: 4. Wherever poor saints and poor ministers are, there Christ is ready to receive our kindnesses in them, and they shall be put to his account.

(41.) Prepared for the devil and his angels. There is a remarkable difference between our Lord's expression here and in v. 34. There the kingdom is said to have been prepared for the righteous from the foundation of the world; whereas here the everlasting fire is said to have been prepared for the wicked, but for the devil and his angels. Compare Rom. 9: 22, 23.

DODDRIIDGE.

(42.) Everlasting punishment. [No appeal, no remedy, to all eternity;] no end to the punishment of those, whose final impenitence manifests in them an eternal will and desire to sin. By dying in a state of opposition to God, they cast themselves into a necessity of continuing in an eternal aversion from Him. But some are of opinion that this punishment shall have an end this is as likely as that the glory of the righteous shall have an end; for the same word is used to express the duration of the punishment, as is used to express the duration of the state of glory. I have seen the best angels that have been written in favor of the final redemption of damned spirits; but I never saw an answer to the argument against that doctrine, drawn from this verse, but what sound learning and criticism should be ashamed to acknowledge. The original word, is certainly to be taken in its proper grammatical sense, continued being, NEVER ENDING. Some have gone a middle way, and think that the wicked shall be annihilated. This I think, is contrary to the text: if they go into punishment, they continue to exist; for that which ceases to be, ceases to suffer.

CHAP. XXVI.

Jesus foretells his crucifixion after two days, 1, 2. The chief priests conspire against Him, 3-5. A woman pours precious ointment on his head; the disciples censure, but Jesus commends her, 6-13. Judas bargains with the chief priest to betray Him, 14-16. Jesus eats the passover and marks out the traitor, 17-25. He institutes the Lord's supper, 26-27; and foretells that all his apostles would forsake Him, and Peter deny Him, 30-35. His agony and prayer in the garden, 38-46. He is betrayed and apprehended, 47-50. A disciple cuts off the high priest's ear, and is wounded, 51-54. He is arraigned before Caiaphas, falsely accused, condemned, and treated with insult and indignity, 57-68. Peter thrice denies Him, with peculiar aggravations; but going out, he weeps bitterly, 69-75.

AND it came to pass, ^a when Jesus had finished all these sayings, he said unto his disciples, the affliction of Joseph,¹ Amos 6: 4-6. Note, Omissions are the ruin of thousands.

[2.] They are not sentenced for omitting their sacrifices and burnt offerings, (they abounded in these, Ps. 50: 8.) but for omitting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. The Ammonites and Moabites were excluded the sanctuary, because they met not Israel with bread and water, Deut. 23: 3, 4. Note, Uncharitableness to the poor is a damning sin. If we will not be brought to works of charity by the hope of reward, let us be influenced by fear of punishment; for they shall have judgment without mercy, that have shewed no mercy. Observe, He doth not say, 'I was sick, and you did not cure Me; in prison, and you did not release Me;' (perhaps that was more than they could do;) but, 'You visited me not, which you might have done.' Note, Sinners will be condemned, at the great day, for the omission of that good which it was in the power of the hand to do. But if the doom of the uncharitable be so dreadful, how much more intolerable will the doom of the cruel be, the doom of persecutors! This reason of the sentence is,

1st, Objected against by the prisoners, v. 44. Condemned sinners, though they have no plea that will bear them out, will yet offer vain excuses. Now, 1. The manner of their pleading bespeaks their present precipitation. They cut it short, as men in haste; When saw we Thee hungry, or thirsty, or naked? They care not to repeat the charge, as conscious to themselves of their own guilt, and unable to bear the terrors of the judgment. Nor will time be allowed them to insist on such frivolous pleas; for it is all (as we say) but 'trifling with the court.' 2. The matter of their plea bespeaks former inconsideration of that which they might have known, but would not, till now that it was too late. They, that had slighted and persecuted poor Christians, would not own that they had slighted and persecuted Christ: no, they never intended any affront to Him, nor expected that so great a matter would have been made of it. They imagined it was only a company of poor, weak, silly, and contemptible people who made needless ado about religion, that they slighted; but they who do so will be made to know, either in the day of their conversion, as Paul, or of their condemnation, as these here, that it was Jesus whom they persecuted. And if they say, Behold, we know it not; doth not He that pondereth the heart consider it? Prov. 24: 11, 12.

2dly, Justified by the Judge, who will convince all the ungodly of the hard speeches spoken against Him in those that are his, Jude 15: v. 45. Note, What is done against the faithful disciples and followers of Christ, even the least of them, He takes as done against Himself. He is reproached and persecuted in them, for they are reproached and persecuted for his sake, and in all their afflictions He is afflicted. He that touches them touches Him in a part no less tender than the apple of his eye.

Lastly, Here is the execution of both these sentences, v. 46.

1. The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment. Sentence will then be executed speedily, and no reprieve granted, nor any time al-by indulging their lusts, they may thank themselves if they become sharers in that misery, which was prepared for him and his associates. Calvin notes upon this, that therefore the torment is said to be for the devil and his angels, to cut off all hope of escaping it; they are already made prisoners in that pit, and can worms of the earth think to escape?

(2.) The reason of this sentence assigned. God's judgments are all just, and He will be justified in them. He is Judge, therefore the heavens shall declare his righteousness.

Now, [1.] All the charge on which the sentence is grounded is, omission: as the servant was condemned, not for wasting his talent, but for burying it; so here, He doth not say, 'I was hungry and thirsty, for you took my meat and drink from Me; I was a stranger, for you banished Me; naked, for you stripped Me; in prison, for you laid Me there:' but, 'When I was in these distresses, you were so selfish, so taken up with your own ease and pleasure, made so much of your labor, and were so loath to part with your money, that you did not minister, as you might have done, to my relief and succor. You were like those epicures that were at ease in Zion, and were not grieved for lowed to move in arrest of judgment. The execution of the wicked is first mentioned; for first the tares are gathered and burned. Note, (1.) The punishment of the wicked in the future state will be everlasting, for that state is unalterable. It can neither be thought that sinners should change their own natures, nor that God should give his grace to change them, when in this world the day of grace was mispent, the Spirit of grace resisted, and the means of grace abused and baffled. (2.) The wicked go away, not voluntarily, no they are driven from light into darkness; but it bespeaks an irresistible conviction of guilt, and a final despair of mercy.

2. The righteous shall go away into life eternal; that is, they shall inherit the kingdom, v. 34. Note, (1.) Heaven is life, it is all happiness. The life of the soul results from its union with God, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, as that of the body from its union with the soul, by the animal spirits. The heavenly life consists in the vision and fruition of God, in a perfect conformity to Him, and an immediate, uninterrupted communion with Him. (2.) It is eternal life. There is no death to put a period to the life itself, nor old age to put a period to the comfort of it, or any sorrow to embitter it. Thus life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, are set before us, that we may choose our way; and so shall our end be. Even the heathen had some notion of these different states of good and bad in the other world. Cicero, in his Tusculan Questions, (lib. 1.) brings in Socrates thus speaking, Two paths open before those who depart out of the body: Such as have contaminated themselves with human vices, and yielded to their lusts, occupy a path that conducts them far from the assembly and council of the gods; but the upright and chaste, such as have been least defiled by the flesh, and have imitated, while in the body, the gods, these find it easy to return to the sublime beings from whom they came.

CHAP. XXVI. v. 1-5. The narrative of the death and sufferings of Christ is more particular and full in all the four evangelists than any part of his history; for what should we determine, and desire to know, but Christ, and Him crucified? This chapter begins that memorable narrative. The year of the redeemed was now come, the seventy weeks accomplished, when transgression must be finished, reconciliation made, and an everlasting righteousness brought in, by the cutting off of the Messiah the Prince, Dan. 9: 24, 26. That awful scene is to be read with reverence and holy fear.

1. Christ gave his disciples notice of the approach of his sufferings, v. 1, 2. He had told them of sufferings at a distance, now He speaks of them as at the door; after two days. Note, After many former notices of trouble, we still need fresh ones. Observe,

(1.) The time, v. 1. [1.] Not till He had finished all He had to say. Note, Christ's witnesses finish their testimony. When Christ had gone through his undertaking as a Prophet, He entered on his office as a Priest. [2.] He had bid his disciples expect sad times, and now

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 41-46. What tongue can describe, what words can express, or even convey a faint idea, of the horror and despair of the wicked, when placed at the left hand of their omnipotent and omniscient Judge! While conscious of their guilt, and calling in vain 'on the rocks and mountains to fall on them,' they shall behold his awful countenance clouded with an indignant frown, and hear his mouth, which used to invite the weary sinner to come to Him, sternly say to them, 'Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!' Then all their works will be produced, to demonstrate the justice of the tremendous sentence; and their omissions alone, will prove them unbelievers, and deprive them of all relief from the mercy of the Gospel. They may avow, that they would gladly have ministered unto Christ, had they seen Him in his humiliation; but, inasmuch as they refused to 'do it: his brethren, they did it not to Him.' If this alone will prove a man, otherwise moral and decent, to be an enemy of Christ a child of the devil, and 'a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction,' where will oppressors, persecutors, blasphemers, and profligates appear? But the reflection is too tremendous to dwell upon. Let us then take warning, 'from the wrath to come,' and seek that faith in Christ, which 'worketh by love of Him, and his people and cause, and by obedience to his commandments; that we may abound in all the fruits of righteousness here, and that, when 'the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment,' we may be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. v. 1, 2. Our Lord had closed his public ministry, when He left the temple; He had afterwards given his disciples many important warnings and instructions; and after the sublime representation, which He had made of his future coming to judgment, He formed them of the immediate approach of his sufferings. He had

2 Ye know that after two days is ^{the} feast of the passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified.

3 ¶ Then assembled together the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high priest, who was called Caiaphas,

4 And consulted that they might take Jesus by subtlety, and kill him

5 But they said, 'Not on the feast-day, lest there be an uproar among the people.

6 ¶ Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, 7 There came unto him a woman having an alabaster-box of very precious ointment, and poured it on his head as he sat at meat.

8 But when his disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying, 'To what purpose is this waste?

tells them, The Son of man is betrayed; to intimate that they should fare no worse than he, and that his sufferings should take the sting out of theirs. Note, Thoughts of a suffering Christ are great supports to a Christian suffering with and for Him.

(2.) The thing itself He gave them notice of, v. 2. It was not only so sure, but so near, that it was as good as done. Note, It is good to make sufferings, that are yet to come, as present to us. He is betrayed, for Judas was then contriving and designing to betray Him.

3. The plot against the life of our Lord Jesus, v. 3-5. Many consultations had been held, but this plot was deeper than any, for the grandees were all engaged in it. The chief priests, who presided in ecclesiastical affairs; the elders, who were judges in civil matters; and the scribes, who, as doctors of the law, were directors to both—these composed the sanhedrim, that governed the nation, and were confederate against Christ. Observe, (1.) The place where they met; in the palace of the high priest, who was the centre of their unity in this wicked project. (2.) The plot; to take Jesus by subtlety, and kill Him; nothing less would serve their turn. So cruel and bloody have been the designs of Christ's and his church's enemies.

(3.) Their policy; Not on the feast-day. Why not? Was it in regard to the holiness of the time, or because they would not be disturbed in the religious services of the day? No, but lest there be an uproar among the people. They knew Christ had a great interest in the common people, who would be in danger of taking arms against their rulers, should they offer to lay violent hands on Christ, whom all held for a prophet. They were awed, not by the fear of God, but of the people; all their concern was for their own safety, not God's honor. They would have it done at the feast; for it was a tradition of the Jews, that malefactors should be put to death at one of the three feasts, especially rebels and impostors, that all Israel might see and fear; but not on the feast-day.

V. 6-13. In this passage we have,

I. The singular kindness of a good woman to our Lord, v. 6, 7. It was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper. Probably, he was one miraculously cleansed from leprosy by our Lord Jesus, and would express his gratitude to Christ by entertaining Him; nor did Christ disdain to converse with him, come in to Him, and sup with him. Though cleansed, yet he was called Simon the leper. Those who are guilty of scandalous sins, will find, that, though the sin be pardoned, the reproach will hardly be wiped away. The woman is supposed to have been Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. Lightfoot thinks, Mary Magdalene. She had a box of ointment very precious, which she poured on the head of Christ as He sat at meat. This, among us, would be a strange compliment. But it was then accounted the highest piece of respect; for the smell was very grateful, and the ointment refreshing to the head. David had his head anointed, Ps. 23: 6. Luke 7: 46. Now this may be looked on,

1. As an act of faith in Christ. To signify that she believed in Him as God's Anointed, whom He had set King; she anointed Him, and made Him her King. They shall appoint themselves one Head, Hos. 1: 11. This is kissing the Son.

2. As an act of love and respect to Him. Some think this was she who loved much at first, and washed Christ's feet with her tears (Luke 7: 47.) and that she had not left her love, but was now as affectionate, in the devotions of a grown Christian, as she was in those of a young beginner. Note, Where there is true love to Christ, nothing will be thought too good, no, nor good enough, to bestow on Him.

II. The offence the disciples took. They had indignation, (v. 8, 9.) were vexed to see this ointment thus spent, which they thought might have been better bestowed.

1. See how they expressed their offence at it. To what purpose is this waste? This bespeaks,

(1.) Want of tenderness toward this good woman, in interpreting her over-kindness (suppose it was so) to be wastefulness. Charity teaches us to put the best construction on every thing, especially on the words and actions of persons zealously affected in doing a good thing; though we may think them not altogether so discreet as they might be. There may be over-doing in well-doing; thence we must learn caution, lest we run into extremes, but not to be censorious; because what we may impute to want of prudence, God may accept as an instance of abundant love. We must not say, Those do too much in religion, who do more than we, but rather aim to do as much as they.

(2.) Want of respect to their Master. The best we can make of it, is, they knew their Master was dead to the delights of sense; He that was grieved for the affliction of Joseph, cared not for being anointed with the chief ointments, Amos 6: 6. And therefore they thought such pleasures ill bestowed on One who took so little pleasure in them. Yet it did not become them to call it waste, when they perceived that He accepted it as a token of love. Note, We must not think any thing bestow'd on the Lord Jesus a waste: not time spent in His service, nor money laid out in any work of piety, for, though it seem to be cast on the waters, we shall find it again, to advantage, after many days, Eccl. 1: 1.

2. See how they excuse their offence at it, and what pretence they made, v. 9. Note, It is no new thing for bad affections to shelter themselves under specious covers; for people to shift off works of piety under color of charity.

III. The reproof given; (v. 10, 11.) Why trouble ye the woman? Note, It is a great trouble to good people to have their good works censured as ill misconstrued; and a thing Christ takes very ill. He here took part with a zealous, well-meaning woman, against all his disciples, though they seem to have so much reason on their side; so heartily does He espouse the cause of the offended little ones, ch. 18: 10.

along a perfect knowledge of his approaching sufferings, though He met them with the most entire calmness and serenity. This seems to have been peculiar to Him; none of the prophets or apostles knew, beforehand, what they should be called to suffer. Even Paul said, 'I go up to Jerusalem, not knowing the things which shall befall me there.' This peculiarity should be carefully noted, when the intrepid and cool courage and resolution of Jesus, in the complete foreknowledge of his unparalleled sufferings, is the subject of our meditation. The contrast between the words of our Lord concerning Himself, as 'the Son of man,' in these verses, and those in the foregoing chapter. 'The Son of man shall come in his glory,' is peculiarly worthy of our observation.

SCOTT.

Verses 3-5.

The sanhedrim having agreed to put Christ to death, concluded it would be better to defer it till after the feast of the passover, lest the people, whom they supposed to favor Him, should make an insurrection for his rescue, if He were apprehended, while such numbers from all quarters were assembled in the city. (Marg. Ref.) But it pleased God to defeat this intention; as it was proper that Christ, the true paschal lamb, should be sacrificed at that season; and that his death and resurrection should be rendered the more extensively known. 'Maimonides saith, it was the custom among the Jews to punish those who rebelled against the sentence of the judge, or the high priest, or who notoriously criminal, at one of the three feasts, because then only, by reason of the public congress of the people, all might hear and fear.

'(Deut. 17: 12, 13.) From this received custom, the fathers of the sanhedrim seem willing to recede, for fear of the multitude; but having 'so often an offer from Judas, they embrace that season.' Whitby. God has, and not man, appointed the time in which Christ should be crucified.' Beza. (Note, Ps. 76: 10.) SCOTT.

John (12: 1.) fixes the date of this transaction to six days before the passover; and as it is utterly improbable, that it should have occurred twice in so short a time, and with exactly the same circumstances, we must conclude that the other evangelists have related it out of the order of time in which it happened. Our Lord was at this time entertained at Bethany, by 'Simon the leper'; but Lazarus was a guest, and Martha waited on them. Mary, the sister of Martha, doubtless was the woman, who anointed Him; and the late extraordinary favor conferred on her, in the resurrection of her brother, excited those fervent and grateful affections which influenced her conduct. Costly and fragrant ointment was used about the persons of the wealthy, according to the custom of those days. (Marg. Ref. 1-6.—Note, Mark 14: 3-9, v. 3.) We find that Judas, from bad motives, started the objection, yet it is probable the other disciples joined in it, in a manner, not only discouraging to Mary, but highly disrespectful to Christ. (John 12: 1-3.) (13.) This may be considered a most remarkable prophecy: He would influence the evangelists to record this incident, which might appear trivial, among the important actions of his public life, and take care it should never be erased.

his passion, could not but notice and perpetuate the memorial of it. And being once enrolled in these records, it was graven as with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever. None of all the trumpets of fame sound so loud and so long as the everlasting Gospel. Note, (1.) The story of the death of Christ, though a tragic one, is gospel glad-tidings, because He died for us. (2.) The Gospel was to be preached in the whole world; not in Judea only, but in every nation, to every creature. Let the disciples note this, for their encouragement, that their sound should go to the ends of the earth. (3.) Though the honor of Christ is principally designed in the Gospel, yet the honor of his saints and servants is not altogether overlooked. The memorial of this woman was to be preserved, not by dedicating a church to her, or keeping an annual feast in honor of her, or preserving a piece of her broken box for a sacred relic; but by mentioning her faith and piety in the preaching of the Gospel, for example to others, Heb. 6:12. Hereby honor redounds to Christ Himself, who, in this world, as in that to come, will be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

Observe his reason; You have the poor always with you. Note,
 1. There are some opportunities of doing and getting good, which are constant, and constantly to be improved. Those who have a heart to do good, never need complain for want of opportunity. The poor never ceased even out of the land of Israel, Deut. 15:11. We cannot but see some who call for our charitable assistance, some poor members of Christ, to whom He will have kindness shown as to Himself.

2. There are other opportunities of doing and getting good, which come but seldom, are short and uncertain, require peculiar diligence in the improvement of them, and ought to be preferred; 'Me ye have not always, therefore use Me while ye have Me.' Note, (1.) Christ's constant bodily presence was not to be expected here; it was expedient He should go away; his real presence in the eucharist is a fond and groundless conceit, and contradicts what He here said, Me ye have not always. (2.) Sometimes special works of piety and devotion should take place of common works of charity. The poor must not rob Christ; we must do good to all, but especially to the household of faith.

IV. Christ's approbation and commendation of the kindness. The more his servants and their services are cavilled at, the more He manifests his acceptance of them. He calls it a good work, (v. 10.) and says more in praise of it than could have been imagined; particularly,

1. That its meaning was mystical; (v. 12.) She did it for my burial. (1.) Some think she intended it so, and better understood Christ's frequent predictions of his death and sufferings than the apostles did; for which she was recompensed with the honor of being the first witness of his resurrection. (2.) However, Christ interpreted it so, and is always willing to make the best, and the most, of his people's well-meant words and actions. This was, as it were, the embalming of his body. The disciples thought the ointment wasted. 'But,' saith He, 'if so much ointment were poured on a dead body, according to the custom of your country, you would not grudge it, or think it waste. Now the body she anoints is as good as dead, and her kindness very reasonable; therefore, rather than call it waste, put it on that score.'

2. That the memorial of it should be honorable, v. 13. This act of faith and love was so remarkable, that the preachers of Christ crucified, and the inspired writers of the history of

us. (2.) The Gospel was to be preached in the whole world; not in Judea only, but in every nation, to every creature. Let the disciples note this, for their encouragement, that their sound should go to the ends of the earth. (3.) Though the honor of Christ is principally designed in the Gospel, yet the honor of his saints and servants is not altogether overlooked. The memorial of this woman was to be preserved, not by dedicating a church to her, or keeping an annual feast in honor of her, or preserving a piece of her broken box for a sacred relic; but by mentioning her faith and piety in the preaching of the Gospel, for example to others, Heb. 6:12. Hereby honor redounds to Christ Himself, who, in this world, as in that to come, will be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

V. 14—16. Immediately after an instance of the greatest kindness to Christ, follows an instance of the greatest unkindness; such mixture is there of good and bad among his followers; He hath some faithful friends, and some false ones.

I. The traitor was Judas Iscariot; he is said to be one of the twelve, as an aggravation of his villany. When the number of the disciples was multiplied, (Acts 6:1.) no marvel if there were some among them that were a shame and trouble to him; but when there were but twelve, and one of them was a devil, surely we must never expect any society perfectly pure on this side heaven. The twelve were Christ's chosen friends, his constant followers, that on all accounts had reason to love and be true to Him; and yet one of them betrayed Him. Note, No bonds of duty or gratitude will hold those that have a devil, Mark 5:3, 4.

II. Here is the proffer He made to the chief priests, v. 15. They did not send for Him, nor make the proposal to Him; they could not have thought that one of Christ's own disciples should be false to Him. Note, There are those, even among Christ's followers, that are worse than any can imagine them to be, and want nothing but opportunity to show it.

Observe, 1. What Judas promised; 'I will deliver Him unto you. I will let you know where He is, and undertake to bring you to Him, at such a convenient time and place, that you may seize Him without noise, or danger of an uproar.' This was it they were at a loss about, v. 4, 5. They durst not meddle with Him in public, and knew not where to find Him in private. The difficulty was insuperable, till Judas offered them his service. Note, Those that give up themselves to be led by the devil, find him readier than they imagine, to help them at a dead-lift, as Judas did the chief priests. Though the rulers could kill Him, when in their hands, none but a disciple could betray Him. Note, The greater profession men make

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Amidst the distressing events which take place in the world, we should always advert to the 'determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God,' as over-ruling all for the purposes of his own glory, and the benefit of those who trust in him. There are many devices in the heart of man; and yet, contrary to his intentions, he is led to arrange or alter them, in subserviency to the secret counsel of the Lord!—The enmity of the carnal heart against God, is irreconcilable and mortal; it rages with greater violence in hypocrites, than in other men, but most of all in covetous and ambitious churchmen. Thus power and policy have, in every age, combined against the person and cause of Jesus; yet they have not prevailed. But there has always been a remnant of another character—the humble, penitent, and believing; they reverence and love the Redeemer; deem themselves under infinite obligations to Him; long to express their love and gratitude, and zeal for his glory; and count nothing too valuable to be renounced for his sake, or employed in his service. These principles operate differently, as circumstances vary; but they always produce such actions as honor Christ, and as He will accept and commend: for He judges of men's conduct by their motives, and will not reject a well-meant service, springing from humble faith and love, though it may appear to us informal. But covetous hypocrites are ready to exclaim, 'To what purpose is this waste?' When they see others liberal in honoring Christ, even the fraudulent and unjust will plead for charity; and too often their plausible pretences seduce injudicious, or less zealous disciples, to censure those services which Christ accepts. But He will plead the cause of his followers, and rebuke those who trouble them for their good works. It is his plan, that there should be poor persons, and poor Christians, as his stated representatives, in order to make trial of the faith and love of his disciples; that, whenever they will, they may relieve them for his sake. This is the ordinary method; but extraordinary expressions of our love and gratitude are sometimes proper; and these will not be found inconsistent with each other, or materially to interfere with one another.

Verses 14—16.

Judas, notwithstanding his plausible conduct and apostolical office, was a hypocrite, and a covetous, dishonest man. (Marg. Ref. b, c.) Knowing, therefore, that the chief priests and rulers greatly desired to get Jesus into their hands, without disturbance, he framed the design of conducting their officers to Him, in the absence of the people. Probably, he hoped to ingratiate himself, and to obtain further advantages, beyond the present recompense. Perhaps he expected that Jesus would miraculously liberate Himself; and so no fatal consequences would ensue from his treachery. The reproof implied in our Lord's commendation of the woman's conduct, which from base motives he had condemned, seems also to have exasperated him; and thus Satan found access to hurry him forward to the execution of his infamous design. He agreed to do it for thirty pieces of silver, the price of a slave. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) 'So true is that of St. Paul, that Christ took on Him the form of a servant.' Hammond.

2 Tim. 4:10. Satan tempted our Savior with this bait. All this will I give thee; (ch. 4: 9.) but Judas offered himself to be tempted with it; he asks, What will ye give me? as if his Master was a commodity that stuck on his hands.

III. Here is the bargain made, (v. 15.) for thirty shekels; about £3 8s. so some; £3 15s., so others. It should seem, Judas referred himself to the chief priests, and was willing to take what they were willing to give; he catches at the first offer, lest the next should be worse. Judas had not been wont to trade high, and therefore a little money went a great way with him. By the law, (Exod. 21:32.) thirty pieces of silver was the price of a slave—a goodly price, at which Christ was valued! Zech. 11:13. No wonder that Zion's sons, though comparable to fine gold, are esteemed as earthen pitchers, when Zion's King Himself was thus undervalued. They covenanted with him, paid it down; so some; gave him his wages in hand, to secure and encourage him.

IV. Here is the industry of Judas, in pursuance of his bargain; v. 16. Note, 1. It is very wicked to seek opportunity to sin, and to devise mischief, for it argues the heart fully set to do evil. 2. Those that are in, think they must out. After he had made that wicked bargain, he had time to repent, and revoke it; but now, by his covenant, the devil has one hand more on him than he had, and tells him he must be true to his word, though ever so false to his Master, as Herod must behead John for his oath's sake.

V. 17-25. We have here an account of Christ's keeping the passover. Being made under the law, He submitted to all its ordinances; it was kept in remembrance of Israel's deliverance out of Egypt, the birth-day of that people; it was a tradition of the Jews, that in the days of the Messiah they should be redeemed on the very day of their coming out of Egypt, and it was exactly fulfilled, for Christ died the day after the passover, in which day they began their march.

I. The time when Christ ate the passover, was the usual time appointed by God, and observed by the Jews; (v. 17.) which that year happened on the fifth day of the week, our Thursday. Some have suggested that our Lord celebrated the passover at this time of day sooner than others did; but Whitby has largely disproved it.

Verses 17-19.

The person here mentioned, was probably a concealed friend and disciple of Christ, who, He knew, would be glad to accommodate Him and his apostles. Christ points out a certain person, as known to Him, whose name and house He does not mention to the disciples; but divinely foretells, that He would be discovered to them, by the events of religion, and the more they are employed in the study and service of it, the greater opportunity they have of doing mischief, if their hearts be not right with God. If Judas had not been an apostle, he could not have been a traitor; if men had not known the way of righteousness, they could not have abused it.

I will deliver Him unto you. He did not offer himself, nor did they tamper with him, to be a witness against Christ, though they wanted evidence, v. 59. Had there been any thing to be alleged against Him, which had but the color of proof that He was an impostor, Judas was the likeliest person to have attested it; but this is an evidence of the innocence of our Lord Jesus, that his own disciple, who knew so well his doctrine and manner of life, and was false to Him, could not charge Him with any thing criminal, though it would have served to justify his treachery.

2. What he asked; What will ye give me? He hoped to get money by it: his Master had not given him any provocation; though He knew from the first that he had a devil, yet, for aught that appears, He showed the same kindness to him as to the rest, and put no mark of disgrace on him that might disoblige him; He had placed him in a post that pleased him, and made him purse-bearer; though he had embezzled the common stock, for he is called a thief, (John 12: 6.) yet we do not find he was in danger of being called to account for it; nor does it appear that he had any suspicion that the Gospel was a cheat: no, it was not the hatred of his Master, nor any quarrel with Him, but purely the love of the money; that, and nothing else, made Judas a traitor.

What will ye give me? Why, what did he want? Neither bread nor raiment, necessities or conveniences. Was not he welcome wherever his Master was? Did he not fare as He fared? Had he not been but just now nobly entertained at a supper in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, and a little before at another, where no less a person than Martha herself waited at table? And yet this covetous wretch could not be content, but comes basely cringing to the priests with, What will ye give me? Note, It is not the lack but the love of money, that is the root of all evil, and particularly of apostasy from Christ; witness Demas,

II. The place where, was particularly appointed by Himself to the disciples, on their inquiry, v. 17. Perhaps Judas was one that asked this question, that he might know better to lay his train; but the rest asked it as usual, that they might do their duty.

1. They took it for granted their Master would eat the passover, though at this time persecuted by the chief priests, and his life sought; they knew He would not be put off by duty. Those do not follow Christ's example, who make it an excuse for their not attending his supper, our gospel-passover, that they have many troubles, and enemies, are full of care and fear: for, if so, they have the more need of that ordinance, to help to silence their fears, and comfort them under their troubles, to help them in forgiving their enemies, and casting all their cares on God.

2. They knew there must be preparation made, and that it was their business, as his servants, to make it. Where wilt thou that we prepare? Note, Before solemn ordinances, there must be solemn preparation.

3. They knew He had no house of his own wherein to eat; for our sakes He became poor. Among all Zion's palaces there was none for Zion's King; but his kingdom was not of this world. See John 1: 11.

4. They would not select a place without direction, and from Him they had direction to such a man, (v. 13.) probably a friend and follower, and to his house he invited Himself and disciples.

(1.) Tell him, My time is at hand; the time of his death, elsewhere called his hour; (John 8: 20. 13: 1.) the hour fixed in the counsel of God, which his heart was upon, and of which He had so often spoken. He knew when it was at hand, and was busy accordingly; we know not our time, (Eccl. 9: 12.) and must never be off our watch; our time is always ready, (John 7: 6.) and we must be always ready. Observe, Because his time was at hand, He would keep the passover. Note, The consideration of the near approach of death should quicken us to diligent improvement of all opportunities for our souls. Is our time at hand, and an eternity just before us? Let us then keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity. Observe, When our Lord Jesus invited Himself to this good man's house, He sent him intelligence, that his time was at hand. Note, Christ's secret is with them that entertain Him in their hearts. Compare John 14: 21 with Rev. 3: 20.

(2.) Tell him, I will keep the passover at thy house. An instance of authority, as the Master, which probably this man acknowledged. Thus, when Christ by his Spirit comes into the heart, He demands admission, as One whose own the heart is; and gains admission, as One who has all power in the heart, and cannot be resisted; if He saith, 'I will keep a feast in such a soul,' He will do it; for He works, and none can hinder; his people shall be willing, for He makes them so. I will keep the passover with my disciples. Note, Wherever Christ is welcome, He expects his disciples should be too. When we take God for our God, we take his people for our people.

III. The disciples made preparation; v. 19. Note, Those who would have Christ's presence with them in the gospel-passover, must strictly observe his instructions; They made ready the passover: got the lamb killed in the court of the temple, roasted, the bitter herbs provided, bread and wine, the cloth laid, and every thing set in readiness for such a sacred, solemn feast.

IV. They ate the passover according to the law; (v. 20.) He sat down. It was only the first passover in Egypt, as most think, that was eaten with their loins girded, shoes on their feet, and staff in their hand, though all that might be in a sitting posture. His sitting down they would meet with, as they entered the city. This was done to convince the disciples more and more clearly, that nothing would happen to their Lord by chance; but that He had the most exact foreknowledge of every minute circumstance. Thus they would be confirmed, by this example of divine Providence, against the great offence of his 'cross.' Beza. (Marg. Ref.—Mark 14: 12-16.)

denotes composure of mind. He sat down with the twelve, Judas not excepted. By the law, they were to take a lamb for a household, (Exod. 12: 3, 4,) which were to be not less than ten, nor more than twenty; Christ's disciples were his household. Note, They whom God has charged with families, must have their houses with them in serving the Lord.

V. We have here Christ's discourse at the passover supper. The usual subject at that ordinance was, the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; (Exod. 12: 26, 27,) but the great Passover is now ready to be offered, and the discourse of that, swallows up all talk of the other, Jer. 16: 14, 15. Here is,

1. The general notice Christ gives his disciples of the treachery that should be among them, v. 21. Observe, (1.) Christ knew it. We know not what troubles will befall us, nor whence they will arise; but Christ knew all his, which, as it proves his omniscience, so it magnifies his love, that He knew all that should befall Him, and yet did not draw back; would pay the price of our redemption, though He foresaw some would deny the Lord and buy Him; and shed his blood, though He knew it would be trodden under foot as an unholy thing. (2.) When there was occasion, He let those about Him know it. He had often told them, that the Son of man should be betrayed; now He tells them that one of them should do it, that, when they saw it, they might not only be the less surprised, but have their faith in Him confirmed, John 13: 19. 14: 29.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14-25. Upright persons, when betrayed into a mistake, will take reproof in good part; but it often proves the detection of hypocrisies: thus the discovery of their secret motives, and the commendation of those whom they dislike, or the actions which they disapprove, exasperate them, and push them forward to still baser attempts: and, while those whom they censured are had in perpetual and honorable remembrance, themselves sink into final infamy and misery.—But, with what scrupulous care and vigilance should every one guard against the first workings of avarice, and shun the most minute deviations from strict equity! For when dishonesty in comparatively little things has rendered the conscience callous, and given energy to temptation, men become capable of the most shameless injustice without hesitation; and the common question is, 'What will ye give me?' Then the most endeared or sacred ties will be broken, for even paltry, filthy lucre, by men who set their consciences and their souls to sale. And by those means, scheming villains, who were at a loss how to accomplish their intended iniquities, are furnished with instruments as detestable as themselves, and they mutually assist, and yet abhor and despise, each other.—But let us follow the steps of our divine Master, whatever man may devise against us. His disciples may inquire when, where, and with what preparation He would have them attend on his institutions:

but they should take it for granted, He will not neglect in any, as He Himself attended on all then in for Every heart is in his hands; He knows those hidden ones who favor his cause, and will graciously visit all who are willing to receive Him; and He will take care to procure from them entertainment for his disciples also.—But divine ordinances are seldom administered, even to a few, without the intrusion of some hypocrite; and the cause of Christ is often most betrayed by some, who seem most entirely to belong to Him. This consideration may often make us 'exceedingly sorrowful,' and should always render us very diligent in self-examination.—When a few persons are met for social prayer, religious conversation, or at the Lord's table, it may probably occur to each of them to suppose, that their heart-searching Savior is saying to the company, 'Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray Me.' They should not, however, look round on others with suspicion; but with self-examination and prayer should say, 'Lord, is it I?' We ought to be the more earnest in this investigation, because the doom of such domestic enemies will be most dreadful; so that it may be said of them especially, that 'it would have been good for them, if they had never been born;' and what heart can conceive the tremendous import of those words! (Ps. 90: 11.) SCOTT.

Without doubt, our Lord ate the passover at the time appointed by the law, and customary among the Jews. (Ex. 12: 3-10.) Mark says expressly, 'when they killed the passover;' and Luke, 'when the passover must be killed.' (Mark 14: 12. Luke 22: 7.) The passover was celebrated at the close of the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, and just when the fifteenth day began; for the Jews reckoned from evening to evening. 'The first day of unleavened bread,' strictly speaking, began at the very time when the Jews were eating the paschal lamb. But, in a more general sense, the whole fourteenth day, in which, among other preparations for the passover, leaven was put out of their houses, might be so called. (Ex. 12: 15-20.) 'Jesus seems not to have gone to Jerusalem that morning; so that it is probable He spent most of the day in retirement for meditation and prayer.'

Doddridge. (23.) Dippeth his hand with Me in the dish. Probably others of them did this from time to time, but Judas might be doing so at that instant; this, however, was intended to expose the baseness of his conduct, as well as to mark him out to the disciples; and afterwards (I apprehend) Jesus distinguished him more plainly by giving him a sop. (Marg. Ref. o.—Ps. 41: 9. 55: 12-15. John 13: 18-30, v. 18, 26, 27.) (24.) It had been good for that man if he had not been born. (Marg. Ref. v.—x.—Luke 22: 21-23.) This could not have been the case, if he should ever be liberated from punishment, and made partaker of eternal happiness; for that would infinitely overbalance all possible temporary suffering, of whatever acuteness and continuance; and would therefore prove his existence, on the whole, to be an invaluable blessing. 'The prediction of this event, that Jesus should suffer, and by the treachery of Judas, did lay on Judas no antecedent necessity of doing this action; because it did not lessen the 'woe due to him for it; but only doth suppose in God a knowledge, how the will of man, left to his own freedom, will determine or incline 'itself.' Whitby. Surely, it implies also, that God determined to leave Judas to himself; and if this foreknowledge and predetermination did not interfere with Judas's free agency and accountability, it does not appear how any foreknowledge and predetermination could leave men to themselves, can interfere with their free agency and accountability. It is wonderful that thinking and studious men do not see that the whole system of prophecy is a direct and full confutation of all objections, on this ground, against the doctrine of predetermination. The predicted events cannot possibly fail of accomplishment; they must therefore either be absolutely decreed by the all-wise God, or there must be some necessity which cannot be overcome even by the Deity Himself. The first is Christian predestination, the latter is heathen fatalism; but neither interferes with man's free agency and accountability; for he still acts voluntarily, according to the prevailing inclinations of his heart. SCOTT.

(24.) Goeth. 'That is, is about to die. Going, going away, departing, &c. are frequently used in the best Greek and Latin writers, for death, or dying. The same words are often used in the Scriptures in the same sense.'

4. The conviction of Judas, v. 25. (1.) He asked, Is it I? to avoid coming under suspicion of guilt by silence. He knew very well it was he, and yet wished to appear a stranger to such a plot. Note, Many, whose consciences condemn them, are very industrious to justify themselves before men, and put a good face on it, with, Lord, is it I? He could not but know that Christ knew, and yet trusted so much to his courtesy, because he had hitherto concealed it, that he had the impudence to challenge Him to tell; or, perhaps, he was so much under the power of infidelity, that he imagined Christ did not know it, as those who said, The Lord shall not see, (Ps. 94: 7.) and asked, Can He judge through the dark clouds? (2.) Christ soon answered his question; Thou hast said, that is, It is as thou hast said. This is not spoken of so plain as Nathan's, Thou art the man; but was enough to convict him, and, if his heart had not been wretchedly hardened, to have broken his plea, when he saw it was known to his Master. Note, Those

When the paschal lamb had been eaten, the Lord's supper was appointed; for this was substituted to be a commemorative observance, 'without shedding of blood,' of redemption already made, as the passover had been a prefigurative ordinance, with 'shedding of blood,' of redemption to be made in the fulness of time. Nothing can be more simple in its nature and use, than this sacred institution: yet nothing has ever been more obscured, perplexed, misunderstood, and perverted. The language our Lord used, in instituting this ordinance, is manifestly figurative, and cannot admit of a literal interpretation, unless any say, the cup was literally the blood of Christ, or the new covenant; and this renders it the more wonderful, that any should be so adventurous and absurd, as to require all Christians to believe, in contradiction to their senses and I understandings, that the bread in the sacrament, after consecration, becomes the real, entire, living body of Christ, together with his deity, and therefore a proper object of divine adoration. (Marg. Ref. c—e, 55. Luke 22: 19, 20. 1 Cor. 10: 4. 11: 25. Gal. 4: 24, 25.) The Scripture gives no intimation of any mystery, or difficulty, in this institution. By comparing passages, relating to this subject, it appears that our Lord commanded his disciples to meet in his name; a aid with prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, to break, distribute, and eat bread, the most salutary and universal of all viands, by which life is sustained; and to pour out and drink wine, the most valuable and refreshing of cordials. This was to be performed 'in remembrance of Him,' and of his love and sufferings for them; and as a representation of 'his body broken, and his blood shed' for their sins, to purchase the blessings of the new covenant; and of the method, by which they might take this salvation, even by receiving and 'feeding' on Him in their hearts, by faith with thanksgiving. By his body and blood we are doubtless to understand his human nature, joined in person to union with his deity; and the separation of the blood from the body, the immediate cause of death, must be understood to include all his expiatory sufferings. The holiness and dignity of the Redeemer, his humiliation and his agonies; his compassion and condescension; the deplorable condition from which He redeemed his people; the efficacy of his one oblation; the honor and happiness to which He exalts believers; and the discovery made, in that great transaction, of the justice and love of God, the excellency of his law, the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things; require peculiar consideration, without mention, when the death of Christ is commemorated, through the medium of these emblems. The bread and wine were, probably, received by the apostles sitting or reclining, and in the evening; yet no command was given about the time, place, and posture. (Ex. 12: 11—14.) The action of communicating seems to imply a confession of our guilt and ruin, as justly condemned criminals, who could have no hope of pardon or salvation, from any thing we could do of ourselves: a profession of our faith, respecting the person, incarnation, suretyship, and atonement of Christ, and the necessity, reality, and suitability of his sacrifice and vicarious sufferings; a dependence on this atonement, and the mercy of God according to the covenant thus mediated; an acknowledgment of our unpayable obligation to our gracious Benefactor, who has given his life for us; a strong, open expression of our love and gratitude to Him; a sacramental engagement to submit to and obey Him, as our beloved Lord and Savior; and a public joining of ourselves to Him and his people, to walk with them in Christian fellowship, in who are contriving to betray Christ, will some time or other, betray themselves, and their own tongues will fall on them.

V. 26—30. We have here the institution of the great gospel ordinance of the Lord's supper, which was received of the Lord. Observe,

I. The time—as they were eating. At the latter end of the passover-supper, because, as at least on a sacrifice, it was to come in the room of that ordinance. Christ is to us the Passover-Sacrifice, by which atonement is made; (1 Cor 5: 8.) Christ, our Passover, is sacrificed for us. This ordinance is to us the passover-supper, by which application is made, and commemoration celebrated, of a much greater deliverance than that of Israel out of Egypt. All the legal sacrifices of propitiation being summed up in the death of Christ, and so abolished, all the legal feasts of rejoicing were summed up in this sacrament, and so abolished.

II. The institution itself. A sacrament must be instituted; it is no part of moral worship, nor dictated by natural light, but has both its being and significance from the institution, from a divine institution: it is his prerogative, who established the covenant, to appoint the seals of it. Hence the apostle, (1 Cor. 11: 23., &c.) in that discourse of his concerning this ordinance, calls Jesus Christ the Lord, because as Lord, Lord of the covenant, of the church, He appointed it. In which,

1. The body of Christ is signified and represented by bread; He had said formerly, (John 6: 35.) I am the Bread of life, on which metaphor this sacrament is built: as the life of the body is supported by bread, which is therefore put for all bodily nourishment, (ch. 4: 4. 6: 11.) so the life of the soul is supported and maintained by Christ's mediation.

(1.) He took bread—the loaf; probably unleavened bread; but that circumstance not being taken notice of, we are not to bind our-sacred ordinances, and devotedness to the Redeemer. No man can therefore sincerely and intelligently partake of this ordinance, who is not self-condemned and penitent; who does not, with application to his own case, believe the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel; who does not awfully in secret, earnest prayer for an interest in the salvation of Christ; who lives in allowed sin, or neglect of known duty; whose heart is under the dominion of pride, malice, avarice, or any evil propensity; who makes it merely a step to preferment, or compensation for sin, a covering of iniquity or infidelity, a self-righteous service, or excuse for licentiousness; for such men are 'guilty of the body and blood of Christ.' But the humble penitent, the trembling believer, who relies on a crucified Savior, and longs to live in his glory, should fear no shame in this institution: it is his duty and privilege to come to it, as he has opportunity; and he will find it admirably suited to increase every holy disposition and consolation. This obvious and intelligible effect shows it to be as well suited to strengthen and refresh the soul and its graces, as bread and wine are to nourish and cheer animal life. They, who are not prepared to receive the Lord's supper, cannot be fit for death and heaven; nay, acceptable prayer cannot be offered without similar preparation of heart. It has been disputed, whether Judas partook of the Lord's supper, or not; but the controversy seems of no great consequence. If he did, his presence encourages no intruders; but solemnly warns every man previously to examine the state of his soul: nor can it sanction the admission of openly wicked persons; and no discipline can exclude specious hypocrites. (John 13: 30.) Some have endeavored to prove the resurrection of Christ, to be the chief doctrine, the belief of which constitutes a Christian; and that this is the grand proof of all other doctrines, and the evidence that the atonement was accepted. The appointment, however, of this ordinance, 'to show forth the Lord's death till He come,' evinces the belief of that doctrine to distinguish essentially a real Christian; and that reliance on the atonement of Christ, for remission of sins, and the blessings of salvation, and thus spiritually eating his flesh, and drinking his blood, forms the great peculiarity of the life of faith in the Son of God. (Marg. Ref.—John 6: 52—58. 1 Cor 10: 14—17. 11: 23—34.) Why did our blessed Redeemer so distinguish this mournful scene? Why 'should not his followers rather celebrate his birth, his resurrection or ascension, than his death? The mode is yet more surprising. It is by a feast, not fast. It is a celebration of praise and thanksgiving, not mourning. It purports to be a feast upon the body and blood of Him, whose death is commemorated! Assuredly, the most singular commemoration of a venerated deceased character, ever heard of in the world! Familiarity with the ceremony has laid our attention asleep; otherwise it must appear most extraordinary. Deny the atonement, and the communion of the soul with the Savior by faith, and I conceive, such an observance inexplicable. But, admit these doctrines, and all is easy, natural, and in the highest degree significant.' Sermons by Rev. J. Scott. The papists, who refuse the cup to the laity and give an unbroken wafer, instead of broken bread, in effect disannul our Lord's institution, and substitute another in its place.

(2.) Wine. Wine and water was used in the paschal cup, and the rabbins say, over wine unmixed with water no blessing is asked. This custom of mixing the wine with water was adopted by the first Christians, and is still continued by the Romanists. See Justin Martyr, Clement, Cyprian, cited by Grotius. BLOOMFIELD.

28 For this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins.

29 But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

requires breach for breach, (Rev. 24:20.) and Christ was broken to satisfy that demand. [2.] The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the father of the family breaks the bread to the children. The breaking of Christ to us is to facilitate the application; every thing is made ready to us by the grants of God's Word, and the operations of his grace.

(4.) He gave it to his disciples, as the Master of the family, and of this feast; not to the apostles, though they were apostles, and had been often called so, but to the disciples, because all the disciples of Christ have a right to this ordinance; and those shall have the benefit of it who are his disciples indeed; yet He gave it to them as He did the multiplied loaves, by them to be handed to all his other followers.

(5.) He said, Take, eat; this is my body, v. 26. He here tells them,

[1.] What they should do with it: 'Take, eat; accept of Christ as offered to you, receive the atonement, approve of, consent to it, come up to the terms on which the benefit of it is proposed to you; submit to his grace and government.' Believing on Christ is expressed by receiving Him, (John 1:12.) and feeding on Him, John 6: 57, 58. Meat will not nourish us, unless it be fed upon, so the doctrine of Christ.

[2.] What they should have with it; This is my body, not this bread, but this eating and drinking. Believing carries all the efficacy of Christ's death to our souls. This is my body, spiritually and sacramentally; this signifies and represents my body. He employs sacramental language, like that, (Exod. 12:11.) It is the Lord's passover. On a carnal and much mistaken sense of these words, the church of Rome builds the monstrous doctrine of transubstantiation, which makes the bread to be changed into the substance of Christ's body, only the accidents of bread remaining: which affronts Christ, destroys the nature of a sacrament, and gives the lie to our senses.

2. The blood of Christ is signified and represented by wine; to make it a complete feast, here is not only bread to strengthen, but wine to make glad the heart, v. 27, 28. He took the cup, the grace-cup, (set ready to be drunk, after thanks returned, according to the custom of the Jews,) and made it the sacramental cup, and so altered the property. It was intended for a cup of blessing, (so the Jews called it,) and therefore Paul studiously distinguished between the cup of blessing which we bless, and that which they bless. He gave thanks, to teach us, not only in every ordinance, but in every part of it, to have our eyes up to God.

This cup He gave to the disciples,

(1.) With a command; Drink ye all of it. Thus He welcomes his guests to his table, obliges them all to drink of his cup. Why should He so expressly command them all to drink, and to see that none let it pass them, and press that more expressly in this than in the other part of the ordinance? Surely it was because He foresaw how in after-ages this ordinance would be dimembered, by the prohibition of the cup to the laity, notwithstanding the command.

(2.) With an explication; for this is my blood of the New Testament. Therefore drink it with appetite, delight, because it is so rich a cordial. Hitherto the blood of Christ had been represented by real blood; but, after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood; so wine is called in an Old-Testament prophecy of Christ, Gen. 49:10, 11.

Now observe, Christ saith,

[1.] It is my blood of the New Testament. The Old Testament was confirmed by the blood of bulls and goats; (Heb. 9:16, 17. Exod. 24:8.) but the New, with the blood of Christ; It is my blood of the New Testament. The covenant God is pleased to make with us, and all its benefits and privileges, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

Verse 29.

'The passover a type of the redemption, shall be fulfilled and completed by my death and resurrection. The shadow passes away; the substance takes place; and when you eat this supper in remembrance of Me, there will be virtually present among you; and your souls shall be nourished and refreshed by my grace, as your bodies by the bread and wine.' Bp. Porteus Wine is the scriptural emblem of selves to that, as some of the Greek churches do. His taking the bread was a solemn action, and was probably done in such a manner as to be observed by them that sat with Him, that they might expect something more than ordinary to be done with it. Thus was the Lord Jesus set apart in the counsels of divine love for the working out of our redemption.

(2.) He blessed it; he set it apart for this use by prayer and thanksgiving. We do not find any set form of words used by Him on this occasion; but what He said, no doubt was accommodated to the business in hand, that New Testament, which by this ordinance was to be sealed and ratified. This was like God's blessing the seventh day, Gen. 2:3. Christ could command the blessing, and we, in his name, are ennobled to beg it.

(3.) He brake it; which denotes, [1.] The breaking of Christ's body for us; He was bruised for our iniquities; (Isa. 28:28.) though a bone of Him was not broken, yet his flesh was broken with breach upon breach, and his wounds were multiplied, John 19:36. 11:17. God complains that He is broken with the whorish heart of sinners; (Ezek. 6:9.) his law broken, our covenants with Him broken; now justice requires breach for breach, (Rev. 24:20.) and Christ was broken to satisfy that demand. [2.] The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the father of the family breaks the bread to the children. The breaking of Christ to us is to facilitate the application; every thing is made ready to us by the grants of God's Word, and the operations of his grace.

(2.) With an explication; for this is my blood of the New Testament. Therefore drink it with appetite, delight, because it is so rich a cordial. Hitherto the blood of Christ had been represented by real blood; but, after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood; so wine is called in an Old-Testament prophecy of Christ, Gen. 49:10, 11.

Now observe, Christ saith,

[1.] It is my blood of the New Testament. The Old Testament was confirmed by the blood of bulls and goats; (Heb. 9:16, 17. Exod. 24:8.) but the New, with the blood of Christ; It is my blood of the New Testament. The covenant God is pleased to make with us, and all its benefits and privileges, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

[2.] It is shed; it was not shed till next day, but it was now on the point of being shed it as good as done. 'Before you come to repeat this ordinance yourselves, it will be shed.' He was now ready to be offered, and his blood to be poured out as the blood of the sacrifices which made atonement.

[3.] It is shed for the remission of sins. Christ came to confirm a covenant with many. (Dan. 9:27.) and the intent of his death agreed. The blood of the Old Testament was shed for a few; it confirmed a covenant which (saith Moses) the Lord has made with you, (Exod. 24:8.) The atonement was made only for the children of Israel; (Lev. 16:34.) but Jesus Christ is a Propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John 2:2.

[4.] It is shed for the remission of sins, that is, to purchase remission of sins for us. The redemption we have through his blood, is the remission of sins, Eph. 1:7. The new covenant, which is procured and ratified by the blood of Christ, is a charter of pardon, an act of indemnity, in order to a reconciliation between God and man; for sin was the only thing that made the quarrel, and without shedding of blood is no remission, Heb. 9:22. The pardon of sin is that great blessing which is, in the Lord's supper, conferred on all true believers; the foundation of all other blessings, and the spring of everlasting comfort, ch. 9:2, 3. A farewell is now hidden to the fruit of the vine, v. 29. Christ and his disciples had now feasted together, with much comfort, in both an Old-Testament and a New-Testament festival, the connecting tie of both Testaments. How amiable were these tabernacles! How good to be here! Never such a heaven on earth as was at this table; but it was not intended for a perpetuity; He now told them, (John 16:17.) that yet a little while, and they should not see Him; and again, a little while, and they should see Him, which explains this here.

1st. He takes leave of such communion; (v. 29.) that is, Now that I am no more in the world, (John 17:11.) Farewell, this fruit of the vine, this passover cup, this sacramental wine. Dying saints take their leave of sacraments, and the other ordinances of communion they enjoy in this world, with comfort, for the joy and glory they enter into supersede them all.

2dly. He assures them of a happy meeting again at last. It is a long, but not an everlasting farewell; until that day, when I drink it new with you. 1. Some understand it of the interviews He had with them after his resurrection, which was the first step of his exaltation into the kingdom of his Father; and though during those forty days He did not converse with them so constantly as He had done, yet He did eat and drink with them, (Acts 10:41.) which, as it confirmed their faith, so doubtless it greatly comforted their hearts, Luke 24:41. 2. Others understand it of the joys and glories of the future state, which the saints shall partake of, in everlasting communion with the Lord Jesus, represented here, by the pleasures of a banquet of wine. That will be the kingdom of his Father, for unto Him shall the kingdom be then delivered up: the wine of consolation (Jer. 16:7.) will there be always new.

Lastly, Here is the close of the solemnity with a hymn; (v. 30.) They sang a hymn, or psalm; whether the psalm the Jews usually sung at the close of the passover-supper, called the great hallel, i. e., Ps. 113. and the five that follow it, or some new hymn, more closely adapted to the occasion is uncertain; I rather think the former; had it been new, John would not have omitted it. Note, 1. Singing of psalms is a gospel ordinance. Christ's removing the hymn from the close of the passover to the close of the Lord's supper, plainly intiglatness; (Judg. 9:8-15, v. 13. Ps. 104:14, 15. Is. 25:6-8. 55:1-3. Zech. 9:13-17.) The joy of his disciples in Him, and his in them, both in the church on earth, and in the heavenly state, may be figuratively intended. Our Lord calls this wine, after consecration, 'the fruit of the vine.'

'To drink new wine,' was to enter in a new year, epoch, or period mates that He intended that ordinance should continue in his church, that, as it had not its birth with the ceremonial law, so it should not die with it. 2. It is very proper after the Lord's supper, as an expression of our joy in God through Jesus Christ, and a thankful acknowledgment of that great love, wherewith God has loved us in Him. 3. It is not unreasonable, no, not in times of sorrow and suffering; the disciples were in sorrow, and Christ was entering on his sufferings, and yet they could sing a hymn together. Our spiritual joy should not be interrupted by outward afflictions.

When this was done, they went out into the mount of Olives. He would not stay in the house to be apprehended, lest He should bring the master of the house into trouble; nor would He stay in the city, lest it should occasion an uproar; but He retired into the adjacent country, the mount of Olives, the same mount that David in his distress went up weeping, 2 Sam. 15:30. Note, After we have received the Lord's supper, it is good for us to retire for prayer and meditation, and to be alone with God.

V. 31-35. Observe here,

I. Christ foretells,

1. A dismal scattering storm just arising, v. 31.

(1.) They should all be offended because of Him that very night; that is, they would all be so frightened with the sufferings, they would not have courage to cleave to Him in them, but would all basely desert Him; Because of Me this night; because of Me, even because of this night; so it might be read; that is, because of what happens to Me this night. Note, [1.] Offences will come among disciples of Christ, in an hour of trial and temptation; for they are weak, Satan is busy; God permits offences; even they whose hearts are upright may sometimes be overtaken with an offence. [2.] There are some temptations and offences, the effects of which are general among Christ's disciples; All you shall be offended. Christ had lately discovered to them the treachery of Judas; but let not the rest be secure; though there be but one traitor, they will all be deserters. This He saith to alarm them all, that they might all watch. [3.] We have need to prepare for sudden trials, how may come to extremity in a very little time. How soon may a storm arise! We know not what a day or a night may bring forth, nor what great event may be in the teeming womb of a little time, Prov. 27:1. [4.] The cross of Christ is the great stumbling-block to many, that pass for his disciples; both the cross He bare for us, (1 Cor. 1:23.) and that which we are called to bear for Him, ch. 16:24.

(2.) That herein the scripture would be fulfilled; I will smite the Shepherd. It is quoted from Zech. 13:7. [1.] Here is the smiting of another; each shifting for himself, and happy he that could get furthest from the cross.

2. He gives them the prospect of a comfortable gathering together again after this storm, v. 32. "Though you will forsake Me, I will not forsake you; though you fall, I will take care you shall not fall finally: we shall meet again in Galilee; I will go before you as the shepherd before the sheep." Some make the last words of that prophecy, (Zech. 13:7.) a promise equivalent to this here; And I will bring my hand again to the little ones. There is no bringing them back, but by bringing his hand to them. Note, The Captain of our salvation knows how to rally his troops, when, through cowardice, they have been put in disorder.

II. The presumption of Peter, that he should keep his integrity, whatever happened, v. 33. Peter had a great stock of confidence, and was on all occasions forward to speak, especially for himself; sometimes it did him a kindness, but at other times it betrayed him, as here. Where observe,

1. He bound himself with a promise, that he would never be offended in Christ; not only not this night, but at no time. If this promise had been made in a humble dependence on the grace of Christ, it had been an excellent word. Before the Lord's supper, Christ's discourse led his disciples to examine themselves with, Lord, is it I? For that is our preparatory duty after the ordinance, his discourse leads them to engage themselves to a close walk, for that is the subsequent duty.

2. He fancied himself better armed against temptation than any one else; this was his weakness and folly. Peter supposes it possible that some, nay that all, might be offended, and yet he escape better than any. Note, It argues great self-conceit and self-confidence, to think ourselves either safe from the temptations, or free from the corruptions, common to men. Rather say, If it be possible that others may be offended, there is danger that I may be. But it is common for those who think too well of themselves, easily to admit suspicions of others. See Gal. 6:1.

III. The particular warning to Peter of what he would do, v. 34. He imagined that he should come off better than any; Christ tells him he should come off worse. The warning is introduced with a solemn asseveration; Verily, I say unto thee; take my word for it, who know thee better than thou knowest thyself. He tells him,

1. That he should deny Him. Peter promised that he would not be so much as offended in Him, nor desert Him; but Christ tells him he will go further, will disown Him. He said, "Though all men, yet not I;" and did it sooner than any.

2. How quickly he should do it; this night before to-morrow, nay, before cock-crowing. Satan's temptations are compared to darts, (Eph. 6:16.) which wound ere we are aware;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26-35. Self-examination and fervent prayers are peculiarly proper before "the Lord's supper," in order that, "as Christ our Passover is now sacrificed for us," we may "keep this commemorative feast, not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth;" and that we may, every time we partake of it, renew our repentance, our faith in his blood, our consent to his covenant, our lively exercise of admiring, grateful love to Him, and love to his people, and our surrender of ourselves to his service, as "bought with a price, to glorify Him with our bodies and our spirits, which are his." While we contemplate the outward signs of "his body broken and his blood shed for the remission of our sins," let us recollect, that the feast was as expensive to Him, as if He had literally "given us his flesh to eat, and his blood to drink;" that there must be a real (though a spiritual) participation of Him, and appropriation of his salvation to our souls, or we shall have no benefit from his sacrifice; and that by a continued reliance on Him, in lively faith, we must be strengthened and recruited for our conflict, our work, and "the race set before us." Whilst multitudes profane this sacred ordinance, by a proud, pharisaical, infidel, or licentious attendance, and numbers, by statedly absenting themselves, confess their consciousness that they have no part or lot in the blessings of salvation; even many true Christians are guilty of ingratitude, and hard suspicions of the gracious Redeemer, and do great harm to their own souls, by refusing this profession of their faith and love, or by so seldom joining with his people in thus remembering Him. It may be that some are alarmed by the ease and doom of Judas; and the conscious hypocrite may well be called upon to pause and tremble at the thought: but the feeble Christian should remember, that all the apostles were offended, during that very night in which they had eaten both the passover and the Lord's supper, and that Peter fell in a more dreadful manner; yet their guilt was not unpardonable, nor their fall irrecoverable. Our communicating, indeed, ought to excite us to redouble our watchfulness; but the fear of afterwards being overcome by temptation, should never induce any man to neglect obedience to the express command of Christ. Rather we should seek, in this affecting ordinance, to enjoy his "love, which is better than wine;" (Cant. 1:2, 4.) and to anticipate the felicity of heaven, when we shall rejoice with the Savior, and He with us, unspeakably and eternally. SCOTT.

36 ¶ Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto the disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder.

37 And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful and very heavy.

false to his Master, whatever it cost him; yet, it proved, he was. It is easy to talk boldly and carelessly of death at a distance; 'I will rather die than do such a thing'; but it is not so soon done as said, when death shows itself in its own colors.

What Peter said, the rest subscribed to, v. 35. Note, 1. There is a prudence in good men to be over-confident of their own strength and stability. We are ready to think ourselves able to grapple with the strongest temptations, to go through the hardest and most hazardous services, and to bear the greatest afflictions for Christ; but it is because we do not know ourselves. 2. Those often fall soonest and foulest, that are most confident of themselves. Those are least safe, that are most secure. Satan is most active to seduce such; they are most off their guard, and God leaves them to themselves, to humble them. See 1 Cor. 10: 12.

V. 35-45. Hitherto, we have seen the preparatives for Christ's sufferings; now, we enter on the bloody scene. Now the sword of the Lord began to awake against the man that was his Fellow; and how should it be quiet, when the Lord had given it a charge? The clouds had been long gathering. He had said, some days before, Now is my soul troubled, John 12: 27. But now the storm began in earnest. He put Himself into this agony, before his enemies gave Him any trouble, to show that He was a Free-will-offering; that his life was not forced from Him, but He laid it down of Himself, John 10: 18. Observe,

I. The place, Gethsemane. The name signifies, an olive-mill, a press for olives, like a wine-press, Mic. 6: 15. And this was the proper place for such a thing, at the foot of the mount of Olives. There our Lord Jesus began his passion, there it pleased the Lord to bruise Him. There He trod alone the wine-press of his Father's wrath.

II. The company He had with Him.

1. He took all the twelve to the garden, except Judas, who was at this time otherwise employed. Though late at night, they kept with Him, as Elisha, who, when told his master should shortly be taken from his head, declared he would not leave him, though he led him about; so these follow the Lamb, wheresoever He goes.

2. He took only Peter, James and John, into that corner of the garden where he suffered his agony. He left the rest at some distance, with this

Verses 35-39.

The word 'Gethsemane' signifies the valley of fatness; and this seems to have been a pleasant and fruitful garden, to which Jesus frequently resorted with his disciples, for retirement, devout conversation, and religious exercises. (33.) The words used, are the most expressive imaginable, and denote the greatest dejection, amazement, anguish, and horror of mind, which can be conceived; the state of one surrounded with sorrows, overwhelmed with miseries, and almost swallowed up with consternation. (39.) Cap. Some refer this to the present anguish and horror He felt, and not to his approaching crucifixion; but, whatever we understand by it, it expressed his strong aversion to suffering, even when the glory of God and the good of man required it; and it showed that He had all the innocent feelings of our nature, in the most exquisite degree; that, had it been 'possible,' that is, consistent with the justice, truth, holiness, and mercy of God, to have mitigated or remitted his sufferings, He would have desired it, as much as we should in similar circumstances; and the subsequent retraction showed his perfect resignation and willingness to bear that unspeakable burden, which must otherwise have sunk us into everlasting destruction. (Marg. Ref.—See Mark 14: 32-45, v. 39. John 12: 27-39. 18: 10-14. v. 11. Heb. 5: 7-10, v. 7.) Luke records, that when Jesus was at prayer, an angel was sent to strengthen his mind for the conflict; and that, though the night was cold, his whole frame was agitated to such a degree, 'that his sweat became as great drops of blood falling to the ground.' (Note. Luke 22: 39-45, v. 43, 44.) It is here we learn here to inquire, with diffidence and caution, into the causes of our Lord's agony. To mention the treachery and fate of Judas, or the misconduct of Peter and the other apostles, or the unbelief of the Jews, as causes of this surprising effect, must fail to give the reflecting mind the least satisfaction. We must also exclude many of those things, which cause the most exquisite misery to the human mind of which it is capable; for there could be in the holy Jesus no horrors of a guilty conscience, no conflict of sinful passions, no despair as to the final event of his sufferings.

It is not indeed possible for us fully to understand or explain this subject; yet we may point out the light, which the Scriptures afford us upon it. Christ sustained the character of our Surety, who undertook to be answerable for our sins; accordingly 'our iniquities were laid upon Him,' and 'He was made sin for us,' and 'suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust,' and the Scripture ascribes the heaviest of his sufferings to be immediate hand of God; 'It pleased the Lord to bruise suddenly doth he shoot. As we know not how near we may be to trouble, so we know not how near we may be to sin; if God leave us to ourselves, we are always in danger.

3. How often he should do it; thrice. He thought that he should never once do such a thing; but Christ tells him that he would do it again and again; for, when once our feet begin to slip, it is hard to recover our standing. The beginnings of sin are as the letting forth of water.

IV. Peter's repeated assurances of fidelity, v. 35. He supposed the temptation strong, when he said, Though all men do it, yet will not I. But here he supposeth it stronger, when he puts it to the peril of life; Though I should die with thee. He knew what he should do—rather die with Christ than deny Him, it was the condition of discipleship; (Luke 14: 26.) and he thought what he would do—never be charge, Sit ye here, while I go pray yonder, like that of Abraham to his young men, Gen. 22: 5. (...) Christ went to pray alone, though He had lately prayed with his disciples, John 17: 1. Note, Our prayers with our families must not excuse us from secret devotions. (2.) He ordered them to sit here. Note, We must take heed of disturbing or interrupting those who retire for secret communion with God. He took these three with Him, because they had been witnesses of his glory in his transfiguration, (ch. 17: 1, 2,) and that would prepare them to be the witnesses of his agony. Note, Those are best prepared to suffer with Christ, that have by faith beheld his glory, and conversed with the glorified saints on the holy mount. If we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with Him; and if we hope to reign, why not expect to suffer with Him?

III. The agony itself, (v. 37.) called (Luke 22: 44.) a conflict. It was not any bodily pain, but from within; He troubled Himself, John 11: 33. The words here used are very emphatic. He began to be sorrowful, and in a consternation. The latter word signifies, such a sorrow as makes a man neither fit for desirous of company. He had like a weight of lead on his spirits. Physicians use a word near akin to it, to signify the disorder the man is in, in a fit of an ague, or beginning of a fever. Now was fulfilled Ps. 22: 14. I am poured out like water, my heart is like wax, it is melted; and all those passages in the Psalms, where David complains of the sorrow of his soul, (Ps. 18: 4, 6. 42: 7. 55: 4, 5. 69: 1-3. 88: 3. 116: 3.) and Jonah's complaint, ch. 2: 4, 5.

But what was the cause of all this? Why art Thou cast down, blessed Jesus, and why disquieted? Certainly, nothing of despair or distrust of his Father, much less any conflict or struggle with Him. As the Father loved Him because He laid down his life for the sheep, so He was entirely subject to his Father's will in it. But,

1. He engaged in an encounter with the powers of darkness; so he intimates; (Luke 22: 53.) This is your hour, and the power of darkness; and He spake of it just before; (John 14: 30, 31.) The prince of this world comes. I see him rallying his forces, and preparing for a general assault; but he has nothing in me, no garrisons in his interest, none that secretly hold correspondence with him; and therefore his attempts, though fierce, will be fruitless; but as the Father gave Me com-

Him, He made his soul a sacrifice for sin.' The sword of divine justice was commanded to 'awake against the Shepherd, and smite Him'; and God 'spared not his own Son.' (Is. 53: 9, 10. Zech. 13: 7. Rom. 8: 32-34, v. 32.) From these scriptures we may conclude, that the human nature of Christ was, on this occasion, left wholly destitute of all consolatory communications from the Holy Spirit; though supported by its union with the Deity, to endure the unknown anguish without sinking under it, and an assured confidence of a glorious event. Probably, some degree of the same darkness and horror oppressed his mind, during the whole subsequent scene, till on the cross He said, 'it is finished.' Accordingly we do not read, that He uttered any complaint about his outward sufferings, but He most dolefully exclaimed, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' Nor is it at all improbable, that his great enemy and ours, the prince of darkness, whom He came to overthrow, and with whom He maintained a constant conflict through life, and triumphed over by his death, should exert his utmost power, by presenting real, or raising up imaginary terrors, to shake the constancy of his soul, and deter Him from the great work He had undertaken. These, and a multitude of other agonizing distresses, unknown and inconceivable to us, with might and energy spring from so vast, so stupendous a work, as the salvation of a whole world, made a plain distinction between our Savior's situation, and that of any other martyr to the cause of truth; and most clearly prove that there never was a sorrow in every respect like 'unto his sorrow.' Ep. Porteus. 'Christ dreaded not death in itself' but the wrath of God against sin, the weight of which for our sakes must be sustained.' Beza.

scourged, spit upon, crowned with thorns, nailed to the cross; death, in its most dreadful appearances, looked Him in the face; and this made Him sorrowful, especially because it was the wages of our sin. He had undertaken to satisfy for. It is true, the martyrs that have suffered for Christ have entertained the greatest torments, and the most terrible deaths, without any such sorrow and consternation; have called their prison their delectable orchards, and a bed of flames a bed of roses: but then, (1.) Christ was now denied the supports and comforts which they had; that is, He denied them to Himself, and his soul refused to be comforted, not in passion, but in justice to his undertaking. Their cheerfulness under the cross was owing to the divine favor, which, for the present, was suspended from the Lord Jesus. (2.) His sufferings were of another nature from theirs. Paul, when he is to be offered on the sacrifice and service of the saints' faith, can joy and rejoice with them all; but to be offered a sacrifice, to make atonement for sin, is quite a different case. On the saints' cross there is a blessing pronounced, which enables them to rejoice under it; (ch. 5:10, 12.) but to Christ's cross there was a curse annexed, which made Him sorrowful and very heavy under it. And his sorrow under the cross was the foundation of their joy under it.

IV. His complaint. Finding Himself under the arrests of his passion, 1. He acquaints his disciples with his condition; (v. 38.) My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. 'It gives some ease to a troubled spirit, to have a friend ready to unbosom itself to, and give vent to its sorrows. Christ here tells them, (1.) What was the seat of his sorrow, his soul. This proves that Christ had a true human soul; for he suffered, not only in body, but in soul. We had sinned against both our bodies and our souls; therefore Christ suffered in soul, as well as in body. (2.) What was the degree of his sorrow. He was exceeding sorrowful, compassed about with sorrows on all hands. It was sorrow in the highest degree, even unto death; a killing sorrow, such as no mortal could bear and live. He was ready to die for grief; they were sorrows of death. (3.) The duration of it; it will continue even unto death. 'My soul will be sorrowful as long as it is in this body; I see no outlet but death.' He now began to be sorrowful, and never ceased to be so till He said, It is finished; that grief is now finished, which began in the garden. It was prophesied of Christ, that He should be a Man of sorrows: (Isa. 53:3.) He was so all along, we never read that He laughed; but all his sorrows hitherto were nothing to this.

2. He bespeaks their company and attendance, v. 39. Surely He was destitute indeed of help, when He entreated theirs, who, He knew, would be but miserable comforters; but He would hereby teach us the benefit of the communion of saints. It is good to have, and therefore to seek, the assistance of our brethren, when at any time we are in an agony; for two are better than one. What He said to them, He saith to all, Watch, Mark 13:37. Not only watch for Him, in expectation of his future coming, but watch with Him, in application to our present work.

V. What passed between Him and his Father when He was in this agony, v. 39. Prayer is never out of season, but it is especially seasonable in an agony.

(39.) Let this cup pass, &c. 'I do not suppose our Lord here prayed to be excused entirely from sufferings and death. Such a petition appears to me inconsistent with that steady constancy He always showed and with that "eliv turn (John 12:27, 28.) in which He seems Observe, 1. The place where He prayed; He went a little further, withdrew from them, thence the scripture might be fulfilled, I have trod the wine-press alone: He retired for prayer; a troubled soul finds most ease when alone with God, who understands the broken language of sighs and groans. Calvin devoutly remarks on this, It is useful to pray apart; for then the faithful soul develops itself more familiarly and with greater simplicity pours forth its petitions, groans, cares, fears, hopes, and joys into the bosom of God. Christ has hereby taught us that secret prayer must be made secretly. Yet some think that even the disciples, whom He left at the garden door, overheard Him; for, it is said, (Heb. 5:7.) they were strong cries.

2. His posture; (v. 39.) his lying prostrate denotes, (1.) Agony, and extremity of sorrow. Job, in great grief, fell on the ground; and great anguish is expressed by rolling in the dust, Mic. 1:10. (2.) His humility in prayer. This posture expressed His reverential fear; (spoken of, Heb. 5:7.) he hereby accommodated himself to his state of humiliation.

3. The prayer itself; wherein we may observe three things:

(1.) The title He gives to God; O my Father. Thick as the cloud was, He could see God as a Father through it. Note, In all our addresses to God, we should eye Him as a Father, our Father; and it is in a special manner comfortable to do so when in an agony; whither should the child go, when any thing grieves him, but to his father?

(2.) The favor He begs; v. 39. His sufferings might be called a cup, because allotted Him, as at feasts a cup was set to every mess. He begs that this cup might pass from Him, that is, that He might avoid the sufferings now at hand; or, at least, that they might be shortened. This intimates no more, than that He was really and truly Man, and as a man He could not but be averse to pain and suffering; This is the first and simple act of man's will - to start back from what is sensibly grievous, and desire the prevention and removal of it. The law of self-preservation is impressed or the innocent nature of man, and rules there, till overruled by some other law; therefore Christ admitted, and expressed, a reluctance to suffer, to show that He was taken from among men, (Heb. 5:1.) was touched with the feeling of our infirmities, (Heb. 4:15.) and tempted as we are; yet without sin. Note, The prayer of faith may very well consist with the patience of hope. When David had said, I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it; his very next words were, Remove thy stroke away from me, Ps. 39:9, 10. But observe the proviso; If it be possible. If God may be glorified, man saved, and the ends of his undertaking answered, without his drinking of this bitter cup, He desires to be excused; otherwise not. What we cannot do with the security of our great end, we must reckon to be in direct impossibility; Christ did so. We can do nothing, not only we may do nothing, against the truth.

(3.) His entire submission to, and acquiescence in, the will of God; Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt. Not that the human will of Christ was averse to the divine will; it was only, in its first act, diverse from it; in the second, which compares and chooses, He freely submits Himself. Note, [1.] Our Lord Jesus though He had a quick sense of the extreme bitterness of the sufferings He was to undergo, yet was freely willing to submit to them for our redemption and salvation, and offered Himself, and gave Himself, for us. [2.] He grounds his own willingness on the Father's will, and resolves the matter wholly into that, Ps. 40:7. This He had often referred to, as that which put Him upon, and carried Him through, his whole undertaking; This is the Father's will, John 6:39, 40. This He sought; (John 5:30,) it was his meat and drink to do it, John 4:34.

It appears to me much safer to expound it, as Sir Matthew Hale does, as relating to the terror and severity of the combat, in which He was now actually engaged. This throws great light on Heb. 5:7.

11 Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.

42 He went away again the second time, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done.

43 And he came and found them asleep again; for their eyes were heavy.

44 And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words.

45 Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners.

3.] In conformity to this example of Christ, we must drink of the bitter cup God puts into our hands, be it ever so bitter; though nature struggle, grace must submit. We then are disposed as Christ was, when our wills are in every thing melted into the will of God, though ever so displeasing to flesh and blood; The will of the Lord be done, Acts 21: 14.

4. The repetition of the prayer, (v. 42, 44,) and all to the same purport; only, He did not, in the second and third prayer, expressly ask, as in the first, that the cup might pass from Him. Note, Though we may pray to God to prevent and remove an affliction, yet our chief errand, and that we should most insist on, must be, that He will give us grace to bear it well. It should be more our care to get our troubles sanctified, and our hearts satisfied under them, than to get them taken away. He prayed, saying, Thy will be done. Note, Prayer is the offering up, not only of our desires, but resignations, to God. It amounts to an acceptable prayer, at any time we are in distress, to refer ourselves to God, and to commit our way and work to Him; Thy will be done. The third time He said the same words, the same word, that is, matter or argument; He spake to the same purport. We have reason to think that this was not all He said, for it should seem, by v. 40, that He continued an hour in his agony and prayer; but, whatever more He said, it was to this effect, awfully impressed with the thought of his approaching sufferings, and yet resigned to God's will in them.

But what answer had He to this prayer? Certainly, He that heard Him always, did not deny Him now. It is true, the cup did not pass from Him, for He withdrew that petition, and did not insist on it; but He had an answer to his prayer; for, (1.) He was strengthened with strength in his soul, in the day when He cried; (Ps. 138: 3.) and that was a real answer, Luke 22: 43. (2.) He was delivered from that which He feared, which was, lest by impatience and distrust He should offend, and disabie Himself to go on with his undertaking, Heb. 5: 7. In answer to his prayer, God provided He should not fail or be discouraged.

VI. What passed between Him and his three disciples at this time.

1. The fault they were guilty of; that when He was in his agony, sorrowful and heavy, and praying, they were so little concerned, as not to keep awake, v. 40. The strangeness of the thing should have roused their spirits, to turn aside now, and see this great sight—the bush burning, and yet not consumed; much more should their love to their Master, and their care concerning Him, have obliged them to a more close and vigilant attendance on Him. It is well for us, that our salvation is in the hand of One who nei ther slumbers nor sleeps. Christ engaged them to watch with Him, as if He expected some succor from them, and yet they slept; surely it was the unkindest thing that could be. When David wept at this mount of Olives, all his followers wept with him; (2 Sam. 15: 30.) but when the Son of David was here in tears, his followers were asleep: his enemies, wakeful enough; (Mark 14: 43.) but his disciples, asleep. Lord, what is man! What the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves! Note, Carelessness and carnal security, especially when Christ is in his agony, are great faults in any, but especially in those who profess to be nearest in relation to Him. The church of Christ, which is his body, is often in agony, fightings without, and fears within, and shall we sleep then, like Gallio, that cared for none of these things; or those (Amos 6: 6.) that lay at ease, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph?

2. Christ's favor to them, notwithstanding. Persons in sorrow are too apt to be cross and peevish, and to lay it grievously to heart, if those about them do but seem to neglect them; but Christ in his agony is as meek as ever, and as patient toward his followers as toward his Father, and is not apt to take things ill.

When Christ's disciples put this slight on Him,

(1.) He came to them, as if He expected to receive some comfort from them; and if they had put Him in mind of what they had heard from Him concerning his resurrection and glory, perhaps it might have been some help to Him; but, instead, they added grief to his sorrow; and yet He came to them, more careful for them than they were for themselves; when He was most engaged, yet He came to look after them; for those that were given Him, were on his heart, living and dying.

(2.) He gave them a gentle reproof, for as many as He loves He rebukes; He directed it to Peter, who used to speak for them; let him now hear for them. The reproof was very melting; What! could ye not watch with Me one hour? He speaks as one amazed to see them so stupid; every word, when closely considered, shows the aggravated nature of the case. Consider, [1.] Who they were; 'Could not ye watch—ye, my disciples and followers?' No wonder if others neglect Me, if the earth still be still and be at rest; (Zech. 1: 11.) but from you I expected better things. [2.] Who He was; 'Watch with Me. If one of yourselves were ill and in an agony, it would be very unkind, but it is unkindful not to watch with your Master, who has long watched over you for good, has led you, and fed you, and taught you, borne you, and borne with you; do ye thus requite Him?' He awoke out of his sleep, to help them when they were in distress; (ch. 8: 26.) and could not they keep awake, at least to show their good-will to Him, especially considering that He was now suffering for them,—in an agony for them? [3.] How small a thing He expected—only to watch with Him. If He had bid them do some great thing, be in an agony with Him, or die with Him, they thought they could have done it; and yet they could not watch with Him, 2 Kings 5: 13. [4.] How short a time He expected it—but one hour; they were not set on guard whole nights, as the prophet was, Isa. 21: 8. When He continued all night in prayer, He did not expect his disciples should watch; only now, when He had but one hour to spend in prayer.

(3.) He gave them good counsel, v. 41. [1.] An hour of temptation was drawing on, and very near; the troubles of Christ were temptations to his followers to disbelieve, distrust, deny and desert Him, and renounce all relation to Him. [2.] There was danger of their entering into the temptation, as into a snare or trap; o, their entering into parody with, or of a good opinion of it, of their being influenced by, an inclination to comply with it; which is the first step toward being overcome by it. [3.] He therefore exhorts them to watch and pray. Watch with Me, and pray with Me. While sleeping, they lost the benefit of joining Christ's prayer. 'Watch yourselves, and pray yourselves.' Watch and pray against this present temptation to drowsiness and security; pray that you may watch; beg of God by his grace to keep you awake, now that there is occasion. When we are drowsy in the worship of God, we should pray, as a good Christian once did, 'The Lord deliver me from this sleepy devil! Lord, quicken Thou me in thy way. Or, 'Watch and pray against further temptation; watch and pray, lest this sin prove the inlet of many more.' Note, When we find ourselves entering into temptation, we have need to watch and pray.

(4.) He kindly excused for them, v. 41. We do not read of one word they had to say for themselves; (the sense of their own weakness stopped their mouth;) but He had a tender word to say on their behalf, for it is his office to be an Advocate; in this He sets us an example of that love which covers a multitude of sins. He considered their frame, and did not chide them, for He remembered that they were but flesh, and the flesh is weak, though the spirit be willing, Ps. 78: 38. Note, [1.] Christ's disciples, as long as they are here in this world, have bodies as well as souls, and a principle of remaining corruption as well as of reigning grace, like Canaanites and Israelites in the same land,

In spirit, &c. Most expositors understand the clause as a kind excuse, which the Lord made for their present conduct; but He was never used to excuse a thing wrong in them; and their sleeping on this occasion was so utterly unreasonable and criminal. It seems therefore more proper to consider the words as a caution respecting the future, and a warning, that self-confidence and neglect of watching and prayer, would leave their defenceless to the threat of danger, and that they would fall, notwithstanding their most sincere and determined resolutions to the contrary. Indeed, it is evident, that Peter's conduct in the willingness of his spirit, and his overlooking 'the weakness of the flesh,' occasioned his neglect of means, induced him to thrust himself into perilous circumstances, and so made way for his awful fall. The words are not meant as an excuse or mitigation of their sins; but as a motive to their prayer and vigilance

[2.] When He came the third time, He left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger; (v. 45, 46.) Sleep on now, and take your rest. This is spoken ironically; 'Now sleep if you can, if you dare; I would not disturb you, if Judas and his band would not.' See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it; 1st. Sometimes He gives them up to the power of it; Sleep on now. He that will sleep, let him sleep still. The curse of spiritual slumber is the just punishment of the sin of it, Rom. 11: 8. Hos. 4: 17. Many times He sends some startling judgment to awaken those that would not be wrought upon by the Word; and those who will not be alarmed by reasons and arguments, had better be alarmed by swords and spears, than left to perish in their security. Let those that would not believe, be made to feel.

As to the disciples here, 1. Their Master gave them notice of the near approach of his enemies, who, it is likely, were now within sight or hearing, for they came with candles and torches, and, probably, made a great noise; The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. And again, He is at hand, that doth betray me. 2. He called them to rise, and be going; not, 'Rise, and let us flee from the danger;' but, 'Rise, and let us go meet it;' before He had prayed, He feared his sufferings, now He had overcome his fears. 3. He intimates to them their folly, in sleeping away the time

Mal. 5: 17, 24. [2.] It is the unhappiness and burthen of Christ's disciples, that their bodies cannot keep pace with their souls in works of piety and devotion; but are often a cloud and clog to them; that, when the spirit is free, and disposed to good, the flesh is averse and indisposed. This Paul laments; (Rom. 7: 22.) With my mind I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin. Our impotency in the service of God is the great iniquity and infidelity of our nature, and it arises from the sad remainders of corruption, the constant grief and burthen of God's people. [3.] Yet it is our comfort, that our Master graciously considers this, and accepts the willingness of the spirit, and pities and pardons the weakness and infirmity of the flesh; for we are under grace, and not under the law.

(5.) Though they continue dull and sleepy, He did not any further rebuke them for it; for, though we daily offend, yet He will not always chide. [1.] When He came the second time, we do not find that He said any thing to them. v. 43. One would have thought He had said enough to keep them awake; but it is hard to recover from a spirit of slumber. Carnal security, when once it prevails, is not easily shaken off. Their eyes were heavy, which intimates that they strove against it as much as they could, but were overcome by it, and therefore their Master looked on them with compassion.

[2.] When He left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger; (v. 45, 46.) Sleep on now, and take your rest. This is spoken ironically; 'Now sleep if you can, if you dare; I would not disturb you, if Judas and his band would not.' See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it; 1st. He intimates to them their folly, in sleeping away the time they should have spent in preparation, now it found them unready, and was a terror to them.

V. 47—56. We are here told how the blessed Jesus was seized, and taken into custody; this immediately followed his agony, while He yet spake. His trouble aitherto was raised within Himself; but now the scene is changed; the Breath of our nostrils, the Anointed of the Lord, is taken in their pits, Lam. 4: 20.

Now, concerning the apprehending: the Lord Jesus, observe,

I. Who were the persons employed.

1. Judas, one of the twelve, was guide to them that took Jesus; (Acts 1: 16.) without whose help they could not have found Him. 2. A great multitude; Ps. 3: 1. Made up partly of a detachment of the guards, posted in the tower of Antonia, who were Gentiles, sinners, as Christ calls them, v. 45. The rest were Jews, the servants and officers of the high priest; they that were at variance with each other, agreed against Christ.

II. How they were armed.

1. They came with swords and staves. The Roman soldiers, no doubt, had swords; the servants of the priests, those of them that had not swords, brought staves or clubs. Their rage supplied arms. They were not regular troops, but a tumultuous rabble. But wherefore this ado? They could not have taken Him, had He not yielded; and, his hour being come for Him to give up Himself, this force was needless.

2. Their warrant; They came from the chief priests and elders of the people. He was taken up by a warrant from the great sanhedrin. Pilate, the Roman governor, gave them no warrant, for he had no jealousy of Him; but they were men who pretended to religion, and presided in the affairs of the church, that were active in this prosecution. Pilate upbraided Him with it; Thine own nation, and the chief priests, delivered Thee to me, John 18: 35.

III. The manner of it.

1. How Judas betrayed Him; he did his business effectually, and his resolution in this wickedness may shame us, who fail in that which is good. Observe,

(1.) The instructions he gave to the soldiers, (v. 48.) as commander of the party. What abundance of caution was here, not to miss Him—That same is He; and when in their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 36—46. While we with thankfulness take the cup of salvation, let us never forget that cup of wrath, which the Redeemer drank off to the very dregs, for the remission of our sins. If we were not shamefully and surprisingly drowsy in spiritual things, we never could read or meditate about Gethsemane, without the most lively affections and most instructive recollections. Here let us look attentively, that we may learn to distinguish between the sufferings of a martyr, and those of our atoning Sacrifice. View a poor, frail, sinful man, under the smiles of his reconciled Father, serene and cheerful in the prospect and endurance of every possible torture; then behold the incarnate Son of God, 'the holy, undefiled,' 'well beloved' of the Father, 'in whom He was well pleased,' prostrate on the earth, 'exceedingly sorrowful even unto death,' and 'sweating great drops of blood, rolling to the ground;' and with this scene before our eyes, let it be determined, whether He was not then enduring the wrath and tremendous frown of God, as our Surety and the vicarious Sacrifice for our sins. And let the careless and impenitent ask themselves, Did God's own hand inflict these insupportable strokes, in fulfilment of his ancient prophecies, on his 'beloved Son,' who was more valued by Him, than the whole visible creation; and will He break his word, in order to spare a determined rebel and enemy, who takes encouragement to sin from the very persuasion of God being merciful? Most vain and destructive presumption! (Note, Deut. 29: 19, 20.) Did the load of imputed guilt so weigh down the soul of Him, concerning whom it is said, that 'He upholdeth all things by the word of his power?' Into what an abyss of misery unknown than most they sink, whose iniquities are left upon their own heads! 'How will they escape who neglect so great salvation?' What a forlorn hope must that of the Pharisee or the infidel be, who expects happiness in his own way, despising that which infinite wisdom has devised, and infinite grace effected, at a price which baffles the powers of computation itself! Assuredly it will end in black despair; with the presumption of every one, who perverts the doctrine of a free salvation as an excuse for indulged wickedness.—But the same one discovers a cheerful dawn of hope to the trembling, desponding penitent: here we see the infinite hatred of sin of our holy Lord God, and his infinite love of sinners; his determination to satisfy his justice, and his delight in exercising mercy. In short, we must resort to Gethsemane, to learn repentance, hatred of sin, humility, hope, love, patience, meekness, and self-denying obedience, and to find comfort under dejection and temptations. Here we see our pattern, our motives, or encouragements; here we learn the vanity of the world, the evil of sin, and our obligations to live devoted to Him, and willingly to suffer for his glory, who agonized and died for our salvation. While here we abide, we should beware of drowsiness: when 'our souls are sorrowful,' we should pour them out in prayer; and when nature would shrink from suffering, and would say, 'If it be possible, let this cup pass from me,' we should learn to add, 'Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt.' We should also remember, that even our merciful High Priest will rebuke those whom He loves; and if we promise great things, and come evidently short in little things, He will, as it were, say to us, 'What! could ye not watch with Me one hour?' We must all indeed be tempted; yet we should be exceedingly afraid of 'entering into temptation,' by being drawn into such circumstances, as give our enemies an opportunity of coming specially near to us, and obtaining their advantage against us. To be secured from this, we should watch and pray without ceasing; for though, in the regenerate, 'the spirit is willing' for service or suffering, yet we carry about us the remains of a carnal mind, our 'heart' is deceitful above all things, we are 'weak through the flesh,' and should continually be looking to the Lord, to 'hold us up that we may be safe.' But, after repeated warnings and rebukes, how dull and inattentive do we often remain! This causes our compassionate Lord to employ other means and instruments, to rouse us from our fatal lethargy; and when sharp afflictions or persecutions come upon us, He will, as it were, say to us, 'Sleep on now, and take your rest' if you are able: yet, if even then we arise and follow Him, He will preserve us from all permanent or fatal evil.

SCOTT.

49 And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, 'Hail, Master; and kissed him.

tu. He would teach us, under the greatest provocation, to forbear bitterness and evil speaking, and to show all meekness. Friend, for a friend he had been, and should have been, and seemed to be. Thus Abraham, when he called the rich man in hell, son. He calls him friend, because he furthered his sufferings, and so befriended him; whereas he called Peter Satan for attempting to hinder them.

[2.] He asks him, 'Wherefore art thou come? Is it peace, Judas? Explain thyself; if thou come as an enemy, what means this kiss? If as a friend, what mean these swords and staves? Wherefore art thou come? What harm have I done thee? Wherein have I wearied thee? Wherefore art thou present? Why hast thou not so much shame left thee, as to keep out of sight, which thou mightest have done, and yet have given the officers notice where I was?' This was an instance of great impudence, for him to be so barefaced in this wicked transaction. But it is usual for apostates from religion to be the most bitter enemies to it; witness Julian. Thus Judas did his part.

2. How the officers and soldiers secured Him, v. 50. How were they not afraid to stretch forth their hands against the Lord's Anointed? We may well imagine what rude and cruel hands they were; and now, it is probable, they handled Him the more roughly for their being so often disappointed when they sought to lay hands on Him. They could not have taken Him, if He had not surrendered Himself, and been delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, Acts 2:23. He who said concerning his anointed servants, Touch them not, and do them no harm, (Psa. 105:14, 15,) spared not his anointed Son, but delivered Him up for us all; and again, gave his Strength into captivity, his Glory into the enemies' lands, Psa. 78:61. See what was the complaint of Job, (ch. 16: 11.) God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and apply that and other passages in that book of Job as a type of Christ.

Our Lord Jesus was made a prisoner, because He would in all things be treated as a malefactor, punished for our crime, and as a surety under arrest for our debt. The yoke of our transgressions was bound by the Father's hand upon the neck of the Lord Jesus, Lam. 1: 14. He became a prisoner, that He might set us at liberty; for He said, If ye seek Me, let these go their way; (John 18: 8.) and those are free indeed, whom He makes so.

3. How Peter fought for Christ, and was checked for his pains. It is here only said to be one of them that was with Jesus in the garden; but (John 13: 10.) we are told that it was Peter who signalized himself on this occasion.

Observe, (1.) Peter's rashness; (v. 51.) He drew his sword. They had but two swords among them all, (Luke 22: 33.) and one of them fell to Peter. Now he thought it was time to draw it, and laid about him; yet all the execution he did, was cutting off an ear from a servant of the high-priest. But if he would be striking, in my mind he should rather have aimed at Judas. Peter had hands, not to lose Him—Hold Him fast; for He had sometimes escaped from those who thought to secure Him; as Luke 4: 30. Though the Jews, who frequented the temple, could not but know Him, yet the Roman soldiers perhaps had never seen Him, and the sign was to direct them; and Judas by his kiss intended not only to distinguish Him, but to detain Him, while they came behind Him, and laid hands on Him.

(2.) The dissembling compliment he gave his Master. He came close to Jesus; surely now, if ever, his wicked heart will relent; surely, when he looks Him in the face, he will either be awed by its majesty, or charmed by its beauty. Dares he to come into his very sight and presence to betray Him? Peter denied Christ, but when the Lord turned and looked on him, he relented; but Judas comes up to his Master's face, and betrays Him, v. 49. It should seem, our Lord Jesus had been wont to admit his disciples to such a degree of familiarity with Him as to give them his cheek to kiss after they had been any while absent, which Judas villainously used to facilitate his treason. A kiss is a token of allegiance and friendship, Psa. 2: 12. But Judas, when he broke all the laws of love and duty, profaned this sacred sign to serve his purpose. Note, There are many that betray Christ with a kiss, and Hail, Master; who, under pretence of doing Him honor, betray and undermine the interests of his kingdom. Honey in the mouth, gall in the heart. To embrace is one thing, to love is another. Philo Judaeus. Joab's kiss and Judas' were much alike.

(3.) The entertainment his Master gave him, v. 50.

[1.] He calls him friend. If He had called him villain and traitor, rascal, thou fool, and child of the devil, He had not miscalled him;

He had not miscalled him; for a friend he had been, and should have been, and seemed to be. Thus Abraham, when he called the rich man in hell, son. He calls him friend, because he furthered his sufferings, and so befriended him; whereas he called Peter Satan for attempting to hinder them.

Now he thought it was time to draw it, and laid about him; yet all the execution he did, was cutting off an ear from a servant of the high-priest. But if he would be striking, in my mind he should rather have aimed at Judas. Peter had talked much of what he would do for his Master, he would lay down his life for Him; and now he would venture his life to rescue Him: and thus far was commendable, that he had a great zeal for Christ, his honor and safety; but it was not according to knowledge, nor guided by discretion; for, [1.] He did it without warrant; some of the disciples asked, indeed, Shall we smite with the sword? (Luke 22: 49.) But Peter struck before they had an answer. We must see not only our cause good, but our call clear, before we draw the sword; we must show by what authority we do it, and who gave us that authority. [2.] He indiscreetly exposed himself and his fellow-disciples to the rage of the multitude; for what could they with two swords do against a band of men?

(2.) The rebuke which our Lord Jesus gave him, v. 52. He does not command the officers and soldiers to put up their swords that were drawn against Him, He left them to the judgment of God, who judges them that are within; but he commands Peter to put up his sword, does not chide him indeed for what he had done, because done out of good will, but stops the progress of his arms, and provides that it should not be drawn into a precedent. Christ's errand into the world was to make peace. Note, The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual; and Christ's ministers, though his soldiers, do not war after the flesh, 2 Cor. 10: 3, 4. Not that the law of Christ overthrows either the law of nature or the law of nations, as far as those warrant subjects to stand up in defence of their civil rights and liberties, and their religion, when it is incorporated with them; but it provides for the preservation of public peace and order by forbidding private persons, as such, to resist the powers that are; nay, we have a general precept that we resist not evil, (ch. 5: 39.) nor will Christ have his ministers propagate his religion by force of arms; Religion cannot be forced; and it should be defended, not by killing, but by dying. Lactantius Instituit. As Christ forbade his disciples the sword of justice, (ch. 20: 25, 26,) so here the sword of war. Christ bade Peter put up his sword, and never bade him draw it again; yet that which Peter is here blamed for, is, his doing it unseasonably; the hour was come for Christ to suffer and die, He knew Peter knew it, the sword of the Lord was drawn against Him, (Zech. 13: 7.) and for Peter to draw his sword for Him, was like, Master, spare Thyself.

Three reasons Christ gives to Peter for this rebuke:

[1.] His drawing the sword would be dangerous to himself, and his fellow-disciples, v. 52. Men hasten and increase their troubles by blustering, bloody methods of self-defence. They that take the sword before it is given them, that use it without warrant or call, expose themselves to the sword of war, or public justice. Had it not been for the special care and providence of the Lord Jesus, Peter and the rest of them had, for aught I know, been cut in pieces immediately. Grotius gives another, and a probable, sense of this blow, making those that take the sword to be, not Peter, but the officers and soldiers that take the swords to take Christ; They shall perish with the sword. * Peter; thou needest not draw thy sword to punish them. God will certainly, shortly, and severely reckon with them. They took the Roman sword to seize Christ with, and by the Roman sword, not long after, they and their place and nation were destroyed. Therefore we must not avenge ourselves, because God will repay! (Rom. 12: 19.) and therefore we must suffer with faith and patience, because persecutors will be paid in their own coin. See Rev. 13: 10.

[2.] It was needless to draw his sword in defence of his Master, who could summon into his service all the hosts of heaven (v. 53.)

friends. Our Savior's reproof therefore of Judas, by calling him friend or companion, was both just and cutting, because he betrayed Him, after having eaten the passover with Him.

Blausot e, in Horw

53 Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?

54 But how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?

55 In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me.

56 But all this was done, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

only with the cords of his own love that He was bound to the altar.

2dly. What a great interest He had in the heavenly hosts; He shall presently give Me more than twelve legions of angels, amounting to above seventy-two thousand. Observe here, 1. There is an innumerable company of angels; (Heb. 12:22. See Dan. 7:10.) not a confused multitude, but regular troops; all know their post, and observe the word of command. 2. This innumerable company of angels are all at the disposal of our heavenly Father, and do his pleasure, Ps. 103:20, 21. 3. These angelic hosts were ready to come in to the assistance of our Lord Jesus in his sufferings, if He had needed or desired it. See Heb. 1:6, 14. They would have been to Him as to Elisha, chariots of fire, and horses of fire, not only to secure Him, but to consume those that set on Him. 4. Our heavenly Father is to be eyed and acknowledged in all the services of the heavenly hosts; He shall give them Me: therefore angels are not to be prayed to, but the Lord of the angels, Ps. 91:11. 5. It is matter of comfort to all that wish well to the kingdom of Christ, that there is a world of angels always at the service of the Lord Jesus, that can do wonders. He that has the armies of heaven at his beck can do what He pleases among the inhabitants of the earth: He shall presently give them Me. See how ready his Father was to hear his prayer, and the angels to observe his orders; they are willing servants, winged messengers, they fly swiftly. This is very encouraging to those that have the honor of Christ, and the welfare of the church, much at heart. Think they that they have more care and concern for Christ and his church, than God and the holy angels have?

[3.] It was no time to make any defence at all, or to offer to put by the stroke, v. 54. It was written, that Christ should be led as a lamb to the slaughter, Isa. 53:7. Should He summon the angels to his assistance, He would not be led to the slaughter at all; should He permit his disciples to fight, He would not be led as a lamb quietly and without resistance; therefore He and his disciples must yield to the accomplishment of the predictions. Note, In all difficult cases, the word of God must be conclusive against our own counsels, and nothing must be done, nothing attempted, against the fulfilling of the Scripture. If the easing of our pains, the breaking of our bonds, the saving of our lives, will not consist with the fulfilling of the Scripture, we ought to say, 'Let God's word and will take place, let his law be magnified and made honorable, whatever becomes of us.' Thus Christ encouraged Peter, when he set up for his champion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 47-56. While we contemplate the insolence and enmity of those who assaulted the Prince of peace, and above all the treachery of Judas, with abhorrence, let us not forget, that such are we by nature, and so should we have acted, if left to ourselves. No enemies, however, deserve such decided execration, as those professed disciples, who 'betray Christ with a kiss.'—It behoves us assiduously to copy the meekness and forbearance of Christ, and very circumspectly to avoid the rashness and cowardice of Peter, and the other apostles. Whatever provocations we meet with from avowed adversaries or

4. We are next told how Christ reasoned with them that came to take Him; (v. 55.) though He did not resist them. Note, I. we consist with Christian patience under our sufferings, calmly to expostulate with our sinners and persecutors, as David with Saul, 1 Sam. 24:14, 26:18. Are ye come out, (1.) With rage and enmity, as against a thief, as if I were an enemy to the public safety, and deservedly suffered this? (2.) With all this power and force as against the worst of thieves, that dare the law, bid defiance to public justice, and add rebellion to their sin? You are come out as against a thief, with swords and staves, as if there were danger of resistance; whereas ye have killed the just One, and He doth not resist you, Jam. 5:6. If He had not been willing to suffer, it was folly to come with swords and staves, for they could not conquer Him; had He been minded to resist, He would have esteemed their iron as straw, and their swords and staves would have been as briars before a consuming fire; but, being willing to suffer, it was folly to come thus armed, for He would not contend with them.

He further postulates with them, by reminding them how He had behaved Himself hitherto toward them, and they toward Him. [1.] Of his public appearance; I sat daily with you in the temple teaching. And, [2.] Of their public connivance; Ye laid no hold on Me. How comes then this change? They were very unreasonable in treating Him thus. 1st. He had given them no occasion to look on Him as a thief, for He had taught in the temple. And such were the matter and such the manner of his teaching, that He was manifested in the consciences of all that heard Him, not to be a bad man. Such gracious words as came from his mouth, were not the words of a thief, or of one that had a devil. 2dly. Nor had He given them occasion to look on Him as one absconded from justice, that they should come in the night to seize Him; they might find Him every day in the temple, ready to answer all challenges, all charges, and there they might do as they pleased with Him; for the chief priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it; but to come on Him thus clandestinely, in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly.

But all this was done, (so v. 56.) that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. It is hard to say, whether these are the words of the sacred historian, as a comment on this story, and a direction to the Christian reader to compare it with the Scriptures of the Old Testament which pointed at it; or, whether they are the words of Christ Himself, as a reason why, though He could not but resent this base treatment, He yet submitted to it, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled, to which He had just now referred Himself, v. 54. Note, The Scriptures are in the fulfilling every day; and all those Scriptures, which speak of the Messiah, had their full accomplishment in our Lord Jesus.

5. How He was, in the midst of this distress, shamefully deserted by his disciples; They all forsook Him, and fled.

(1.) This was their sin, and a great sin. It was unkind, considering the relation they stood in to Him, the favors they had received from Him, and the melancholy circumstances He was now in. There was unfaithfulness in it, for they had solemnly promised to adhere to Him, and never to forsake Him. He had intended for their safe conduct; (John 18:8.) yet they could not rely on that, but shifted for

^a now the patron of wickedness; his house should have been the sanctuary of oppressed innocence, but it is become the throne of iniquity; and no wonder, when even God's house of prayer was made a den of thieves.

II. The setting of the prisoner to the bar; they that had laid hold on Jesus, led him away, hurried him, no doubt, with violence, as a trophy of their victory, led him as a victim to the altar; He was brought into Jerusalem through that which was called the sheep-gate, for that was the way into town from the mount of Olives; and it was so called because the sheep appointed for sacrifice were brought that way to the temple; very fitly, therefore, is Christ led that way, who is the Lamb of God; that takes away the sin of the world. Christ was led first to the high priest, for, by the law, all sacrifices were to be first presented to the priest, and delivered into his hand, Lev. 17:5.

III. The cowardice and faint-heartedness of Peter, who (v. 23.) followed afar off. This comes in here with an eye to the story of his denying Him. He forsook Him, like the rest, when He was seized, and what is here said of his following Him is easily reconcilable with his forsaking Him; such following was no better than forsaking; for,

1. He followed Him, but afar off. Note, It looks ill and bodes worse, when those that are willing to be Christ's disciples, are not willing to be known to be so. Here began Peter's denying Him; for to follow Him afar off, is, by little and little, to go back from Him. There is danger in drawing back, nay, in looking back.

2. He followed Him, but he went in and sat with the servants. He should have attended on his Master, and gone up to the court; but he went in with the servants to screen himself. It was presumption thus to thrust himself into temptation; he that does so, throws himself out of God's protection. Christ had told Peter he could not follow Him now, and had particularly warned him of his danger this night; and yet he would venture into the midst of this wicked crew. It helped David to walk in his integrity; that he hated the congregation of evil doers, and would not sit with the wicked.

3. He followed Him, but it was only to see the end; more from curiosity than conscience; as an idle spectator rather than a disciple, a person concerned. He should have gone in, to do Christ some service, or to get some wisdom and grace to himself, by observing Christ's behavior under his sufferings; but he went in only to look about him, expecting, perhaps, that Christ would have made his escape miraculously; that, having so lately struck them themselves by an inglorious flight. What folly was this, for fear of death, to flee from Him whom they themselves knew and had acknowledged to be the Fountain of Life? John 6: 67, 68. Lord, what is man?

(2.) It was a part of Christ's suffering, it added affliction to his bonds, as Job; (ch. 19: 13.) He hath put my brethren far from me; and David; (Ps. 38: 11.) Lovers and friends stand aloof from my sore. They should have stood with Him, to minister to Him, to countenance Him, and if need were, to be witnesses for Him at his trial; but they treacherously deserted Him, as, at Paul's first answer, no man stood with him. But there was a mystery in this.

[1.] Christ, as a Sacrifice for sins, stood thus abandoned. In this He was made a curse for us, being left as one separated to evil. [2.] Christ, as the Savior of souls, stood thus alone; as He heeded not, so He had not, the assistance of any other in working out our salvation; He bore all, and did all Himself. He trod the wine-press alone, and when there was none to uphold, then his own arm wrought salvation, Isa. 63: 3, 5. So the Lord alone did lead his Israel, and they stand still, and only see this great salvation, Deut. 32: 12.

V. 57-65. We have here the arraignment of our Lord Jesus, in the ecclesiastical court, the sanhedrim. Observe,

I. The sitting of the court; the scribes and the elders were assembled, though in the dead of night, when other people were fast asleep in their beds; to gratify their malice against Christ, they denied themselves natural rest.

See, 1. Who were assembled; the scribes, the principal teachers, and elders, the principal rulers of the Jewish church. Now the Scripture was fulfilled; (Ps. 22: 16.) The assembly of the wicked have enclosed me. Jeremiah complains of an assembly of treacherous men; and David of his enemies gathering themselves together against him, Ps. 35: 15.

2. Where; in the palace of Caiaphas, the high priest; there they assembled two days before, to lay the plot, (v. 3.) and now again, to prosecute it. The high priest was Ab-beth-din—the father of the house of judgment, but he down, who came to seize Him, He would now have struck them dead, who sat to judge Him; and this he had a mind to see; if so, it was folly to think of seeing any other end than Christ had foretold, that He should be put to death. Note, It is more our concern to prepare for the end, whatever it may be, than curiously to inquire what the end will be. The event is God's, the duty is ours.

IV. The trial.

1. Though resolved, right or wrong, to condemn Him, yet, to put the better color on it, they would examine witnesses, and produce evidence against Him. The crimes properly cognizable in the court were, false doctrine and blasphemy; these they endeavored to prove upon Him. And observe here,

(1.) Their search for proof; v. 29. They had seized, bound, and abused Him, and after all seek for something to lay to his charge, and can show no cause for his commitment. They tried if any of them could allege seemingly from their own knowledge any thing against Him; and suggested one calumny and then another, which, if true, might touch his life. Thus evil men dig up mischief, Prov. 16: 27. Here they trod in the steps of their predecessors, who devised deceits against Jeremiah, Jer. 18: 18. 20: 10. They made proclamation that, if any one could give information against the prisoner at the bar, they were ready to receive it, and presently many bare false witness against Him; (v. 60.) for if a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked, and will carry false stories to him, Prov. 29: 12. This is an evil often seen under the sun, Eccl. 10: 5. If Naboth must be taken off, there are sons of Belial to swear against him.

(2.) Their success in this search; in several attempts they were baffled; the matters alleged were such palpable lies, as carried their own confutation along with them. This redounded much to the honor of Christ.

At last they met with two witnesses, who, it seems, agreed in their evidence, and therefore were hearkened to, in hopes that now the point was gained. The words they swore against Him were, that He should say, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days, v. 61. Now by this they designed to accuse Him, [1.] As an enemy to the temple, and one that sought the destruction of it, which they could not bear to hear of; for they valued themselves by the temple of the Lord, (Jer. 7: 4.) and, when they abandoned other idols, made a perfect idol of that. Stephen was accused for speaking against this holy place, Acts 6: 13, 14. [2.] As one that dealt in witchcraft, or some such unlawful arts, by the help of which He could rear such a building in three days. They had often suggested that He was in league with Beelzebub; now, as to this, 1st. The words were misrecited; He said, Destroy ye this temple, (John 2: 19.) plainly intimating that He spake of a temple which his enemies would seek to destroy; they swore that He said, I am able to destroy this temple, as if the design against it were his. He said, In three days I will raise it up—a word properly used of a living temple; I will raise it to life. They swore that He said, I am able to build it; which is properly used of a house temple. 2dly, The words were misunderstood; He spake of the temple of his body, (John 2: 21.) and perhaps when He said, this temple, pointed to, or laid his hand on his own body; but they swore that He said, the temple of God, meaning this holy place. Note, There have been, and still are, such as wrest the sayings of Christ to their own destruction, 2 Pet. 3: 16. 3dly, Make the worst they could of it, it was no capital crime, even by their own law; if it had been, no question but He had been prosecuted for it, when He spake the words in a public discourse some years ago; nay, the words were capable of a laudable construction, and bespeak a kindness

Verses 59-64.

*The professed entertaining of false witnesses against Christ will not seem strange, if it be remembered, that among the Jews, in actions against seducers of the people, or false prophets, it was lawful to say any thing whether true or false: no man being permitted to say any thing in defence of them.' Hammond. This extract from the Jewish writers shows the blindness and iniquity of their teachers to have been beyond conception great. (Ps. 35: 11, 12. Acts 6: 9-14, 9 11-13. 23: 12-22. 24: 1-9, 10-21, v. 13. 1 Pet. 4: 12-16.)

NOTE

62 And the high priest arose, and said unto him, 'Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?

63 But Jesus held his peace. And the high priest answered and said unto him, 'I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God.

64 Jesus saith unto him, 'Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, 'Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

65 Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, 'He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now, ye have heard his blasphemy.

the law of equity, to make Him accuse Himself.

(1.) Here is the interrogatory of the high priest.

Observe. [1.] The question itself; Whether Thou be the Christ the Son of God? that is, Whether Thou pretend to be so? The Messiah was to be the consolation of Israel, and glorious things were spoken concerning Him in the Old Testament, yet so strangely besotted were they with a jealousy of any thing that threatened their exorbitant power and grandeur, that they would never enter into the examination of the matter, whether Jesus was the Messiah or no; never once put the case, Suppose He should be so; they only wished Him to confess that He called Himself so, that they might on that indictment Him as a deceiver. What will not pride and malice carry men to?

[2.] The solemnity of the proposal of it; I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us. Not that he had any regard to the living God, but took his name in vain; 'If Thou hast any value for the blessed name of God, and reverence for his majesty, tell us this.' Should He refuse to answer when thus adjured, they would charge Him with contempt of the blessed name of God. Thus the persecutors of good men often take advantage against them by the consciousness, as Daniel's enemies, in the matter of his God.

(2.) Christ's answer, (v. 64.) in which,

[1.] He owns Himself to be the Christ, the Son of God. Thou hast said; that is, 'It is as thou hast said,' for in Mark, it is, I am. Hitherto, He seldom professed Himself expressly to be the Christ, the Son of God; his doctrine bespoke, and his miracles proved it: now He would not omit to confess it, because that would have looked, ist. Like disowning that truth He came unto the world to bear witness to: and 2dly, like declining his sufferings, when He knew the acknowledgment of this would give his enemies all the advantage they desired against Him. He thus confessed Himself, for example and encouragement to his followers, when they are called to it, to confess Him for the temple; if destroyed, He would exert Himself to the utmost to rebuild it. But any thing that looked criminal, would serve to give color to their malicious prosecution. Now the Scriptures were fulfilled, which said, False witnesses are risen up against me; (Ps. 27:12.) and see Ps. 36:11. Though I have redeemed them, they have spoken lies against me, Hos. 7:13. We stand justly accused, the law accuseth us, Deut. 27:26. John 5:45. Satan and our own consciences accuse us, 1 John 3:20. The creatures cry out against us. Now, to discharge us from all these just accusations, our Lord Jesus submitted to this, to be unjustly and falsely accused, that in the virtue of his sufferings we may be enabled to triumph over all challenges; Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Rom. 8:33, 34. He was accused, that we might not be condemned; and if at any time we suffer thus, have all manner of evil, not only said, but sworn against us falsely, let us remember that we cannot expect to fare better than our Master.

(3.) Christ's silence under all these accusations, to the amazement of the court, v. 62. The high priest, the judge of the court, arose in some heat, and said, 'Answerest Thou nothing?' Come, you the prisoner at the bar; you hear what is sworn against you, what have you now to say for yourself? What defence can you make? Or what pleas have you to offer in answer to this charge? But Jesus held his peace, (v. 63.) not as one sullen, or as one self-condemned, or as one astonished and in confusion; not because He wanted something to say, or knew not how to say it, but that the Scripture might be fulfilled; (Isa. 53:7.) As the sheep is dumb before the shearer, and before the butcher, so He opened not his mouth; and that He might be the Son of David, who, when his enemies spake mischievous things against him, was as a deaf man that heard not, Ps. 38:12-14. He was silent, because his hour was come; He would not deny the charge, because He was willing to submit to the sentence; otherwise, He could as easily have put them to silence and shame now, as He had done many a time before. If God had entered into judgment with us, we had been speechless, (ch. 22:12.) not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job 9:3. Therefore, when Christ was made sin for us, He was silent, and left it to his blood to speak, Heb. 12:24.

2. They examined our Lord Jesus Himself on oath, like that ex officio; and, since they could not accuse Him, they will try, contrary to before men, whatever hazards they run by it. And, according to this pattern, the martyrs readily confessed themselves Christians, though they knew they must die for it, as the martyrs at Thebais, Euseb. Hist. l. 8. c. 9. That Christ answered out of a regard to the adjuration Caiaphas had profanely used, I cannot think any more than that He had any regard to the like adjuration in the devil's mouth, Mark 5:7.

[2.] He refers Himself for proof of this, to his second coming, and indeed to his whole estate of exaltation. It is probable that they looked on Him with a disdainful smile, when He said, I am; 'A likely fellow,' thought they, 'to be the Messiah, which is expected to come in so much pomp and power;' and to that this nevertheless refers. 'Though now you see Me in this low and abject state, and think it a ridiculous thing for Me to call Myself the Messiah, nevertheless, the day is coming when I shall appear otherwise.' Hereafter, shortly, for this exaltation began in a few days; ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power to judge the world; of which his coming shortly, to judge and destroy the Jewish nation, would be a type and earnest. Note, The terrors of the judgment-day will be a sensible conviction to the most obstinate infidelity, not to conversion, (that will be then too late), but to eternal confusion. Observe, 1st. Whom they should see; the Son of man. Having owned Himself the Son of God, even now in his estate of humiliation, He speaks of Himself as the Son of man, even in his estate of exaltation; for He had these two distinct natures in one person. The incarnation of Christ has made Him Son of God and son of man; for He is Immanuel, God with us. 2dly. In what posture. 1. Sitting on the right hand of power, according to the prophecy of the Messiah; (Ps. 110:1.) Sit Thou at my right hand; which denotes both the dignity and the dominion He is exalted to. Though now He stood at the bar, they should shortly see Him sit on the throne. 2. Coming in the clouds of heaven; this refers to another prophecy concerning the Son of man, (Dan. 7:13, 14.) which is applied to Christ, (Luke 1:33.) when He came to destroy Jerusalem; so terrible was the judgment, and so sensible the indications of the wrath of the Lamb in it, that it might be called a visible appearance of Christ; but, doubtless, it has reference to the general judgment; to this day He appeals, and summons them to an appearance, then and there to answer for what they are now doing. He had spoken of this day to his disciples awhile ago, for their comfort, Luke 21:27, 28. Now He speaks of it to his enemies, for their terror; for nothing is more comfortable to the righteous, nor more terrible to the wicked, than Christ's judging the world at the last day.

V. His conviction; The high priest rent his clothes, according to the custom of the Jews, when they heard or saw any thing done or said which they looked upon to be a reproach to God; as Isa. 38:12. 37:1. Acts 14:14. Caiaphas would be thought extremely tender of the glory of God; (Come, see his zeal for the Lord of hosts;) but, while he pretended an abhorrence of blasphemy, he was himself the greatest blasphemer; he now forgot the law which forbade the high priest in any case to rend his clothes, unless we will suppose this an excepted case.

Observe, 1. The crime He was found guilty of; blasphemy. He hath spoken blasphemy; that is, He hath spoken reproachfully of the living God; that is the notion we have of blasphemy; because we by sin had reproached the Lord, therefore Christ, when He was made sin for us, was condemned as a blasphemer for the truth He told them.

2. The evidence on which they found Him

(62.) 'Our Savior did not refuse to answer, which He would have done, had He disapproved of all asseverations upon oath, or all such solemn invocations of, and appeals to, the name of God, in cases where the truth is doubtful, or the testimony is suspected.'

Verse 64.

Hereafter (Luke 22:63.) From the present time. This implies that the manifested effects of his exaltation would in a little time be conspicuous; but it did not exclude such as were very remote. Scott Thou hast said. 'We are informed by the traveller Aryda, that this is the prevailing mode of a person's expressing his assent or affirmation to this day, in the vicinity of mount Lebanon, especially where he does not wish to assert any thing in express terms.'

66 What think ye? They answered and said, "He is guilty of death."

made a man an outlaw among his people, and so exposed him to the fury, either of a popular tumult, as Stephen, or to be clamored against before the governor, as Christ. Thus was the Lord of life condemned to die, that through Him there may be no condemnation to us.

VII. The abuses and indignities done Him after sentence passed; (v. 67, 68.) Then they spat in his face. Because they had not power to put Him to death, and could not be sure that they should prevail with the governor to be their executioner, they would do Him all the mischief they could, now they had Him in their hands. Condemned prisoners are taken under the special protection of the law, which they are to make satisfaction to, and by all civilized nations have been treated with tenderness. But when they had passed sentence on our Lord Jesus, He was treated as if hell had broken loose on Him, as if death were too good for Him, and He were unworthy of the compassion showed to the worst malefactors. Thus He was made a curse for us. But who were thus barbarous? It should seem, the very same that had passed sentence on Him, v. 66, 67. The priests began, and then no wonder if the servants carried on the humor. See how they abused Him.

1. They spat in his face. Thus the Scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 50: 6.) He hid not his face from shame and spitting. Job complained of this indignity done to him, and herein was a type of Christ; (Job 30: 10.) They spare not to spit in my face. It is an expression of the greatest contempt and indignation possible, a disgraceful punishment, Deut. 25: 9. When Miriam was under the leprosy, it was looked on as a disgrace to her, like that of her father spitting in her face, Num. 12: 14. That face fairer than the children of men, white and ruddy, which angels reverence, was thus filthily abused by the basest and vilest of the children of men. Thus was confusion poured upon his face, that ours might not be filled with everlasting shame and contempt. They who now profane his blessed name, abuse his Word, and hate his image on his sanctified ones, what do they better than spit in his face? They would do that if it were in their reach.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 57-68. Happy they, against whom their most malicious enemies can allege nothing, except by 'false witnesses!'—Let those who have the honor to 'suffer for his sake,' contemplate his calm behavior before the council, and his intrepid confession of his true character; and let them consider the crimes alleged against Him, the condemnation passed on Him, and the contempt, indignity, and insult He most patiently endured. For the Christian cannot reasonably expect so much tenderness and compassion, when suffering for the truth, as a thief or murderer might, when punished for his crimes; and if he look

Spit in his face. 'This was done as a mark of the most profound contempt. See Job 16: 10. 30: 10. Is. 50: 6. Micah 50: 1. The judges now delivered Him into the hands of the mob. Buffeted. guilty; Ye have heard the blasphemy; why trouble yourselves to examine witnesses further? He owned the fact, that He did profess Himself the Son of God: and then they made blasphemy of it, and convicted Him on his confession. The high priest triumphs in the success of the snare he had laid; Aha, so would we have it. Thus was He judged out of his own mouth at their bar, because we were liable to be so judged at God's bar. There is no need of witnesses against us; our own consciences are instead of a thousand witnesses.

VI. His sentence passed, v. 66.

Here is, 1. Caiaphas' appeal to the bench; What think ye? See his base hypocrisy and partiality; when he had already prejudged the cause, and pronounced Him a blasphemer, then, as if willing to be advised, he asks the judgment of his brethren; but, hide malice ever so cunningly under the robe of justice, it will break out. If he would have dealt fairly, he should have collected the votes of the bench, begun with the junior, and have delivered his own opinion last; but he knew that, by the authority of his place, he could sway the rest, and therefore declares his judgment, and presumes they are all of his mind; he takes the crime as confessed; and the judgment as agreed to.

2. Their concurrence; He is guilty of death; perhaps they did not all concur, it is certain that Joseph of Arimathea, if he was present, dissented; (Luke 23: 51.) so did Nicodemus, and it is likely, others with them; however, the majority carried it: but, perhaps, this being an extraordinary council, or cabal, rather, none had notice to be present but such as they knew would concur, and so it might be voted unanimously. The judgment was, 'He is guilty of death; by the law, He deserves to die.' Though they had not power now to put any man to death, yet, by such a judgment as this, they

2. They buffeted Him, and smote Him with the palms of their hands. This added pain to the shame, for both came in with sin. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 50: 6.) and 1 (Lam. 3: 30.) He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth Him. He is filled with reproach, and keepeth silence, (v. 28.) and (Mic. 5: 1.) They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek; here the margin reads it, They smote Him with rods; for so the original word signifies.

3. They challenged Him to tell who struck Him, having first blindfolded Him, v. 64. (1.) They made sport with Him, as the Philistines with Samson; it is grievous to those that are in misery, for people to make merry about them, but much more to make merry with them and their misery. Here was an instance of the greatest depravity and degeneracy of human nature, to show that there was need of a religion that should recover men to humanity. (2.) They made sport with his prophetic office. They had heard Him called a prophet, and that He was famed for wonderful discoveries; this they upbraided Him with, and pretended to make a trial of; as if the divine omniscience must stoop to a piece of children's play. They put a like affront on Christ, who profanely jest with the Scripture, and make themselves merry with holy things; like Belshazzar's revels in the temple-towers.

V. 69-75. We have here the story of Peter's denying his Master, and it comes in as a part of Christ's sufferings. Our Lord Jesus was now in the high priest's hall. But we do not find any friend He had about the court, save Peter only, and it would have been better if he had been at a distance. Observe how he fell, and how he rose again by repentance.

I. His sin, impartially related, to the honor of the penmen of Scripture, who dealt faithfully. Observe,

1. The immediate occasion of Peter's sin. He sat without, among the servants of the high priest. Note, Bad company is to many an occasion of sin; and those who needlessly thrust themselves into it, go on the devil's ground, venture into his crowds, and may expect to be tempted and insnared, as Peter was; they scarce can come out of such company, without guilt or grief, or both. He that would keep God's commandments and his own covenant, must say to evil-doers, Depart from me, Ps. 119: 115. Peter spake from his own experience, when he warned his new converts to save themselves from that unlearned generation; for he had like to have ruined himself by but going once among them.

2. The temptation to it. He was challenged as a retainer to Jesus of Galilee, v. 69, 71. The Galilean dialect and pronunciation differed from that of the other Jews. Happy he, whose speech bewrays him to be a disciple of Christ; by the holiness and seriousness of whose discourse it appears that he has been with Jesus! Observe how scornfully they speak of Christ—Jesus of Galilee, and of Nazareth, upbraiding Him with the country He was of; and how disdainfully they speak of Peter—This fellow; as if they thought it a reproach to them to have such a man in their

to the scene we are considering, he will perceive, that disdain, cruel mockings, and every expression of abhorrence, are the sure portion of the true disciple, from such men as spat in the face of the holy Jesus, and buffeted and derided the 'Lord of glory.' Yet let us boldly confess his name, and bear the reproach, and He will confess us before his Father's throne; whilst those, who pretend to do service to God, by murdering his saints, will be covered with shame and everlasting contempt. SCOTT.

Verses 69, 75.

Peter was so sure to fall in order to give him a more acquainted acquaintance with his own weakness, and render him more modest, humble, and dependent on God, and his work more successful.

70 But ^u he denied before them all, saying,
I know not what thou sayest.

71 And * when he was gone out into the porch, another maid saw him, and said unto them that were there, * This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth.

72 And again he denied * with an oath, * I do not know the man.

73 And after a while came unto him they that stood by, and said to Peter, ^b Surely thou also art one of them; ^c for thy speech bewrayeth thee.

74 Then ^d began he to curse and to swear, ^e saying, I know not the company, and he was well enough served for coming among them; yet they had nothing to accuse him of, but that he was with Jesus.

3. The sin itself. When charged as one of Christ's disciples, he denied it, was ashamed and afraid to own it, and would have all about him believe that he had no knowledge of, nor kindness or concern for Him.

(1.) Upon the first mention of it, he said, I know not what thou sayest. A shuffling answer; he pretended he did not understand the charge, and knew not whom she meant by Jesus of Galilee, or what she meant by being with him; so making strange of that, which his heart was now as full of as it could be. [1.] It is a fault thus to misrepresent our own apprehensions, thoughts and affections, to serve a turn; to pretend we do not understand, or did not think of, or remember, that which yet we do apprehend, and did think of, and remember; this is a species of lying we are more prone to than any other, because in this a man is not easily discovered; for, who knows the spirit of a man, save himself? But God knows it, and we must be restrained from this wickedness by a fear of Him, Prov. 24: 12. [2.] It is yet a greater fault to be shy of Christ, to dissemble our knowledge of Him, and to shift off a confession of Him, when we are called to it; it is, in effect, to deny Him.

(2.) Upon the next attack, he said, flat and plain, I know not the man, and backed it with an oath, v. 72. This was, in effect, to say, I will not own Him, I am no Christian; for Christianity is the knowledge of Christ. Why, Peter? Canst thou look on yonder prisoner at the bar, and say thou dost not know Him? didst thou not quit all to follow Him? And hast thou not been the man of his counsel? hast thou not known Him better than any one else? y. Didst thou not confess Him to be the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? Hast thou forgotten all the kind and tender looks thou hast had from Him, and all the intimate fellowship thou hast had with Him? Canst thou look Him in the face, and say that thou dost not know Him?

(3.) Upon the third assault, he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man, n. 74. This was worst of all, for the way of swearing is downhill. He cursed and swore, [1.] To back what he said, that they might not any more call it in question; he did not only say it, but swear it; and yet what he said was false. Note, We have reason to suspect the truth of that which is backed with rash oaths and imprecations. None but the devil's sayings need the devil's proofs. He that will not be restrained by the third commandment from mocking the ninth from deceiving his brother. [2.] He to us, that we sin not as Peter; that we never deny Christ, the Lord that bought us, by his Spirit, dissembling our knowledge of Him, and his words, or afraid of suffering for Him,

4. The aggravations of this sin. Consider. (1.) Who he was—an apostle, one of the first three, on all occasions most forward to speak to the honor of Christ. The greater profession we make of religion, the greater is our sin, if in any thing we walk unworthily. (2.) What fair warning his Master had given him of his anger; had he regarded this as he ought, he would not have run himself into temptation. (3.) How solemnly he had promised to adhere to Christ in this time of trial; he had said again and again, 'I will never deny Thee; no, I will die with Thee first;' yet he brake these bonds, and his word was yea and nay. (4.) How soon he fell into this sin after the Lord's supper. There to receive such an inestimable pledge of redeeming love, and yet, the same night, to disown his Redeemer, was indeed turning aside quickly. (5.) How weak, comparatively, the temptation; it was not the judge, or any officer of the court, that charged him with being a disciple of Jesus, but a silly maid or two, that probably designed him no hurt, nor would have done him any, if he had owned it. This was but running with the footmen, Jer. 12: 5. (5.) How often he repeated it; even after the cock had crowed once, he continued in the temptation, and a second and third time relapsed into the sin. Is this Peter? How art thou fallen!

Thus was his sin aggravated; out, on the other hand, there is this to extenuate it—that what he said, he said in his haste, Ps. 116: 11. He fell into the sin by surprise, not as Judas, with design; his heart was against it; he spoke very ill, but it was unadvisedly, and before he was aware.

II. Peter's repentance, v. 75. The former is written for our admonition, that we may not sin; this for our imitation, that, if at any time we be overtaken, we may hasten to repent. Observe.

1. What brought Peter to repentance.

(1.) The cock crew; (v. 74.) a common contingency; but Christ having mentioned the crowing of the cock in the warning, that made it a mean of bringing him to himself. The word of Christ can put a significance on whatever sign He shall please to choose. The crowing of a cock is to Peter, instead of the voice of one calling him to repentance. Conscience should thus put us in mind of what we had forgotten. When David's heart smote him, the cock crew. Where there is a living principle of grace in the soul, a little hint will serve to recover from a by-path. Here was the crowing of a cock made a happy occasion of the conversion of a soul. Christ comes sometimes in mercy at cock-crowing.

(2.) He remembered the words of the Lord ; this brought him to himself, and melted him to tears of godly sorrow ; a sense of his ingratitude to Christ, and the slight he had shown to his gracious warning. Note, A serious reflection on the words of the Lord Jesus, will be a powerful inducement to repentance, and will help to break the heart for sin. Nothing grieves a penitent more than that he has sinned against

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 60-75. Let all beware of vain-confidence and self-preference. It does not come to us to boast, or resolve what we will do; rather let us decline temptation, and trust in the Lord alone to uphold us. Let us also avoid rashness, and pray for victory over the fear of man. In all these respects, we need much forbearance from our gracious Lord: though we be not traitors, we are prone to decline the cross; though we do follow Christ, it is commonly at a great distance; and it is not unusual for even his disciples to be afraid of being known to belong to Him! But when self-confidence induces men to turn themselves uncalled into perilous circumstances, we may expect lamentable consequences.—Little do we know how we should act in very difficult situations, if left to ourselves: the snow does not more naturally melt before the fire, than our resolutions vanish in temptation. Who then can say, what he will do, or not to do? Let us all distrust our own hearts, and rely wholly on God, according to his Word.—Let it also be noted, that Peter first lied wilfully; then he committed the most direct perjury to cover his lie; and then he uttered the most horrid execration on himself, equivalent to the worst language of those who delight in cursing. This is the common progress of men in such cases.—If any have fallen even in the most dreadful manner, let them think on Peter's recovery, and not despair; and let them recollect the words of Christ, as well as their own sins, that their tears, confessions, and humiliations may be mingled with hope. And let us all frequently remember our past follies, and manifold instances of ingratitude; that we may learn watchfulness, humility, caution, and compassion for the tempted and fallen, by the experience of our own numerous mistakes, sins, and recoveries. SCOTT.

duct showed, that he had exceedingly profited by the painful lesson. The event has also proved most instructive in various ways to believers ever since; and if infidels, Pharisees, and hypocrites will stumble at it, or abuse it, they do it at their peril. (2 Sam. 11: 27. P. O. 14—71.) 'Peter, by the wonderful providence of God, appointed to be a witness of all these things, is prepared to the example of singular con“stancy, by the experience of his own incredulity.” Beza. “I venture to say, that it is useful to proud men to fall into some open and manifest sin, that they may be displeased with themselves, as they had already fallen by their self-complacency. For Peter, being displeased with himself, rept in a more salutary manner, than he had prevaricated, when pleased with himself.” Augustine. — OTT.

was delivered bound to Pilate, 1, 2. Jud., in remorse, restores the silver, and hangs himself, 3-5. The priests fulfil the scripture, in disposing of the money, 6-10. Christ is sent before Pilate, 11-14, who proposes to release him, according to the custom of the feast, 15-16. Pilate's wife, alarmed by a dream, warns him to desist, 19. He washes his hands, to clear himself; and, being urged by the people, with imprecations on themselves and their children, he releases Barabbas, and delivers Jesus up to be crucified, 20-25. He is mocked, and crowned with thorns by the soldiers, 27-31; crucified between two thieves, 32-33, and reviled by the people and rulers, 39-44. The land is darkened, 45; Jesus, calling on God, expires, 46-50. The veil of the temple is rent, the earth quakes, the tombs burst open, and the centurion confesses Him as the Son of God, 51-54. Certain women witness these scenes, 55-56. Joseph of Arimathea takes a body and buries it, 57-61. His tomb is sealed by the chief priests, and a watch placed at it, 62-66.

WHEN the morning was come, all the chief priests and elders of the people took counsel against Jesus to put him to death.

2 And when they had bound him, they led him away; and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.

3 ¶ Then * Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver, to the chief priests and elders,

4 Saying, 'I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood.' And they said, 'What is that to us? see thou to that.'

5 And he cast down the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the tokens of his love.

2. How his repentance was expressed; he went out and wept bitterly.

(1.) His sorrow was secret; he went out, out of the high priest's hall to some place of solitude and retirement, where he might bemoan himself, like the doves of the valleys, Ezek. 6: 9. Jer. 9: 1, 2. He went out, that he might not be disturbed in his devotions on this sad occasion. We may then be most free in communion with God, when most free from the converse and business of this world. In mourning for sin, we find families apart, and their wives apart, Zech. 12: 11, 12.

(2.) His sorrow was serious; He wept bitterly. Sorrow for sin must be great and deep, like that for an only son; not to satisfy divine justice, but to evidence that there is a real change of mind, the essence of repentance, to make pardon more welcome, and sin for the future more loathsome. Peter, who wept so bitterly for denying Christ, never denied him again, but confessed Him often and openly, and in the mouth of danger; so far from ever saying, I know not the man, that he made all the house of Israel know assuredly that this same Jesus was Lord and Christ. True repentance for any sin will be best evidenced by our abounding in the contrary grace and duty. Some of the ancients say, that, as long as Peter lived, he never heard a cock crow without weeping. Those that have truly sorrowed for sin, will sorrow on every remembrance of it; yet not so as to hinder, but rather increase, their joy in God, and in his mercy and grace.

CHAP. XXVII. v. 1-10. A very affecting story is recorded in this chapter of the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus. Considering the thing itself, there cannot be a more tragical story told us; common humanity would melt the heart, to find an innocent and excellent person thus misused. But, considering the design and fruit of Christ's sufferings, it is Gospel, good news, that Jesus Christ was thus delivered for our offences; and there is nothing we have more reason to glory in, than the cross of Christ.

We left Christ in the hands of the chief priests and elders, condemned to die; but about two years before this, the Romans having taken from the Jews the power of capital punishment, they could put no man to death, and therefore, early in the morning, another counsel is held to consider what is to be done. And here we are told what was done.

I. Christ is delivered up to Pilate, that he might execute the sentence passed on Him. Judea having been, almost one hundred years before this, conquered by Pompey, had ever since been tributary to Rome, and was lately made part of the province of Syria, and subject to the government of the president of Syria, under whom there were several procurators, who chiefly attended the business of the revenues, but sometimes, as Pilate particularly, had the whole power of the president lodged in them. This was a plain evidence that the sceptre was departed from Judah, and that therefore now the Shiloh must come, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49: 10. Pilate is characterized by the Roman writers of that time, as a man of a rough, haughty spirit, wilful and implacable, and extremely covetous and oppressive; the Jews had a great enmity to his person, and were weary of his government; yet they made use of him as the tool of their malice against Christ.

1. They bound Jesus. He was bound when He was first seized; but either He was loosed before the council and now bound again, or now He was bound more closely. Having found Him guilty, they tied his hands behind Him, as they usually do the hands of convicted criminals. He was already bound with the bonds of love to man, and of his own undertaking; but God had bound the yoke of our transgression on the neck of the Lord Jesus, (Lam. 1: 14, that we might be loosed by his bonds, as we are healed by his stripes.

2. They led Him away in a sort of triumph, as a lamb to the slaughter; so was He taken from prison and from judgment, Isa. 53: 7, 8. It was near a mile from Caiaphas's house to Pilate's. All that way they led Him through the streets of Jerusalem, when, in the morning, they began to fill, to make Him a spectacle to the world.

3. They delivered Him to Pontius Pilate; according to what He had often said, that He should be delivered to the Gentiles. Both Jews and Gentiles were obnoxious to the judgment of God, and concluded under sin, and Christ was to be the Savior of both; therefore He was brought into judgment of both, and both had a hand in his death. See how these corrupt church rulers abused the civil magistrate, making use of him to execute their unrighteous decrees, and inflict the grievance which they had prescribed, Isa. 10: 1. Thus have the kings of the earth been wretchedly imposed on by the papal powers, and condemned to the drudgery of extirpating with the sword of war, as well as that of justice, those whom they have marked for heretics, right or wrong, to the great prejudice of their own interests.

II. The money paid to Judas for betraying Christ, is delivered back, and he in despair hangs himself. The chief priests and elders supported themselves with this, that Christ's own disciple betrayed Him to them; but now, in the midst of the prosecution, that strength failed them, and even he is made to them a witness of Christ's innocency, and a monument of God's justice; which served, 1. For glory to Christ, and a specimen of his victory over Satan. 2. For warning to his persecutors, and to leave them the more inexcusable. Had not their heart been fully set to do this evil, what Judas said and did, one would think, should have stopped the prosecution.

(1.) See here how Judas repented; not like Peter, who repented, believed, and was pardoned: no, he repented, despaired, and was ruined. Now observe here,

[1.] What induced him to repent; he saw that He was condemned. Judas, it is probable, expected that Christ would either have made his escape out of their hands, or so have pleaded his own cause at their bar, as to have come off; and then Christ would have the honor, the Jews the shame, and he the money, and no harm done. This he had no reason to expect, because he had so often heard his Master say that He must be crucified; yet it is probable he did expect it, and when the event did not answer his vain fancy, then he fell into this horror. Note, Those who measure actions by the consequence of them, rather than by the divine law, will find themselves mistaken in their measures. He repented himself; i. e. was filled with grief, anguish, and indignation, at himself, when reflecting on what he had done. When he was

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. v. 5. It seems evident that Judas was his own executioner, by strangling himself; and this account may be reconciled with that of Peter, as recorded in the Acts, by supposing that he suspended himself in such a place and manner, that the rope, or wood to which it was fastened, broke; and that he fell from a great height, and so burst asunder; this coming to pass by the special purpose of God, to render his body a more terrible spectacle to all beholders, and to cause his death to be the more remarkable. (Murg. Ref. h-k—Nite, Acts 1: 16-18.) It admits of little doubt, that Judas's death preceded that of our injured Lord; so speedily did divine vengeance overtake him. Yet the rulers took no notice even of this alarming circumstance! It appears to me, that the acquittal or condemnation of Jesus never entered into Judas's contemplation. Al! he thought of was gain. Judas was the constant companion of our Saviour's ministry, and witness to every thing He said or did. If there had been any plan concerted to impose a false religion on the world, Judas must have been in the secret. His testimony is invaluable, because it is the testimony of an unwilling witness; the testimony, not of a friend, but of an enemy. Bp. Porteus. 'The greatest enemy, with a choice of means for detection of fraud and collusion, could not have pointed out any thing better calculated to suit his purpose, than the placing of Judas among the apostles. It was a remarkable provision made by the Lord, for increasing, to the highest point, the value of the testimony of the twelve apostles. It was like the water which Elijah commanded to be poured around the altar, before the fire from heaven descended to consume the sacrifice. Judas also, as the other apostles, although in a different way, sealed his testimony with his blood.' Huldane or Divine Revelation.

the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself.

man had he never been born. it be rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, in the howels it will be turned into the gall of asps, (Job 20: 12-14.) like John's book, Rev. 10: 9.

[2.] What were the indications of his repentance.

1st. He made restitution; He brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests, when they were all together publicly. Now the money burned in his conscience, and he was as sick of it, as ever he had been fond of it. Note, That which is ill-gotten will never do good to those that get it, Jer. 13: 10. Job 20: 15. If he had repented, and brought the money back before he had betrayed Christ, he might have done it with comfort, then he had agreed while yet in the way; but now it was too late, now he cannot do it without horror, wishing ten thousand times he had never meddled with it. See Jam. 5: 3. He brought it again. Note, To keep what is unjustly gotten is a continuance in the sin, and an avowing of it inconsistent with repentance. He brought it to those from whom he had it, to let them know that he repented his bargain. Note, Those who have served and hardened others in sin, when God gives them repentance, should let them know it, whose sins they have partaken, that it may bring them to repentance.

2dly. He made confession; v. 4. 1. To the honor of Christ, he pronounces his blood innocent. Had he been guilty of any sinful practices, Judas, as his disciple, would certainly have known it, and, as his betrayer, would certainly have discovered it; but he, freely, and without being urged to it, pronounces Him innocent, to the face of those who had now pronounced Him guilty. 2. To his own shame, he confesses that he had sinned, in betraying this blood. He does not lay the blame on any one else; but takes it all to himself. Thus far Judas went toward his repentance, yet it was not to salvation. He confessed, but not to God, he did not go to Him, and say, I have sinned, Father, against heaven. He confessed the betraying of innocent blood, but not that love of money which was the root of this evil. Some betray Christ, and yet justify themselves in it, and so come short of Judas.

(2.) See here how the chief priests and elders entertained Judas's penitential confession; they said, What is that to us? See thou to that.

[1.] How carelessly they speak of the betraying of Christ. Judas had told them that the blood of Christ was innocent blood; and they said, What is that to us? Was it nothing to them that they had thirsted after this blood, sired Judas to betray it, and had now condemned it to be shed unjustly? Thus do fools make a mock at sin; thus light do many make of Christ crucified; what is it to them, that He suffered such things?

[2.] How carelessly they speak of the sin of Judas; he said, I have sinned, and they said, What is that to us? What are we concerned in thy sin, that thou tellest us of it? Note, It is folly for us to think that the sins of others are nothing to us, especially those sins we are any way accessory to, or partakers in. If the elders of Jezreel, to please Jezebel, murder Naboth, is that nothing to Ahab? Yes, he has killed, for he has taken possession, 1 Kings 21: 19. If there were guilt, they tell Judas he must look to it, he must bear it, 1st. Because he had betrayed Him to them. His was indeed the greater sin; (John 19: 11.) but it did not therefore follow that theirs was no sin. It is common to extenuate our own by the aggravation of other people's sins. But the judgment of God is according to truth, not comparison. 2dly. Because he knew and believed Him to be innocent. 'If He be innocent, see thou to it, that is more than we know; we have adjudged Him guilty, and justly prosecute Him as such.' Wicked practices are buoyed up by wicked principles, and particularly by this, that sin is sin only to those that think it so; that it is no harm to persecute a good man, if we take him to be a bad man; but those who thus think to mock God, will but deceive and destroy themselves.

[3.] See how carelessly they speak of the conviction, terror, and remorse, Judas was under. They were glad to make use of him in the sin, but, now that his sin had put him into a fright, they slighted him, and turned him over to his own terrors; why trouble them with his melancholy fancies? But why so shy? 1st. Perhaps they feared lest the sparks of his conviction, brought too near, should kindle a fire in their own consciences. Note, Obstinate sinners stand on their guard against convictions; and, resolutely impenitent, look with disdain on the penitent. 2dly. However, they were in no concern to succor Judas; when they had brought him into the snare, they not only left him, but laughed at him. Note, Sinners, under convictions, will find their own companions in sin but miserable comforters. It is usual for those that love the treason, to hate the traitor.

(3.) Here is the utter despair that Judas was hereby driven to. If the chief priests had promised him to stay the prosecution, it would have been some comfort to him; but, seeing no hopes of that, he grew desperate, v. 5.

[1.] He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple. The chief priests would not take the money, for fear of taking thereby the whole guilt to themselves, which they were willing that Judas should bear the load of; Judas would not keep it, it was too hot for him to hold; he therefore threw it down in the temple, that, whether they would or no, it might fall into the hands of the chief priests. See what a drug money was, when the guilt of sin was tacked to it, it was thought to be so.

[2.] He went, and hanged himself. First, he retired; withdrew like the possessed man, Luke 8: 29. Woe to him that is in despair, and is alone. If Judas had gone to Christ, or to some of the disciples, perhaps he might have had relief, had as the case was; but, missing of it with the chief priests, he abandoned himself to despair; and the same devil that, with the help of the priests, drew him to the sin, with their help drove him to despair. 2dly. He became his own executioner; he hanged himself; was suffocated with grief, so Hammond, though Whithy is clear that our translation is right. Judas had a sight and sense of sin, but no apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, and so he pined away in his iniquity. His sin, we may suppose, was not, in its own nature, unpardonable, there were some of those saved, that had been Christ's betrayers and murderers; but he concluded, as Cain, that his iniquity was greater than could be forgiven, and would rather throw himself on the devil's mercy than on God's. And some have said, that Judas sinned more in despairing of the mercy of God, than in betraying his Master's blood. Now, the terrors of the Almighty set themselves in array against him. All the curses written in God's book now came into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones, as was foretold concerning him, (Ps. 109: 18, 19.) and drove him to this desperate shift, for the escaping of a hell within him, to leap into that before him, which was but the perfection and perpetuity of this horror and despair.

Now, in this story, 1. We have an instance of the wretched end of those into whom Satan enters, and particularly those that are given up to the love of money. This is the destruction in which many are drowned, 1 Tim. 6: 9, 10. Remember what became of the swine into which, and of the traitor into whom, the devil entered; and give no place to the devil. 2. We have an instance of the wrath of God revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, Rom. 1: 18. As in the story of Peter we behold the goodness of God, and the triumphs of Christ's grace in the conversion of some sinners; so in the story of Judas we behold the severity of God, and the triumphs of Christ's power and justice in the

Verses 6-10.

This fulfilled an ancient prophecy, which is here said to have been spoken by Jeremiah. (Jer. Zech. 11: 10-14.) Various conjectures have been formed on the subject; but it is most natural to admit, that a trivial error has crept into the text; for the change of a single letter, according to the abbreviated manner in which names are written in the old manuscripts would suffice to occasion the mistake. The passage is quoted something differently than it stands in the prophecy; but the meaning is, that the thirty shekels, the vile price at which the Jew valued and bargained for the Shepherd of Israel, as if He had been a slave, came into the hands of a potter. This was foretold and exactly accomplished. If this be, as it is by far most probable, intended as a quotation from Zechariah, or a reference to his prediction; the Septuagint must have been wholly disregarded by the evangelist. This version may be literally translated as follows: 'They appointed thirty pieces of silver as my hire; and the Lord said unto me, Place these in 8 Wherefore ° that field was called, The field of blood, & unto this day.

9 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, ° And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they ° of the children of Israel did value ; be a burying-place for strangers, that is, proselytes to the Jewish religion, who were of other nations, and, coming to Jerusalem to worship, happened to die there. [1.] It looks like an instance of their humanity, that they took care for the burying of strangers; and it intimates that they themselves allowed, (as Paul saith, Acts 24: 15.) that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust; for we therefore take care of the dead body, not only because it has been the habitation of a rational soul, but because it must be so again. But, [2.] It was no instance of their humility that they would bury strangers in a place by themselves, as if they were not worthy to be laid in their burying-places; strangers must keep their distance, alive and dead, and that principle must go down to the grave, Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou, Isa. 65: 5. The sons of Heth were better affected to Abraham, though a stranger among them, when they offered him the choicest of their own sepulchres, Gen. 23: 6. But the sons of the stranger, that have joined themselves to the Lord, though buried by themselves, shall rise with all that are dead in Christ.

10 And gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

This buying of the potter's field took place not long after the crucifixion; for Peter speaks of it soon after Christ's ascension; and it is here recorded, 1st. To show the hypocrisy of the chief priests and elders. They were maliciously persecuting the blessed Jesus, and now,

1. They scruple to put that money into the treasury, or corban, of the temple, with which they had hired the traitor. Though, perhaps, they had taken it out of the treasury, pretending it was for the public good, and though they were great sticklers for the corban, and labored to draw all the wealth of the nation into it, yet they would not put that money into it, which was the price of blood. The hire of a traitor they thought parallel to the hire of a harlot, and the price of a malefactor, (such a one they made Christ to be,) equivalent to the price of a dog, neither of which was to be brought into the house of the Lord, Deut. 23: 13. Thus they that swallowed a camel, strained at a gnat.

2. They think to atone for what they had done by this public good act of providing a burying-place for strangers, though not at their own charge. Thus, in times of ignorance, people were made to believe that building churches and endowing monasteries would make amends for immoralities.

2dly. To signify the favor intended by the blood of Christ to strangers, and sinners of the Gentiles. Through the price of his blood, a refuge-place is provided for them after death. Thus many of the ancients apply this passage. The grave is the potter's field, where the bodies are thrown as despised, broken vessels. The Germans call burying-places God's fields; for in them God sows his people as a corn of wheat, John 12: 24. See Hos. 2: 23. Isa. 26: 19.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10. The advantages attainable by sin, appear in prospect very desirable to the carnal mind; but they contain far more bitterness than satisfaction, when actually possessed. —The anguish and remorse of Judas, when he saw that Jesus was condemned, should impress our minds with some idea of what wicked men will feel hereafter, when they shall learn all the fatal effects of their infidelity, impiety, licentiousness, and iniquity. In this world, there is ground of hope for the vilest transgressors; and when deeply convinced of their guilt, they should be reminded, that their chief danger arises from temptation to despair of God's mercy. —When faith and hope are wanting, repentance cannot be genuine; and the enemy, who once persuaded his deluded servants that their sins were small, and that they had nothing to fear, will at length perhaps take occasion, from some special aggravations of their crimes, to represent them to their affrighted imaginations as absolutely 3dly. To perpetuate the infamy of those that bought and sold the blood of Christ. This field was commonly called Aceldama—the field of blood; not by the chief priests, they hoped in this burying-place to bury the remembrance of their own crime; but by the people; who took notice of Judas's acknowledgment that he had betrayed the innocent blood, though the chief priests made nothing of it. They fastened this name on the field for a perpetual memorial. Note, Divine Providence has many ways of entailing disgrace on the wicked practices even of great men, who, though they seek to cover their shame, are put to a perpetual reproach.

4thly. That we may see how the Scripture was fulfilled; v. 9, 10. The words quoted are found in the prophecy of Zechariah, ch. 11: 12. The Syriac version, which is ancient, reads only, It was spoken by the prophet, not naming any, whence some think that Jeremy was added by some scribe; others that the whole volume of the prophets, being in one book, and the prophecy of Jeremiah first, it might not be improper, to quote any passage out of that volume, under his name. The Jews used to say, The spirit of Jeremiah was in Zechariah, and so they were as one prophet. Some suggest that it was spoken by Jeremiah, but written by Zechariah; or that Jeremiah wrote the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of Zechariah. Now this passage, in the prophet, is a representation of the great contempt of God among the Jews. But here that is really acted, which was there but figuratively expressed. The sum of money is the same—thirty pieces of silver, this they weighed for his price, at this rate they valued Him; a goodly price; and this was cast to the potter in the house of the Lord; which was here literally accomplished. Note, We should better understand the events of Providence, if we were better acquainted even with the language and expressions of Scripture. What David spake figuratively, (Ps. 42: 7.) Jonah made a literal application of; All thy waves are as billows are gone over me, John 2: 3.

The giving of the price of Him that was valued for the potter's field, bespeaks, 1. The high value that ought to be put on Christ. The price was given, not for Him; no, He cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, nor this unspeakable Gift be bought with money. 2. The low value that was put on Him. It added to the reproach of his being bought and sold, that it was at so low a rate. Cast it to the potter, so it is in Zechariah; a petty chapman, not the merchant that deals in things of value. And observe, they of the children of Israel thus undervalued Him; they who were his own people, that should have known better what estimate to put on Him, they to whom He was first sent, whose glory He was, and whom He had valued so highly, and bought so dear. He gave kings' ransoms for them, and the richest countries, (so precious were they in his sight, Isa. 43: 3, 4.) Egypt, and Ethiopia, and Seba; but they gave a slave's ransom for Him, (see Exod. 21: 32.) and valued Him but at the rate of a potter's field; so was that blood trodden under foot, the refiner's furnace, and I will see whether it be approved, in the manner in which I have been proved by them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and I brought them into the house of the Lord, unto the refiner's furnace.' It accords much more nearly, though not exactly, to the Hebrew. (Note, Mark 7: 11, 12.)

SCOTT.

(9.) 'Jeremiah is omitted in two manuscripts of the twelfth century, in the Syriac, the Persian, and modern Greek versions, and in some later copies. What renders it likely that the original reading was by the prophet is, that Matthew frequently omits the name of the prophet in his quotations.'

4. The evidence; (v. 12.) He was accused of the chief priests. Pilate found no fault in Him; whatever was said, nothing was proved, and, therefore what was wanting in matter, they made up in noise and violence, and followed Him with accusations, the same they had given in before; as if by repetitions to force a belief on the governor.

5. The Prisoner's silence; He answered nothing, (1.) Because there was no occasion; nothing was alleged but what carried its own confutation along with it. (2.) He was now taken up with the great concern that lay between Him and his Father, to whom He was offering up Himself a sacrifice, to answer the demands of his justice. 3. His hour was come, and He submitted to his Father's will; Not as I will, but as Thou wilt. He knew what his Father's will was, and therefore silently committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously. We must not thus, by our silence, give away our lives, because we are not lords of our lives, as Christ was of his; nor can we know, as He did, when our hour is come. But hence we must learn, not to render railing for railing, 1 Pet. 2:23.

Now, [1.] Pilate pressed Him to make some reply, v. 13. What these things were, may be gathered from Luke 23:3, 5. and John 19:7. Pilate, having no malice against Him, was desirous He should clear Himself, urges Him to it, and believes He could do it; Hearst Thou not? Yes, He did hear; and still hears all that is witnessed unjustly against his truths and ways; but He keeps silence, because it is the day of his patience, and doth not answer, as He will shortly, Ps. 50:3. [2.] He wondered at his silence; which was not interpreted so much into contempt of the court, of himself. And therefore Pilate is not said to be angry, but to have marvelled greatly at it.

II. The outrage of the people, in pressing the governor to crucify Christ. The chief priests had a great interest in the people, who called them Rabbi, Rabbi, made idols of them, and oracles of all they said; and they made use of this, to incense them against Him, and by the power of the mob gained the point they could not otherwise carry. Here are two instances of their outrage.

1. Their preferring Barabbas before Him, and choosing to have him released rather than Jesus.

(1.) It seems, it was grown into a custom with the Roman governors, for the humoring of the Jews, to grace the passover with the release of a prisoner, v. 15. This, they thought, did honor to the feast, and was agreeable to the commemoration of their deliverance; but it was an invention of their own, and no divine institution; though some think that it was ancient, and kept up by the Jewish princes, before they became a province of the empire. However, it was a bad custom, an obstruction to justice, and an encouragement to wickedness. But our gospel-passover is celebrated with the release of prisoners, by Him who hath power on earth to forgive sins.

which bought the kingdom of heaven for us. But all this was as the Lord appointed; so the prophetic vision was, which typified this event, and so the event itself, as the other instances of Christ's sufferings, was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God.

V. 11-25. We have here,

1. The trial Christ had in the morning before Pilate, in his judgment-hall.

1. His arraignment; Jesus stood before the governor, as the prisoner before the judge. He was arraigned that we might be discharged. Some think that this bespeaks his courage and boldness; He stood undaunted, unmoved by all their rage. He thus stood in this judgment, that we might stand in God's judgment.

2. His indictment; Art thou the King of the Jews? The Jews thought that whoever was the Christ must be the king of the Jews, must deliver them from the Roman power, restore to them a temporal dominion, and enable them to trample on all their neighbors. Accordingly they accused our Lord Jesus, as making Himself king of the Jews, in opposition to the Roman yoke; whereas, though He said that He was the Christ, He meant not such a Christ as this. Note, Many oppose Christ's holy religion through a mistake of its nature; they dress it in false colors, and then fight against it. They assuring the governor, that, if He made Himself Christ, He made Himself king of the Jews, the governor takes it for granted, that He goes about to pervert the nation and subvert the government. Art thou a king? It was plain that He was not so actually. But dost thou lay any claim to the government, or pretend a right to rule the Jews? Note, Religion has often unjustly fallen under suspicion of the civil powers, as if it were hurtful to kings and provinces, whereas it tends mightily to the benefit of both.

3. His plea; Jesus said unto him, 'Thou sayest.' It is as thou sayest, though not as thou meanest: I am a King, but not such a King as thou dost suspect Me to be.

(2.) The prisoner put in competition with our Lord Jesus, was Barabbas, here called a notable prisoner; (v. 16.) either because, by birth and breeding, he was of some note and quality, or because he had signalized himself by something remarkable in his crimes; whether he was so notable as to recommend himself the more to the favor of the people, and so the more likely to be interceded for, or whether so notable as to make himself more liable to their rage, is uncertain. Some think the latter, and therefore Pilate mentioned him, as taking it for granted that they would have desired any one's release rather than his. Treason, murder, and felony, are the three most enormous crimes that are usually punished by the sword of justice; and Barabbas was guilty of all three, Luke 23:19. John 18:40.

(3.) The proposal was made by Pilate, the governor, v. 17. It is probable the judge had the nomination of two, one of which the people were to choose. Pilate proposed Jesus; but would have Him released by the people's election, so he hoped to satisfy both his own conscience, and the people too; whereas, finding no fault in Him, he ought not to have put Him on the country, or brought Him into the peril of his life. But such little tricks and artifices as these, to trim the matter, and to keep in with conscience and the world too, are the common practice of those that seek more to please men than God. What shall I do, said Pilate, with Jesus, who is called Christ? He puts the people in mind, that Jesus was looked on by some as the Messiah, and had given pregnant proofs of it; 'Do not reject one, of whom your nation has professed such an expectation.'

The reason why Pilate labored thus to get Jesus discharged, was, because he knew that for envy the chief priests had delivered Him up; (v. 13.) that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, that provoked them. When David was envied by Saul, he was the darling of the people; and any one that heard the hosannas with which Christ was but a few days ago brought into Jerusalem, would have thought He had been so, and that Pilate might safely have referred this matter to the commonalty, especially when so notorious a rogue was set up, as a rival with Him for their favor. But it proved otherwise.

(4.) While Pilate was thus laboring the matter, he was confirmed in his unwillingness to condemn Jesus, by a message sent him from his wife, (v. 19.) by way of caution. Probably, this message was delivered to Pilate publicly, in the hearing of all that were present, for it was intended to be a warning not to him only, but to the prosecutors. Observe.

[1.] The special providence of God, in sending this dream to Pilate's wife; it is not likely that she had heard any thing before, concerning Christ, so as to occasion her dreaming of him, but it was immediately from God: perhaps she was one of the devout and honorable women, and had some sense of religion; yet God revealed Himself by dreams to some that had not, as to Nebuchadnezzar. She suffered many things in this dream; whether she dreamed of the cruel usage of an innocent person, or of the judgments that would fall on those that had any hand in his death, or both, it seems it was a frightful dream, and her thoughts troubled her, as Dan. 2:1. 4:5. Note, The Father of spirits has many ways of access to the spirits of men, and can seal their instruction in a dream, or vision of the night, Job 33:15. Yet, to those who have the written word, God more ordinarily speaks by conscience on a waking bed, than by dreams, when deep sleep falls upon men.

[2.] The tenderness and care of Pilate's wife in sending this caution to her husband; Have nothing to do with that just Man. 1st. This was an honorable testimony to our Lord; when his friends were afraid to appear in defence of Him, God made even strangers and enemies

16 And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas.

17 Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, ^b Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, ^c or Jesus which is called Christ?

18 For ^d he knew that for envy they had delivered him.

to the soul. We are not told how Pilate turned this off, probably with a jest; but, by his proceeding against this just man, it appears that he did not regard it. Thus faithful admonitions are made light of, when given as warnings against sin, but will not be so easily made light of, when reflected on as aggravations of sin.

(5.) The chief priests and elders were busy, all this while, to influence the people in favor of Barabbas, v. 20. They persuaded the multitude, both by themselves and their emissaries, that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus; suggesting that this Jesus was a deceiver, in league with Satan, an enemy to their church and temple; that, if He were let alone, the Romans would come, and take away their place and nation; that Barabbas, though a bad man, yet, not having the interest Jesus had, could not do so much mischief. Thus they managed the mob, who otherwise were well affected to Jesus, and would never have done such a preposterous thing as to prefer Barabbas. Here, [1.] We cannot but look on these wicked priests with indignation; in matters of controversy between blood and blood, the people were to be guided by the priests, Deut. 17:8. This great power they wretchedly abused, and caused the people to err. [2.] We cannot but look on the deluded people with pity; I have compassion on the multitude, to see them hurried thus violently to so great wickedness, to see them thus falling into the ditch with their blind leaders.

(6.) Being thus overruled, at length they made their choice, v. 21. Pilate hoped he had gained his point, to have Jesus released. But, to his great surprise, they said, Barabbas; as if he less deserved to die, better deserved to live. The cry for Barabbas was so universal, that there was no color to demand a poll between the candidates. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and thou, earth, be horribly afraid! Were ever men, that pretended to reason or religion, guilty of such prodigious madness, such horrid wickedness! This was what Peter charged on them; (Acts 3:14.) Ye desired a murderer to be granted you; yet multitudes who choose the world, rather than God, for their ruler and portion, thus choose their own delusions.

2. Their pressing earnestly to have Jesus crucified, v. 22, 23. Pilate, amazed at their choice of Barabbas, was willing to hope that it was rather from a fondness for him, than from an enmity to Jesus; and therefore he puts it to them, 'What shall I do then with Jesus? Shall I release Him likewise, for the greater honor of your feast, or will you leave it to me?' No, they all said, Let Him be crucified. That death they desired He might die, because it was looked upon as the most ignominious; and they hoped thereby to make his followers ashamed to own Him, and their relation to Him. It was absurd for them to prescribe to the judge what sentence he should pass; but their malice and rage made them forget all rules of order and decency, and turned a court of justice into a riotous, tumultuous, and seditious assembly. Now was truth fallen in the street, and equity could not enter; where one looked for judgment, behold oppression, the worst kind of oppression; for righteousness, behold, a cry, the worst cry that ever was, Crucify, crucify the Lord of glory. Though they that cried thus, perhaps, were not the same persons that the other day had cried Hosanna, yet see what a change was made on the mind of the populace in a little time: when He rode in triumph into Jerusalem, so general were the acclamations of praise, that one would have thought He had no enemies; but now, when He was led in triumph to Pilate's judgment-seat, so general were the outcries of enmity, that one would think He had no friends. Such revolutions are there in this changeable world, through which our way to heaven lies, as our Master's did, by honor and dishonor, by evil report, and good report, counterchanged; (2 Cor. 6:8.) that we may not be lifted up by honor, as if, when we were applauded and caressed, we had made our nest among the stars, and should die in it; nor yet be dejected or discouraged by dishonor, as if, when we were despised and trampled on, we were trodden to the lowest hell, from which there is no redemption. You observe those who applaud you, either they are all your enemies, or, which is equivalent, they may become so. Seneca, de Vita Beat.

Now, as to this demand, we are further told,

(1.) How Pilate objected against it; Why, what evil has He done? A proper question to ask before we censure any in common discourse, much more for a judge to ask before he pass a sentence of death. Note, It is much for the honor of the Lord Jesus, that, though He suffered as an evil-doer, yet neither his judge nor his prosecutors could find that He had done any evil. This repeated assertion of his unspotted innocence, plainly intimates that He died to satisfy for the sins of others; for, if it had not been for our transgressions that He was thus wounded, and for our offences that he was delivered up, and that on his own voluntary undertaking to atone for them; I see not how these extraordinary sufferings of a person that had never thought, said, or done, any thing amiss, could be reconciled with the justice and equity of that Providence that governs the world, and at least permitted this to be done.

(2.) How they insisted on it; They cried out the more, Let Him be crucified. They do not show any evil He had done, but, right or wrong, He must be crucified. They resolved to make up in clamor, what was wanting in evidence.

III. Here is the devolving of the guilt of Christ's blood on the people and priests.

1. Pilate endeavors to transfer it from himself, v. 24.

(1.) He sees it to no purpose to contend. What he said, [1.] Would do no good; he could prevail nothing; he could not convince them what an unjust, unreasonable thing it was, for him to condemn a man whom he believed innocent, and whom they could not prove guilty. Nay, [2.] It was more likely to do hurt: He saw that rather a tumult was made; and this turbulent, tumultuous temper of the Jews, by which Pilate was awed to condemn Christ against his conscience, contributed more than any thing to the ruin of that nation not long after; for their frequent insurrections provoked the Romans to destroy them, though they had reduced them, and their inveterate quarrels among themselves made them an easy prey to the common enemy. Thus their sin was their ruin.

Observe how easily we may be mistaken in the inclination of the common people; the priests were apprehensive that their endeavors to seize Christ would have caused an uproar, especially on the feast day; but it proved that Pilate's endeavor to save Him caused an uproar, and that on the feast day; so uncertain are the sentiments of the crowd.

(2.) This puts him in a great strait, betwixt the peace of his own mind, and the peace of the city; he is loath to condemn an innocent man, and yet loath to disoblige the people. Had he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11-18. Alas! how often is Barabbas preferred to Jesus! When sinners reject his salvator, that they may retain their darling sins, they repeat the disgraceful transaction: when the society of pious ministers and Christians is forsaken, or the company of profligates and infidels, the preference is of the same nature: and indeed we are all apt, in some instances and in some measure, to prefer the friendship, and interest of the evil world, to the commands, glory, and approbation of the Son of God.—But we must also remember, that He was wounded for our transgressions: in this sense, we are all chargeable with the guilt of his crucifixion; and our sins were as the scourge, the thorns, and the nails, by which He suffered.

When his disciples act inconsistently with their character, and cause his enemies to revile or deride, they then deliver up the blessed Jesus to be again mocked, spit on, crowned with thorns, and loaded with every indignity; whilst they who treat his followers with cruelty and contempt, act over again the part of the Roman soldiers, and the Jewish rulers and people; and when professed Christians openly apostatize, they crucify the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame.—Embittered persecutors are often so hurried away by furious zeal, that even infidels can discern the malignant principles by which they are actuated; and the people of God may expect more favor from the most avowed profligates, than from hypocrites.

SCOTT.

19 'When he was set down on the judgment-seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him.'

20 But the chief priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus

21 The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? They said, Barabbas.

22 Pilate saith unto them, 'What shall I do then with Jesus, which is called Christ? They all say unto him, Let him be crucified.'

23 And the governor said, 'Why, what evil hath he done?' But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified.

24 When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of steadily and resolutely adhered to the sacred laws of justice, as a judge ought, he had not seen in any perplexity; the matter was plain and past dispute, that a man, in whom was found no fault, ought not to be crucified on any pretence whatsoever, nor must an unjust thing be done, to gratify any man, or company of men, in the world; the cause is soon decided; Let justice be done, though heaven and earth come together. If wickedness proceed from the wicked, though they be priests, yet my hand shall not be on them.

(3.) Pilate thinks to trim the matter, and to pacify both the people and his own conscience too, by doing it, and yet disowning it, acting the thing, and yet acquitting himself from it at the same time. Such absurdities and self-contradictions do they run on, whose convictions are strong, but their corruptions stronger. Happy is he (saith the apostle, Rom. 14: 22.) that condemneth not himself in that thing which he allows; or, which is all one, that allows not himself in that thing which he condemns.

Now Pilate endeavors to clear himself. [1.] By a sign; he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude; as if he had said, 'If it be done, bear witness that it is none of my doing.' He borrowed the ceremony from that law, which appointed it to be used for the clearing of the country from the guilt of an undiscovered murder; (Deut. 21: 6, 7.) and he used it, the more to affect the people with the conviction he was under of the prisoner's innocence; and, probably, such was the noise of the rabble, that, if he had not used some surprising sign, in the view of them all, he could not have been heard.

[2.] By a saying; in which, First, He clears himself; I am innocent of the blood of this just person. What nonsense to condemn Him, and yet protest that he is innocent of his blood! For men to protest against a thing, and yet to practise it, is only to proclaim that they sin against their consciences. Though Pilate professed his innocence, God charges him with guilt, Acts 4: 27. Some think to justify themselves, by pleading that their hands were not in the sin; but David kills by the sword of the elders of Jezreel. Pilate here thinks to justify himself, by pleading that his heart was not in the action; but this is an averment which will never be admitted. In vain does he protest against the deed, which at the same time he perpetrates. Secondly, He cast it on the priests and people; 'See ye to it; if it must be done, I cannot help it, do you answer it before God and the world.' Note, Many flatter themselves that they shall bear no blame, if they can but find any to lay the blame on; but it is not so easy a thing to transfer the guilt of sin, as many think it is. The condition of him, that is infected with the plague, is not the less dangerous for his catching the infection from others, or communicating it to others; we may be tempted to sin, but cannot be forced. The priests threw it on Judas. See thou to it; and now Pilate throws it on them; See ye to it; for with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you.

2. The priests and people consented to take the guilt on themselves; they all said, 'His blood be on us and on our children.' They saw that the dread of guilt made Pilate hesitate, and that he was getting over his difficulty by a fancy of transferring it; to prevent the return of his hesitation, and to confirm him in that fancy, they, in the heat of their rage, agreed to it, rather than lose the prey they had in their hands, and cried, His blood be on us. Now,

(1.) By this they designed to indemnify Pilate, that is, to make him think himself indemnified, by becoming bound to divine justice to save him harmless. But those that are themselves bankrupts and beggars, will never be admitted security for others, nor taken as a bail for them. None could bear the sin of others, except He that had none of his own to answer for; it is a bold undertaking, and too big for any creature, to become bound for a sinner to Almighty God.

(2.) But they did really imprecate wrath and vengeance on themselves and their posterity. What a desperate word was this, and how little did they think what was its direful import, or to what an abyss of misery it would bring them, and theirs! Christ had lately told them, that on them would come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from that of the righteous Abel but, as if that were too little, they here imprecate on themselves the guilt of that blood, which was more precious than all the rest, and the guilt of which would lie heavier. On the daring presumption of wilful sinners, that run upon God, upon his neck, and defy his justice! John 15: 25, 26. Observe,

[1.] How cruel they were in their imprecation. They imprecated the punishment of this sin, not only on themselves, but on their children too, even those yet unborn, without so much as limiting the entail of the curse, as God Himself had been pleased to limit it, to the third and fourth generation. This was madness and the height of barbarity. Surely they were like the ostrich: they were hardened against their young ones, as though they were not theirs. What a dreadful conveyance was this of guilt and wrath to them and their heirs forever, and this by joint consent, as their own act and deed; amounting to a forfeiture and defeasance of that ancient charter, I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed. Their entailing the curse of the Messiah's blood on their nation, cut off the entail of the blessings of that blood from their families, that, according to another promise made to Abraham, in him all the families of the earth might be blessed. See what enemies wicked men are to their own children and families; those that damn their own souls, care not how many they take to hell with them.

[2.] How righteous God was, in his retribution

On other occasions, the condemnation of any Jew, not a slave, to this ignominious and cruel death, would have hazarded an insurrection; but the people had been disappointed in their expectations of a temporal kingdom; and many of them seem to have thought, that the Messiah of Jesus' character was worthy only of contempt and crucifixion. It has, however, often excited wonder, that the multitude, who but a short time before had welcomed Him with loud Hosannas, as the 'Son of David' and 'the King of Israel,' (See 21:8-11.) and who so much favored his cause, as to render the rulers afraid of openly proceeding against Him, should all at once be induced to demand his crucifixion with irresistible vehemence. Many, who before led the people and favored the cause of Christ, intimidated by late events, had no doubt retired; others were disappointed because He would not assume temporal dominion, and raise an army to liberate them from the Romans; and several persons who had been driven away by the popular torrent in his favor when He entered Jerusalem, no doubt at this time came forward, attended by emissaries from the scribes and priests. And those who remember, that in every multitude thus collected, 'the most part know not wherefore they are come together,' will readily perceive that a small company of considerable persons (a hundred out of ten thousand,) eager on the contrary part, and skilful in exciting men's passions and prejudices, would soon give a new direction to the populace; and that the change, from Hosanna to Crucify, was not materially different from other changes, which varying circumstances have made in large companies promiscuously assembled. (Marg. Ref. 2. 1.—Acte 19: 23-31.)

Verses 24, 25.

Pilate's struggle on this occasion shows the power of conscience in the worst of men; and the horror which it often feels, (till injured to it,) of the wilful, deliberate murder. The whole process rambled the examination of a sacrifice, that might be proved to be without blemish, far more than the trial of a criminal for condemnation; and it is unprecedented in the annals of mankind, for a person condemned to so dreadful a death, to have been at the very time pronounced 'innocent,' or righteous, by the person who conducted those that apprehended Him; (2. 3.) by the judge who passed sentence on Him, and at length by the very officer who superintended his execution, (2. 54.) whilst they who clamorously demanded his death, could allege no reason for their conduct. No doubt, God providentially ordered all these circumstances, to make it evident that Jesus suffered for no fault of his own, but merely for the sins of his people. They put Jesus to death when the nation 'was assembled for the same purpose, Titus shut them up within the walls of Jerusalem.' The rejection of the true Messiah was their crime; and the following of false Messiahs to their destruction was their punishment. They bought Jesus as a slave, and they themselves were afterwards sold and bought as slaves, at the lowest prices. They put Jesus to death, lest the Romans 'should come and take away their place and nation;' and the Romans did come and take away their place and nation. And, what is still more striking, and still more strongly marks the judgment of God upon them, they were punished with 'that very kind of death which they were so eager to inflict on the Savior of mankind, the death of the cross; and that in such prodigious numbers, that Josephus assures us, there wanted word for crosses, and room to place them in.' 28 Jesus was scourged; this was an ignominious, cruel punishment, especially as inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings above forty stripes. Thus the Scripture was fulfilled, The ploughers ploughed on my back, (Ps. 129:3.) I gave my back to the smiters, (Isa. 50:6.) and, By his stripes we are healed, Isa. 53:5. He was chastised with whips, that we might not be forever chastised with scorpions.

3. He was then delivered to be crucified; though his chastisement was in order to our peace, yet there is no peace made but by the blood of his cross; (Col. 1:20,) therefore the scourging is not enough, He must be crucified; a kind of death used only among the Romans, and such as seems to be the result of wit and cruelty in combination, each putting forth itself to the utmost, to make death in the highest degree terrible and miserable. A cross was set up in the ground, to which the hands and feet were nailed, on which nails the weight of the body hung, till it died of the pain. This was the death to which Christ was condemned, that He might answer the type of the brazen serpent lifted up on a pole. It was a bloody death, a painful, according to this imprecation; they said, His blood be on us, and on our children; and God said, Amen, so shall thy doom be; as they loved cursing, so it came on them. The wretched remains of that abandoned people feel it to this day; from the time they imprecated this blood on them, they were followed with one judgment after another, till they were quite laid waste, and made an astonishment, a hissing, and a hy-word; yet on some of them, and some of theirs, this blood came, not to condemn them, but to save them; divine mercy, on their repenting and believing, cut off this entail, and then the promise was again to them, and to their children. God is better to us and ours than we are.

V. 26—32. In these verses, we have the preparations for the crucifixion.

I. Here is,

1. The sentence passed, and the warrant signed for execution; and this immediately, the same hour.

1. Barabbas was released, that notorious criminal: had he not been put in competition with Christ, it is probable he had died for his crimes; but that proved the means of his escape; to intimate that Christ was condemned for this purpose, that sinners, even the chief of sinners, might be released: the common instance of Divine Providence is, that the wicked is a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright, Prov. 21:18. 11:18. In this unparalleled instance of divine grace, the upright is a ransom for the transgressors, the just for the unjust.

2. Jesus was scourged; this was an ignominious, cruel punishment, especially as inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings above forty stripes. Thus the Scripture was fulfilled, The ploughers ploughed on my back, (Ps. 129:3.) I gave my back to the smiters, (Isa. 50:6.) and, By his stripes we are healed, Isa. 53:5. He was chastised with whips, that we might not be forever chastised with scorpions.

V. 19—25. The warnings God sends to deter men from wickedness, will eventually leave many of them the more inexcusable; but what will be the guilt and condemnation of those, who use authority, influence and ingenuity, to set men against the Gospel, and thus ruin multitudes of immortal souls!—Various and irrational are the means, by which men seek impunity in acting contrary to their own consciences: they sometimes plead necessity or compulsion, when nothing but unbelief, fear of man, and regard to worldly interest, compel them; and they often throw the blame on others, vainly hoping to have the pleasure or advantage of iniquity themselves, and to leave the punishment to be suffered by their tempters. But all the water in the ocean cannot wash away the guilt of murder from those rulers, who, even reluctantly, permit innocent blood to be shed for political purposes, as it is their bounden duty, at all hazards, to protect the oppressed.—Such as are bent on evil, are commonly most clamorous when their conduct is most unreasonable: persecutors are generally most ready to call for the instruments of torture or death, when it is inquired, 'What evil have these persons done?' and in every case, when arguments are wanting, men are prone to abound in vociferation, in order to silence both their opponents and their own consciences. But, who can reflect without terror at the awful imprecation of the Jewish multitude, and its tremendous accomplishment! Yet there is mercy in reserve for a remnant of that nation: let us then pray for them, that at length they may look to Him whom they have pierced, and mourn for their sins, in true repentance and with living faith. (Zech. 12:9—14, v. 13.)—All, however, who delight in anathemas and imprecations, will find that they rebound upon themselves. SCOTT.

BURDER.

The Jewish rulers, by using their influence in preserving a murderer from death, took an effectual method of bringing the vengeance of God on the land; though not so effectual, as by crucifying the Son of God. (Notes, 11—18, v. 16, 17. Num. 35:31—34. Mark 15:6—10, v. 7. Luke 23:21—25, v. 25.) John expressly mentions Christ's being scourged, and crowned with thorns, before Pilate finally passed sentence on Him; it is therefore conjectured, that He had been scourged some time before, by orders from Pilate, in hopes that this disgrace and torture would have appeased the rage of the multitude, or softened them into compassion, and so have made way for his release. It is well known, that the Romans used to scourge malefactors, just before they were crucified; 'as if the exquisite tortures of crucifixion were not sufficient, without adding to them those of the scourge.' Bp. Porcius. Possibly, the scourging might be twice repeated; but it is more probable, that Matthew and Mark introduced this account, not in the exact order of time in which it occurred. It is at least evident, that Pilate made an effort to save Jesus, after He had been scourged and crowned with thorns; and perhaps the soldiers, after sentence was finally passed, carried still further the indignities they had before committed. (Marg. Ref. r.—John 19:1—7. Scarlet or purple robe.) We may form some conception of this scene, if we consider the haughtiness, and impiety of the idolatrous Roman soldiers; and how they were let loose on the mild and holy Jesus, to give full scope to their savage and cruel contempt, and to divert themselves with his sufferings, till they were even weary of mocking Him. Had He suffered as a murderer, they would not have thus insulted Him, but would have in some measure pitied his anguish, whilst they executed the sentence of the law upon him. Another meaning has been sought out for the word rendered thorns, as if bearsfoot, or some inoffensive vegetable, was intended. This criticism, however, has been proved, by the most competent scholars, wholly untenable. But why should the peculiar reed or plant, of which the contemptuous crown was made, be especially noted, if this had not been a circumstance particularly marking the cruelty of our Lord's enemies, and the variety and intenseness of his sufferings? SCOTT.

(26.) Scourged. 'The scourge was composed of flagella, which were extremely sharp, mostly interwoven with sheep-bones, sometimes composed of ox-nerves, and hence termed by Horace, "horrible." Such scourging preceded the capital punishment of slaves: rods were used with the free.'

(27.) Common hall. 'Rather, Prætorium, a magnificent edifice in the upper part of the city, which had been formerly Herod's palace, and from which there was an approach to the citadel Antonia, which adjoined to the temple. This the Roman procurators (whose ordinary residence was at Cæsarea) occupied, when at Jerusalem. In front of this edifice was the tribunal. Jesus was first led to the interior part of the prætorium, namely the aula, an open court.'

28 And they ^astripped him, and put on him a scarlet robe.

29 And when they had ^aplatted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head, and a reed in his right hand; and they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, ^aHail, king of the Jews!

30 And ^athey spit upon him, and took the reed, and smote him on the head.

31 And after that they had mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, ^aand led him away to crucify him.

32 And ^aas they came out, ^bthey found a man of ^cCyrene, Simon by name, whom they compelled to bear his cross.

33 And when they were come unto a place called ^dGolgotha, that is to say, A place of a skull, 34 They ^agave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall; and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink.

35 And ^athey crucified him, and ^aparted his garments, casting lots: ^bthat it might be fulfilled which was their houses to be places of abuse to any, nor their servants to make sport with the sins, or miseries, or religion, of others.

2. Who were concerned in it; the whole band; the whole regiment, at least five hundred, some think twelve or thirteen hundred. If Christ was thus made a Spectacle, let none of his followers think it strange to be so used, 1 Cor. 4: 9. Heb. 10: 33.

3. What particular indignities were done Him.

(1.) They stripped Him, v. 28. The shame of nakedness came in with sin; (Gen. 3: 7.) and therefore Christ, when He came to satisfy for sin, and take it away, was made naked, and submitted to that shame, that He might prepare for us while raiment to cover us, Rev. 3: 18.

(2.) They put on Him a scarlet robe, some old red cloak, such as the Roman soldiers wore, in imitation of the scarlet robes which kings and emperors wore; thus upbraiding Him with his being called a king. This was only to expose Him to the spectators, as the more ridiculous; yet there was something of mystery in it: this was He that was red in his apparel, (Isa. 63: 1, 2.) that washed his garments in wine; (Gen. 49: 10.) therefore He was dressed in a scarlet robe. Our sins were as scarlet and crimson. Christ being clad in a scarlet robe, signified his bearing our sins, to his shame, in his own body on the tree; that we might wash our robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb.

(3.) They platted a crown of thorns, and put it upon his head, v. 29. This was to carry on the humor of making Him a mock king; yet, had they intended it only for a reproach, they might have platted a crown of straw, or rushes, but they designed it to be painful to Him, and to be literally, what crowns are said to be figuratively; but there was a mystery in it. [1.] Thorns came in with sin, and were part of the curse that was the product of sin, Gen. 3: 18.

Therefore Christ, being made a Curse for us, and dying to remove the curse from us, felt the pain and smart of those thorns, nay, and binds them as a crown to Him; (Job 31: 36.) for his sufferings for us were his glory. [2.] Now He answered to the type of Abraham's ram that was caught in the thicket, and so offered up instead of Isaac, Gen. 22: 13. [3.] Thorns signify afflictions, 2 Chron. 33: 11. These Christ put into a crown; so much did He alter the property of them to them that are his, and give them cause to glory in tribulation, and made it to work for them a weight of glory. [4.] It was the custom of some heathen nations, to bring their sacrifices to the altars, crowned with garlands; these thorns were the garlands with which this great Sacrifice was crowned.

[5.] These thorns, it is likely, fetched blood from his blessed head, which trickled down his face, like the precious ointment, (typifying the blood of Christ, with which He consecrated Himself) on the head, which ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, Ps. 133: 2.

Thus, when He came to espouse to Himself his love, his dove, his undefiled church, his head was filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night, Cant. 5: 2.

(4.) They put a reed in his right hand; this was intended for a mock sceptre, another of the insignia of the majesty they jeered Him with; as if this were a sceptre good enough for such a King, as was like a reed shaken with the wind; (ch. 11: 7.) like sceptre, like kingdom, both weak and wavering, and withering and worthless but they were quite mistaken, for his throne is forever and ever, and the sceptre of his kingdom is a right sceptre, Ps. 45: 6.

(5.) They bowed the knee before Him, and mocked Him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! Having made Him a sham king, they thus made a jest of doing homage to Him, thus ridiculing his pretensions to sovereignty, as Joseph's brethren; (Gen. 37: 8.) Shall thou indeed reign over us? But as they were afterward compelled to do obeisance to him, and fulfil his dreams, so these here bowed the knee, in scorn to Him, who was, soon after this, exalted to the right hand of God, that at his name every knee might bow, or break, before Him; it is ill jesting with that which, sooner or later will come in earnest.

(6.) They spit upon Him; thus He had been abused in the high priest's hall, ch. 26: 27. In doing homage, the subject kissed the sovereign, in token of his allegiance; thus Samuel kissed Saul, and we are bid to kiss the Son; but they in this mock-homage, instead of kissing Him, spit in his face; that blessed face which outshines the sun, and before which the angels cover theirs, was thus polluted. It is strange that the sons of men should ever do such a piece of villany, and that the Son of God should ever suffer such a piece of ignominy.

(7.) They took the reed, and smote Him on the head. That which they had made the mock-ensign of his royalty, they now make the real instrument of their cruelty, and his pain. They smote Him, it is probable, on the crown of thorns. Thus was He despised and rejected of men; a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. All this misery and shame He underwent, that He might purchase for us everlasting life, and joy, and glory.

III. The conveying of Him to the place of execution. After they had mocked and abused Him, as long as they thought fit, they then took the robe off from Him, to signify their divesting Him of all the kingly authority they had invested Him with, by putting it on Him; and they put his own raiment on Him, because that was to fall to the soldiers' share, that were employed in the execution. No mention is made of their taking off the crown of thorns, whence it is commonly supposed (though there is no certainty of it) that He was crucified with that on his head; for as He is a Priest on his throne, so He was a King on his cross. And here,

1. They led Him away to be crucified; He was led as a Lamb to the slaughter, as a Sacrifice to the altar. They led Him away out of the city; for Christ, that He might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate, (Heb. 13: 12.) as if He, that was the Glory of them that waited for redemption in Jerusalem, were not worthy to live among them. To this He Himself had an eye, when in the Parable He spake of his being cast out of the vineyard, ch. 21: 39.

2. They compelled Simon of Cyrene to bear his cross, v. 30. It seems, at first He carried the cross Himself, as Isaac the wood for the burnt-offering which was to burn him. And this was intended, as other things, both for pain and shame to Him. But after a while they took the cross off from Him, either,

(28.) Stripped Him.] 'The person subjected to this punishment, [crucifixion] was deprived of all his clothes, excepting something around his loins. In this state He was beaten, sometimes with rods, but more generally with whips. Such was the severity of this flagellation, that numbers died under it. Jesus was crowned with thorns, and made the subject of mocking, but insults of this kind were not among the ordinary attendants of crucifixion.'

(29.) Of thorns.] 'It is taken not only for thorns but likewise for briars and brambles, and any thing that hath pricks.' Leigh, in Scott.

Verse 34. It was customary to give those who were about to suffer this lingering and most painful death, a potion to numb their feelings, composed of wine mingled with myrrh or spices; and some compassionate persons seem to have prepared this cordial, which they offered to Jesus; but He would not taste it, as his purpose was to suffer death in all its bitterness. Others, full of contempt and malignity, had mingled 'vinegar with gall,' to render it most nauseous, and offered it to Him instead of 'the spiced wine, which, having tasted, He refused to drink' and thus a ancient prophecy of the Messiah was literally fulfilled. Note, Ps.

69: 21.) Those learned men who labor to prove that 'the vinegar mingled with gall' was in fact the same as 'the wine mingled with myrrh,' mentioned by Mark, seem to have forgotten this remarkable prophecy. (Marg. Ref. e.—Mark 15: 21—24, v. 23.) Scott

Verse 35. The soldiers next proceeded to crucify Jesus. The foot of the cross going into a hole made for that purpose, with a violent jerk, often dislocated some of the bones of the crucified person; who, being suspended in this dreadful posture, hung in most exquisite torture, till at length loss of blood and excessive pain ended his life. It is plain, that Jesus hung in this manner for six hours before He expired; yet it was thought wonderful that He ^{did so soon} as many lived a whole day and night in this anguish, ^{and as some method were taken to shorten their pains.} Scott Him we are called to; for those only shall reign with Him that suffer with Him; shall sit with Him in his kingdom, that drink of his cup, and are baptized with his baptism.

V. 38-49. We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place.

1. They came to Golgotha, adjoining to Jerusalem, probably the common place of execution; where criminals were sacrificed to the justice of the government. There was our Lord Jesus sacrificed to the justice of God. Some think it is called the place of a skull, because it was the common charnel-house, where bones and skulls were laid together out of the way, lest people should touch them, and be defiled thereby.

2. There they crucified Him, (v. 35.) nailed his hands and feet to the cross, and then reared it up, and Him hanging on it; for so the manner of the Romans was to crucify. Let our hearts be touched with the feeling of that exquisite pain which our blessed Savior now endured, and let us look on Him who was thus pierced, and mourn. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? And, when we behold what manner of death He died, let us in that behalf with what manner of love He loved us.

II The barbarous and abusive treatment they gave Him. As if death, so great a death, were not bad enough, they contrived to add to the bitterness and terror of it.

1. By the drink provided for Him before He was nailed to the cross, v. 34. It was usual to have a cup of spiced wine for those to drink of, that were to be put to death, according to Solomon's direction, (Prov. 31: 6, 7.) Give strong drink to him that is ready to perish; but this was with mingled wormwood and gall, to make it sour and bitter. This signified, (1.) The sin of man, which is a root of bitterness, bearing gall and wormwood, Deut. 29: 18. The sinner perhaps rolls it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, but to God it is grapes of gall, Deut. 32: 32. It was so to the Lord Jesus, when He bore our sins, and sooner or later it will be so to the sinner himself, Eccl. 7: 26. (2.) It signified the wrath of God, that cup which his Father put into his hand, a bitter cup indeed, like the bitter water which caused the curse, Num. 5: 13. This they offered Him, as was literally foretold, Ps. 69: 21. And, [1.] He tasted thereof, He let no bitter cup go by Him untasted, when He was making atonement for all our sinful tasting of forbidden fruit; now He was tasting death in its full bitterness. [2.] He would not drink it, because He would have nothing like an opiate, to lessen his sense of pain, for He would die so as to feel Himself die, because He had so much work to do, as our High Priest.

2. By the dividing of his garments, v. 35. When they nailed Him to the cross, they stripped Him at least of his upper garments; thus He purchased for us white raiment to cover us made naked by sin. If we be at any time stripped of our comforts for Christ, let us bear it patiently. He was stripped for us. Enemies may strip us of our clothes, but cannot of our best comforts, our garments of praise. The clothes of those that are executed are the executioner's fee: four soldiers were employed in crucifying Christ, and they must each of them have a share: his upper garment, if it were divided, would be of no use to any of them, and therefore they agreed to cast lots for it. (1.) Some think the garment was so fine and rich, that it was worth contending for; but that agreed not with the poverty Christ appeared in. (2.) Perhaps they had heard of those that had been cured by touching the hem of his garment, and they thought it valuable for some magic virtue in it. Or, (3.) They hoped to get money of his friends for such a sacred relic. Or, (4.) They would seem in derision to put a value on it, as a royal clothing. Or, (5.) It was for diversion; to pass away the time while they waited for his death; but, whatever they designed, the word of God is herein accomplished; (Ps. 22: 13.) they parted my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture. This was never true of David, but looks primarily at Christ, of whom David, in spirit, spake. Then is the offence of this part of the cross ceased; for it appears to have been by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God. Christ stripped Himself of his glories, to divide them among us.

They now sat down and watched Him, v. 36. The chief priests were careful, no doubt, in setting this guard, lest the people, whom they stood still in awe of, should rise, and rescue Him. But providence so ordered it, that those who were appointed to watch Him, thereby became unexceptionable witnesses for Him; having the opportunity to see and hear that which extorted from them that noble confession, (v. 54.) Truly this was the Son of God.

3. By the title set up over his head, v. 37. It was usual, for the vindicating of public justice, and putting the greater shame on malefactors that were executed, not only by a cry to proclaim before them, but by a writing also over their heads to notify, what was the crime for which they suffered; so they set up over Christ's head his accusation written, to give public notice of the charge against Him: This is Jesus the King of the Jews. This they designed for his reproach, but God overruled it to his honor. For, (1.) Here was no crime alleged against Him. It is not said that He was a pretended Savior, or a usurping King, though they would have it thought so; (John 19: 21.) but, This is Jesus, a Savior; surely that was no crime; and, This is the King of the Jews; nor was that a crime; for they expected that the Messiah should be so: so that, his enemies themselves being judges, He did no evil. Nay, (2.) Here was a very glorious truth asserted concerning Him—that He is Jesus the King of the Jews, that King whom the Jews expected, and ought to have submitted to; so that his accusation amounts to this, That He was the true Messiah and Savior of the world; as Balaam, when he was sent for to curse Israel, blessed them altogether, and that three times, (Num. 24: 10.) so Pilate, instead of accusing Christ as a criminal, proclaimed Him a King, and that three times, in three inscriptions. Thus God makes men to serve his purposes, quite beyond their own.

4. By his companions with Him in suffering, v. 38. There were two thieves crucified with Him at the same time, in the same place, under the same guard; two highwaymen, or robbers on the road, as the word properly signifies. It is probable that this was appointed to be execution-day; and therefore they hurried the prosecution of Christ in the morning, that they might have Him ready to be executed with the other criminals. Some think that Pilate ordered it thus, that this piece of necessary justice, in executing these thieves, might atone for his injustice in condemning Christ; others that the Jews contrived in it, to add to the ignominy of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus; however it was, the scripture was fulfilled in it, (Isa. 52: 12.) He was numbered with the transgressors.

(1.) It was a reproach to Him, that He was crucified with them; as if He had been a partaker with them in their sins; for He was made sin for us, and took on Him the likeness of sinful flesh. He was, at his death, numbered among the transgressors, and had his lot with the wicked, that we, at our death, might be numbered among the saints, and have our lot among the chosen.

(2.) It was an additional reproach, that He was crucified in the midst, between them, as if He had been the worst of the three, the principal malefactor. It was also intended to ruffle and discompose Him, in his last moments, with the shrieks, and groans, and blasphemies, of these malefactors, who, it is likely, made a hideous outcry when they were nailed to the cross; but thus would Christ affect Himself with the miseries of sinners, when He was suffering for their salvation. Some of Christ's apostles were afterward crucified, Peter, and Andrew, but none of them were crucified with Him, lest it should have looked as if they had been joint-under-takers with Him, in satisfying for man's sin, and joint-purchasers of life and 40 And ^{saying}, Thou ^{that} destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. ^{If} thou beest the Son of God, ^{come down from the cross}.

41 Likewise also the chief priests, mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, 42 He ^{said} others, himself he cannot save. If he be ^{the} King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him.

up a good opinion of persons against. Every one is apt to say that which is in an ill name. The Roman rabble fluctuate with a man's fluctuating fortunes, and fail not to depress those that are sinking. Juv.

[2.] The gesture they used, in contempt of Him—wagging their heads; which signifies their triumph in his fall, and their insulting over Him, Isa. 37: 22. Jer. 18: 16. Lam. 2: 15. The language of it was, Aha, so would we have it, Ps. 35: 25. This very gesture was prophesied of; (Ps. 22: 8.) They shake the head at me. And Ps. 109: 25.

[3.] The taunts and jeers they uttered.

1st. They upbraided Him with his destroying of the temple. Though the judges themselves were sensible that what He had said of that was misrepresented, (as appears, Mark 14: 59.) yet they industriously spread it among the people, to bring an odium on Him, that He had a design to destroy the temple; than which nothing would more incense the people against Him. Thou that destroyest the temple, that vast and strong fabric, try thy strength now in plucking up that cross, and drawing those nails, and so save Thyself; if Thou hast the power Thou hast boasted of, this is a proper time to exert it, and give proof of it; for it is supposed that every man will do his utmost to save himself.¹ This made the cross of Christ such a stumbling-block to the Jews, that they looked upon it to be inconsistent with the power of the Messiah; He was crucified in weakness, (2 Cor. 13: 4.) so it seemed to them; but indeed Christ crucified is the Power of God.

2dly. They upbraided Him with his saying that He was the Son of God; If Thou be so, come down from the cross; and renewing the assault, (ch. 4: 3-6.) If Thou beest the Son of God, &c. They think that now, or never, He must prove Himself to be the Son of God; forgetting that He had proved it by the miracles He wrought; and unwilling to wait for the complete proof of it by his resurrection, to which He had so often referred; which, if they had observed it, would have anticipated the offence of the cross. This comes of judging things by the present aspect of them, without a due remembrance of what is past, and a patient expectation of what may further be produced.

(2.) The church-rulers and state-rulers mocked Him, v. 41. They did not think it enough to invite the rabble to do it, but did it in their own proper persons. They should have been in the temple at their devotion, for it was the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, when there was to be a holy convocation; (Lev. 23: 7) but they were here at the place of execution, spitting their venom at the Lord Jesus. How much below the grandeur and gravity of their character! Could any thing tend more to make them contemptible and base before the people? One would have thought, that common prudence should have taught them to keep as much as might be behind the curtain; and nothing is too mean for malice. Did they disparage themselves thus, to despise to Christ, and shall we be afraid of disparaging ourselves, by joining with the multitude to do Him honor, and not rather say, If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile?

We may challenge universal history to furnish another instance, in which any person, expiring under the tortures of a cruel execution, was treated with such derision, contempt, and mockery, by all ranks and orders of men, and even by one at least of his fellow-sufferers. This was reserved for the holy Jesus, 'the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his Person.' 'God manifest in the flesh.' This transaction is a full demonstration of apostate man's rancorous

Two things the priests and elders upbraided Him with:

[1.] That He could not save Himself, v. 42. He had been before abused in his prophetic and kingly office, and He now is in his priestly. 1st. They take it for granted He could not save Himself, and therefore had not the power He pretended to, when really He would not save Himself, because He would die to save us. They should have argued, 'He saved others, therefore He could save Himself, and if He do not, it is for some good reason.' But 2dly. They would insinuate, that, because He did not now save Himself, therefore all his pretence to save others was but sham and delusion; though the truth of his miracles was demonstrated beyond contradiction. 3dly. They upbraided Him with being the King of Israel. They dreamed of the external pomp and power of the Messiah, and therefore thought the cross altogether disagreeable to the King of Israel, and inconsistent with that character. Many people could like the King of Israel well enough, if He would but come down from the cross, if they could have his kingdom without the tribulation through which they must enter into it. But the matter is settled; if no cross, then no Christ, no crown. Those that would reign with Him must be willing to suffer with Him. 4thly. They challenged Him to come down from the cross. And what had become of us then, and the work of our redemption and salvation? If He had been provoked by these scoffs to come down from the cross, and so have left his undertaking unfinished, we had been forever undone. But his unchangeable love and resolution fortified Him against this temptation, so that He did not fail, nor was discouraged. 5thly. They promised, that, if He would come down from the cross, they would believe Him. Let Him give them that proof of his being the Messiah, and they will own Him to be so. When they had formerly demanded a sign, He told them that the sign He would give them should be, not his coming down from the cross, but, his coming up from the grave, which they had not patience to wait for. If He had come down from the cross, they might with as much reason have said that the soldiers had juggled in nailing Him to it, as they said, when He was raised from the dead, that the disciples came by night, and stole Him away. But to promise ourselves that we would believe, if we had such means and motives of faith as we ourselves would prescribe, when we do not improve what God has appointed, is not only a gross instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts, but the sorry subterfuge of an obstinate, destroying infidelity.

[2.] That God, his Father, would not save Him; (v. 43.) He trusted in God, that is, He pretended to do so; for He said, I am the Son of God. Those who call God Father, and themselves his children, profess to put confidence in Him, Ps. 9: 10. Now they suggest, that He did but deceive Himself and others in his claims of Sonship; for, if He had been the Son of God, (as Job's friends argued concerning Him,) He would not have been abandoned to all this misery, much less in it. This was a sword in his bones, which David complains; (Ps. 42: 10.) a two-edged sword, intended, 1st. To vilify Him, and make the standers-by think Him a deceiver and an impostor; as if his saying, that He was the Son of God, were now effectually disproved. 2dly. To terrify Him, and drive Him to distrust his Father's power and love; which, some think, He feared, religiously feared, prayed against, and was delivered from, Heb. 5: 7. David complained more of the endeavors of his persecutors to shake his faith, and drive him from his hope in God, than of their attempts to shake his throne, and drive him from his kingdom: their saying, there is enmity to the holy image, truth, and law of his Creator; and a sufficient confutation of all the flattering representations of those who know more of every thing, than of God and of themselves. Indeed prophets and martyrs, who were renewed to some measure of the same image, and stood up for the same truths, always met with an adequate portion of the same treatment; but it has been confined to them, and malefactors have almost universally been exempted from it. Scott

III. We have here the frowns of Heaven, which our Lord Jesus was under, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities from men. Concerning which, observe,

1. How this was signified—by an extraordinary and miraculous eclipse of the sun, which continued for three hours, v. 45. There was darkness over all the earth; so most interpreters understand it, though our translation confines it to that land. Some of the ancients appealed to the annals of the nation concerning this extraordinary eclipse at the death of Christ, as a thing well known, and which gave notice to those parts of the world of something great then doing; as the sun's going back in Hezekiah's time did. It is reported that Dionysius, a Heliopolis in Egypt, took notice of this darkness, and said, Either the God of nature is suffering, or the machine of the world is tumbling into ruin. An extraordinary light gave intelligence of the birth of Christ, (ch. 2:2.) and therefore it was proper that an extraordinary darkness should notify his death, for He is the Light of the world. The indignities done to our Lord Jesus made the heavens astonished. This amazing darkness was designed to stop the mouths of those blasphemers who were reviling Christ as He hung on the cross; and it should seem that, for the present, it struck such terror upon them, that though their hearts were not changed, yet they were silent, and stood doubting what this should mean, till after three hours the darkness scattered, and then, (as appears by v. 47.) like Pharaoh, when the plague was over, they hardened their hearts. But that which was principally intended in this darkness, was, (1.) Christ's present conflict with the powers of darkness. Now the prince and the rulers of the darkness of this world, were to be cast out, spoiled, and vanquished on their own ground. (2.) His present want of heavenly comforts; that dark cloud which the human soul of our Lord Jesus was now under. God makes his sun to shine on the just and on the unjust, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; but when Christ was made Sin for us, because now his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and the cup of divine displeasure was filled to Him without mixture, even the light of the sun was suspended. When earth denied Him a drop of cold water, heaven denied Him a beam of light; being to deliver us from utter darkness, He Himself, in the depth of his sufferings, walked in darkness, and had no light, Isa. 50:10. During the three hours this darkness continued, we do not find that He said one word, but passed this time in silent retirement in his own soul, now in agony, wrestling with the powers of darkness, and taking in the impressions of his Father's displeasure, not against Himself, but the sin of man, which He was now making his soul an offering for. Never

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 26-44. We are prone to complain under injuries, and even to retort or retaliate on those who offend us: but the Savior endured the most complicated indignities and cruelties, without a murmur, an angry word, or a menace! In the meekness and dignity of heavenly wisdom, He heard unmoved the false accusations with which He was pursued; the preference given to a murderer before Him; the ungrateful people, whose diseases He had healed, and whose wants He had supplied, demanding his crucifixion; the iniquitous sentence passed on Him; and the sarcasms and cruel derision of the soldiers, the people, the rulers, and even of the malefactors. Without the least impatience, He suffered his body to be torn with the scourge, his head to be wounded with the thorns, and his hands and feet to be pierced; and thus He met the horrors of the most excruciating death, and the shame of being numbered among the worst of criminals, with the most entire resignation to his Father's will, the most ardent love and zeal for his glory, and the deepest compassion even for his cruel murderers. He was also as much superior to fear, as to anger or impatience; and He supported his sufferings with a demeanor equally distant from levity, and from sullen affectation of insensibility: so that all which has been admired in the death of heroes or philosophers, is no more comparable to the setting of this 'Sun of Righteousness,' than the glimmering taper is to the clear light of day.—But let us especially consider this conduct of the Savior as our pattern; and recollect that all our fretfulness, peevishness, bitterness and despondency, are indeed acts of rebellion, which could not have been pardoned, but through the shedding of his precious blood. Let us remember, that we are called to do good, and suffer evil, in this present world; let us keep a guard over our spirits, and at the door of our lips, when we are injured, insulted and afflicted; let us consider how 'light our afflictions' are, and how mixed with consolations, when compared with those of our divine Surety; and never expect or desire kind usage from such characters, as 'crucified the Lord of glory.'

It is here supposed, and will hereafter be shown, that Christ was nailed to the cross at 'the third hour,' or by nine o'clock in the morning; but this darkness did not begin before the sixth hour, or noon; and it lasted in the ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. As the moon was then at the full, it could not be an eclipse from a natural cause; and probably it reached no further than the Holy Land, at least the language of the evangelists implies no more. (Notes, Mark 15: 25, 33.) Some infidels have greatly exulted, because Josephus and the pagan writers have not mentioned this phenomenon; but none have attempted to deny it, and every writer notices and records only what he sees proper. Josephus and the pagan authors were, in general, as little disposed to bear a favorable testimony to Christianity, as modern infidels are: the former could not but have heard of it, and his silence may be considered as the effect of his inability to deny the fact, and his unwillingness to admit the proper conclusion; but heathen authors would probably treat the report with contempt and neglect, as unworthy of regard. It deserves notice, that all the evangelists record the scoffs and insults of the spectators, before they mention this darkness, which, it is probable, for the time alarmed and silenced them. Many things have been conjectured concerning the intenseness of this gloom; but little can be known, probably it was neither so intense, nor so slight as different writers contending with each other, have represented.

sented it. There is no proof, that during it, Jesus saw and spoke to his mother and the apostle John, at a considerable distance, as some have supposed; for nothing appears from the narrative, why this might not take place either during the three hours which preceded the gloom, or just before Jesus expired, when it seems to have terminated. (See 50. John 19: 25-27.) We have, however, the testimony of three evangelists, authenticated by miracles and prophecy, that such a darkness took place; and may be sure it was sufficiently intense, to convince considerate persons, that it was an awful token of the wrath of God against the crucifiers of the holy Jesus.

(Ps. 22: 1.) The words are not exactly the same as they stand in the original of the psalm referred to, and are supposed to be quoted in the Syro-Chaldaic dialect; but the meaning is precisely the same. The doleful exclamation of Jesus showed that the total want of 'the light of God's countenance' on his soul, and the sense of his frowns and wrath against Him, as our Surety, were far more dreadful than all his complicated outward sufferings; that his confidence in his Father, treasured with his love, zeal, submission, and every holy affection, were exhausted and most perfectly gone, even in that dreadful hour; and that there was no cause in Him, why He should be thus forsaken, it being wholly through his willing answerableness for the sins of his people. (Marg. Ref. 26: 36-39. Mark 15: 34.)

SCOTT.

'From this and other passages it is collected, that Christ used the Hebrew-Syriac language, or rather the Hebrew-Chaldaic, which was then prevalent in Judea.'

ROSEN. in c. 26. v. 36.

47 Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias.

48 And straightway one of them ran, and took a sponge, and filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink.

49 The rest said, Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him.

50 Jesus, when he had cried again and were there three such hours since the day that God created man on the earth, never such a dark and awful scene; the crisis of man's redemption and salvation.

2. How He complained of it; (v. 46.) about the ninth hour, when it began to clear up, after a long and silent conflict, Jesus cried, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? The words are related in the Syriac tongue, in which they were spoken, because worthy of double remark, and for the sake of the perverse construction which his enemies put on them, in putting Elias for Eli. Now observe here,

(1.) Whence He borrowed this complaint—from Ps. 22: 1. It is not probable, (as some have thought) that He repeated the whole psalm; yet hereby He intimated that the whole was to be applied to Him. This, and that other word, Into thy hands I commit my spirit, He fetched from David's psalms, to teach us the use and benefit of the word of God in prayer.

(2.) How He uttered it—with a loud voice; which bespeaks the extremity of his pain and anguish, the strength of nature remaining in Him, and the great earnestness of his spirit in this expostulation. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, (Joel 3: 15, 16.) The sun and the moon shall be darkened. The Lord shall also roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem. David often speaks of his crying aloud in prayer. Ps. 55: 17.

(3.) What the complaint was—My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me? A strange complaint to come from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, who, we are sure, was God's elect, in whom his soul delighted, (Isa. 42: 1.) and in whom He was always well pleased. Surely, never sorrow was like unto that sorrow, which extorted such a complaint from one who, being perfectly free from sin, could never be a terror to Himself; but the heart knows its own bitterness. No wonder it made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks; for it is enough to make both the ears of every one that hears it, to tingle, and ought to be spoken of with great reverence.

Note, [1.] That our Lord Jesus was, in his sufferings, for a time, forsaken by his Father. So He saith Himself, who, we are sure, was under no mistake concerning his own case. Not that the union between the divine and human natures was weakened; no, He was now by the eternal Spirit offering Himself: nor as if there were any abatement of his Father's love to Him, or his to his Father; we are sure that there was on his mind no horror of God, nor any thing of the torments of hell; but his Father forsook Him; that is, first, He delivered Him up into the hands of his enemies, and did not appear to rescue Him. He let loose the powers of darkness against Him, and suffered them to do their worst, worse than against Job. Now was that Scripture fulfilled, (Job 16: 9.) God has turned Me over into the hands of the wicked; and no angel is sent from heaven to deliver, no friend on earth raised up to appear for Him. Secondly, He withdrew the present comfortable sense of his placency in Him. When his soul was first troubled, He had a voice from heaven to comfort Him; (John 12: 27, 28.) in his agony in the garden, there appeared an angel from heaven, strengthening Him; but now He had neither. Thirdly, He let out upon his soul an afflicting sense of his wrath against man for sin. Christ was made Sin for us, a Curse for us; and therefore, though God loved Him as a Son, He frowned on Him as a Surety. These impressions He was pleased to admit, and to waive that resistance of them which He could have made: because He would accommodate Himself to this part of his undertaking, as He had done to all the rest.

[2.] That Christ's being forsaken of his Father, was the most grievous of his sufferings, and that which He complained most of. Here He laid the most doleful accents; He did not say, 'Why am I scourged?' And why spit on? And why nailed to the cross? But when his Father stood at a distance, He cried out thus; for this was it that put wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery. This brought the waters into the soul, Ps. 69: 1—3.

[3.] That our Lord Jesus, even when thus forsaken of his Father, kept hold of Him as his God; My God, my God, though forsaking Me, yet mine. Christ was God's servant in the work of redemption; to Him He was to make satisfaction, and by Him to be carried through and crowned, and on that account He calls Him his God; for He was now doing his will. See Isa. 49: 4, 9. This supported Him, that even in the depth of his sufferings God was his God, and this He resolves to keep fast hold of.

(4.) See how his enemies impudently ridiculed this complaint, v. 47. Some think this was the ignorant mistake of the Roman soldiers, who had heard talk of Elias, and of the Jews' expectation of his coming, but knew not the signification of Eli, Eli, and so made this blundering comment on these words of Christ, perhaps not hearing the latter part of what He said, for the noise of the people. Note, Many of the reproaches cast on the Word and people of God, rise from gross mistakes. Divine truths are often corrupted by ignorance of the language and style of the Scripture. Those that hear by halves, pervert what they hear. Others think it was the wilful mistake of some of the Jews, who knew what He said, but were disposed to abuse Him, and misrepresent Him as one who, being forsaken of God, was driven to trust in creatures; perhaps hinting also, that He who had pretended to be Himself the Messiah, would now be glad to be beholden to Elias, who was expected to be only forerunner of the Messiah. Note, It is no new thing for the most pious devotions of the best men to be ridiculed by scoffers; nor are we to think it strange, if what is well said, in praying and preaching, be misconstrued, and turned to our reproach; Christ's words were so, though He spake as never man spake.

IV. The comfort his enemies administered. 1. Some gave Him vinegar to drink; (v. 48.) instead of some cordial to refresh Him under this heavy burthen, they tantalized Him with that which did not only add to the reproach they were loading Him with, but did too sensibly represent that cup of trembling which his Father had put into his hand. One of them ran to fetch it, seeming to be officious to Him, but really glad of an opportunity to abuse and affront Him, and afraid lest any one should take it out of his hands.

2. Others, with the same purpose of disturbing and abusing Him, refer him to Elias; (v. 49.) 'Come, let Him alone, his case is desperate, neither heaven nor earth can help Him; let us do nothing either to hasten his death, or to retard it; He has appealed to Elias, and to Elias let Him go.'

V. 50—56. Here is an account of the death of Christ.

1. The manner how He breathed his last; (v. 50.) between the third and the sixth hour, that is, between nine and twelve o'clock, as we reckon. He was nailed to the cross, and soon after the ninth hour, that is, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, He died. That was the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and the time when the paschal lamb was killed, and Christ, our Passover, is sacrificed for us, and offered Himself in the evening of the world a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savor. It was at that time of the day, that the angel Gabriel delivered to Daniel that glorious prediction of the Messiah Dan. 9: 21, 22. And some think that from that very time when the angel spake it, to this time when Christ died, was just seventy weeks, that is four hundred and ninety years, to a day, to an hour; as the departure of Israel out of Egypt was at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day, Exod. 12: 41.

Two things are here noted.

1. That He cried with a loud voice, as before, v. 46.

(1.) This was a sign, that, after all his pains and fatigues, his life was whole in Him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails. But Christ, just before He expired, spake like a man in his full strength, to show that his life was not forced from Him, but was freely delivered by Him into his Father's hands, as his own act and deed, and to show that by the eternal Spirit He offered Himself, being the Priest as well as the Sacrifice, He cried with a loud voice.

(2.) It was significant. He was now spoiling principalities and powers, and in this loud voice He did, as it were, shout for mastery, as one mighty to save, Isa. 63: 1. Compare with this, Isa. 42: 13, 14. His crying with a loud voice, signified that his death should be published to all the world; all mankind being concerned in it, and obliged to take notice of it. Christ's loud cry was like a trumpet blown over the sacrifices.

Verses 47—49.

Some supposed He called on Elias to come and rescue Him: for as Elias was to be the forerunner of the Messiah, they probably thought He meant thus to assert his claim to that character, even to the last. Marg. Ref. d) About the same time He also said, 'I thirst.' being parched through excess of anguish and torture; and, as a vessel stood filled with vinegar, (which being mixed with water, was commonly drunk by the Roman soldiers,) one of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and putting it on a reed, or a stalk of hyssop, reached it to Him that He might drink.

Verses 50.

Perhaps the darkness continued nearly to the time when Jesus said 'It is finished'; and then the darkness and horror seem to have been removed also from his mind; and an inexpressible joy in the sense of his Father's love, the near approach of his glory, and the blessed effects of his sufferings, to have filled his soul. He therefore immediately after, 'cried out with a loud voice, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' His soul could have left the body, at the very beginning of his lingering agonies, had He so pleased, as these were necessary only for the expiation of our sins. This view of the case sugloud voice yielded up the ghost.

[Practical Observations.]

51 And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent, 20:29. Ps. 22:14, 15. Is. 53:9-12. Dr. 1: 9, 26. John 10:11, 15. Heb. 2: 14. 9:14. Ek. 26:31-37. 40:21. Lev. 16:2, 11-15. 9 Chr. 3:14. Mark. 15:33. Luke 23:45. Eph. 2:13-18. Heb. 6:19, 20. 10:19-22. 28:22. Ps. 18:7, 15. Mic. 1:3, 4. Nah. 1:13-5. Heb. 3:13. Heb. 12:25-27. Rev. 11:13, 19.

and on a solemn day, when the priests were officiating in the temple, and might themselves be eye-witnesses of it, the veil of the temple was rent by an invisible power; that veil which parted between the holy place and the most holy. They had condemned Him for saying, I will destroy this temple, understanding it literally; now, by this specimen of his power, He let them know that, if He had pleased, He could have made his words good. In this, as in others of Christ's miracles, there was a mystery.

(1.) It was in correspondence with the temple of Christ's body, which was now in the dissolving; when Christ cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost, and so dissolved that temple, the literal temple did, as it were, echo to that cry, and answer by rending its veil. Note, Death is the rending of the veil of flesh which interposes between us and the holy of holies; the death of Christ was so, the death of true Christians is so.

(2.) It signified the revealing and unfolding of the mysteries of the Old Testament. The veil of the temple was for concealment, as that on the face of Moses, therefore it was called the veil of the covering; for it was highly penal for any person to see the furniture of the most holy place, except the high priest, and he but once a year, with great ceremony, and through a cloud of smoke; all which signified the darkness of that dispensation, 2 Cor. 3: 13. But now, all was laid open. Now we see that the mercy-seat signified Christ, the great Propitiation; the pot of manna, Christ the Bread of life. Thus we all, with open face, behold as in a glass, (which helps the sight, as the veil hindered it,) the glory of the Lord. Our eyes see the salvation.

(3.) It signified the uniting of Jew and Gentile, by the removing of the partition-wall between them. Christ, in his death, repealed the ceremonial law, and, by abolishing those institutions, abolished the enmity, and made in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace, Eph. 2: 14-16. Christ died, to rend all dividing veils, and to make all his one, John 17: 21.

(4.) It signified the consecrating and laying open of a new and living way to God. The veil kept people off from drawing near to the most holy place, where the Shekinah was. But the rending of it signified that Christ, by his death, opened a way to God, [1.] For Himself. This was the great day of atonement, when our Lord Jesus, as the great High Priest, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, entered once for all into the holy place; in token of which the veil was rent, Heb. 9: 7, &c. Having offered his sacrifice in the outer court, the blood of it was now to be sprinkled on the mercy-seat within the veil, wherefore lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; for the King of glory, the Priest of glory, shall come in. Now was He caused to draw near, and made to approach, Jer. 30: 21. Though He did not personally ascend into the holy place not mad with hands, till above forty days after, yet He immediately acquired a right to enter, and had a virtual admission. [2.] For us in Him: so the apostle applies it, Heb. 10: 19, 20. We have boldness to enter into the holiest, by that new and living way which He has consecrated for us through the veil. He died, to bring us to God, and, in order thereunto, to rend that veil of guilt and wrath which interposed between us and Him, to take away the cherubim and flaming sword, and to open the way to the tree of life. We have free access through Christ to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, now, and to the throne of glory hereafter, Heb. 4: 16. 6: 16. The rending of the veil signified, (as that ancient hymn excellently expresseth it,) that, when Christ had overcome the sharpness of death, He opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Nothing can obstruct or discourage our access to heaven, for the veil is rent; a door is opened in heaven, Rev. 4: 1.

2. The earth did quake; not only mount Calvary, where Christ was crucified, but the whole land, and the adjacent countries. This earthquake signified two things.

(1.) The horrible wickedness of Christ's crucifiers. Never did the whole creation before groan under such a burthen, as the Son of God crucified, and the guilty wretches that crucified Him. The earth quaked, as if it feared to open its mouth to receive the blood of Christ, so much more precious than that of Abel, which it had received, and was cursed for it, Gen. 4: 11, 12. When the prophet would express God's great displeasure against the wickedness of the wicked, He asks, Shall not the land tremble for this? Amos 8: 8.

(2.) The glorious achievements of Christ's cross, the mighty shock, nay, the fatal blow, now given to the devil's kingdom. So vigorous was the assault that (as of old, when He went out of Seir, when He marched through the field of Edom) the earth trembled, Judg. 5: 4. Ps. 68: 7, 8. God shakes all nations, when the Desire of all nations is to come; and there is a yet once more, which perhaps refers to this shaking, Hag. 2: 7, 21.

3. The rocks rent; the firmest part of the earth was made to feel this mighty shock; pro-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 45-50. Our blessed Redeemer endured all his sufferings in silent submission: but the frown and wrath of the Father, which He bare for our sins, extorted the doleful exclamation, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?'—What then will be the misery of those, who shall forever be forsaken by God, and sink under his wrath and absolute despair! The believer, who has tasted a few drops of the cup which the Savior drank off to the very dregs, in the garden and on the cross—who has lost for a season the comfort of communion with God, and dreads lest he should come finally short of his favor, and is oppressed with a sense of his displeasure—can frame some feeble conceptions on this awful subject. Thence he learns to estimate in some degree the immensity of the Savior's love; thence he acquires deeper convictions of the evil and desert of sin, and of his obligations to Him 'who hath delivered us from the wrath to come'; and thence he is led to consider the words, 'Depart from Me,' which unbelievers little regard or dread, as more tremendous than even the unquenchable fire prepared for the devil and his angels.—But, how must adoring angels have been filled with astonishment, when they witnessed their incarnate Lord and Creator thus despised and hated by sinful men! Nothing could more astonish these holy spectators, than the madness and wickedness of his foes; except it were his patience in bearing with them, when his frown must at once have sunk them into hell; his compassion for the souls of those who were by nature so deeply depraved, in thus agonizing and dying for them; and his power and grace, in thus triumphing over the prince of darkness, even in that deepest scene of his humiliation. Thus were the purposes and prophecies of God accomplished; thus was his 'law magnified,' his justice satisfied, and his holiness displayed; thus was the way opened for us sinners to 'the throne of grace' now, and to the kingdom of glory hereafter.

gests an illustration of the love of Christ manifested in his death, beyond what is commonly observed. Inasmuch as He did not use this power to quit his body, as soon as ever it was fastened to the cross, leaving only an insensible corpse to the cruelty of his murderers; but continued his abode in it with a steady resolution, as long as it was proper; and then retired from it, with a majesty and dignity never known, or to be known, in any other death: dying, if I may so express it, like 'the Prince of life.' VERSES 51-53.

Caaphas and the priests must have seen the veil which had been rent; yet this prodigy made no impression on their hardened hearts, any more than, the other events of that surprising day. This insensibility, amidst such astonishing miracles, appears to some persons almost incredible; and even beyond what human nature, depraved as it is, seems capable of. But it should be considered, that the most alarming and amazing scenes gradually lose their effect on the mind, when persons become familiar with them. Men live among the dead and dying, often without terror or relection; and in an age when miracles were frequently wrought, many spectators would by habit grow familiar with them, as men do with scenes of carnage and dissolution; especially, when the astonishment, at first excited by witnessing a miracle, was attended by a conviction, which was resisted with deep aversion, and when every subsequent miracle was followed by a similar process. The minds of those who thus 'rebelled against the light,' would of course be employed, with all the ingenuity they possessed, in accounting for the wonderful events, without owing the hand of God in them, or the conclusion to be drawn from them, in favor of the Teacher whose doctrines condemned their conduct, and was contrary to their prejudices, and their ambition, avarice, and wickedness. Thus the heart and conscience would gradually become more and more callous as if 'seared with a hot iron'; and God in awful justice would obdurate rebels up to judicial hardness and a blindness.

power of the Lord Jesus, and went into Jerusalem, the holy city, and appeared unto many. Now here,

(1.) We may raise many inquiries concerning it, which we cannot resolve; as, [1.] Who these saints were, that did arise. Some think, the ancient patriarchs, from reference to whom, Christ had lately proved the doctrine of the resurrection, ch. 22: 32. Others, modern saints, such as had seen Christ in the flesh, but died before Him; as his father Joseph, Zecharias, Simeon, John Baptist, and others, that had been known to the disciples, while they lived, and therefore were the fitter to be witnesses to them in an apparition after. What if we should suppose that they were the martyrs, who in the Old-Testament times had sealed the truths of God with their blood, that were thus dignified and distinguished? Christ particularly points at them as his forerunners, ch. 23: 35. And we find (Rev. 20: 4, 5.) that those who were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, rose before the rest of the dead. Sufferers with Christ shall first reign with Him. [2.] It is uncertain whether (as some think) they arose to life, now at the death of Christ, and disposed of themselves elsewhere, but did not go into the city till after his resurrection; or whether, (as others think,) though their sepulchres, (ch. 23: 29.) were shattered now by the earthquake, yet they did not revive and rise till after the resurrection; only, for brevity-sake, it is mentioned here, on the mention of the opening of the graves, which seems more probable. [3.] Some think that they arose only to bear witness of Christ's resurrection, and, having finished their testimony, retired to their graves again. But it is more agreeable both to Christ's honor and theirs, to suppose, though we cannot prove, that they arose as Christ did, to die no more, and therefore ascended with Him to glory. [4.] To whom they appeared; (not to all the people it is certain, but to many;) whether enemies or friends, in what manner they appeared, how often, what they said and did, and how they disappeared, are secret things which belong not to us; we must not covet to be wise above what is written: we have a more sure word of prophecy. See Luke 16: 31.

(2.) Yet we may learn many good lessons from it. [1.] That even those who lived and died before the death and resurrection of Christ, had saving benefit thereby, as well as those who have lived since; for He was the same yesterday that He is to-day, and will be forever, Heb. 13: 8. [2.] That Jesus Christ, by dying, conquered, disarmed, and disabled death. These saints that arose, were the present trophies of the victory of Christ's cross over the powers of death, which He thus made a show of openly. Having by death destroyed him that had the power of death, He thus led captivity captive, fulfilling that Scripture, I will ransom them from the power of the grave. [3.] That, in virtue of Christ's resurrection, the bodies of all the saints shall, in the fulness of time, rise again. This was an earnest of the general resurrection at the last day, when all that are in the graves, shall hear the voice of the Son of God. And perhaps Jerusalem is therefore called here the holy city, because the saints, at the general resurrection, shall enter into the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21: 2. [4.] That all the saints do, by the influence of Christ's death, and in conformity to it, rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. They are raised up with Him to a divine and spiritual life.

III. The conviction of his enemies that were employed in the execution, (v. 54.) which some make no less than another miracle, all things considered. Observe,

1. The persons convinced, v. 54. (1.) They were soldiers, whose profession is commonly hardening, and whose breasts are commonly not so susceptible as some others, of the impressions either of fear or pity. But there is no spirit too big, too bold, for the power of Christ to break and humble. (2.) They were Roman Gentiles, who knew not the Scriptures which were now fulfilled; yet they only were convinced. A sad presage of the blindness that should happen to Israel, when the Gospel should be sent to the Gentiles, to open their eyes. Here were the Gentiles softened, and the Jews hardened. (3.) They were the persecutors of Christ, and those that but just before had reviled Him, as appears, Luke 23: 36. How soon can God, by the power He has over men's consciences, alter their language, and fetch confessions of his truths, to his own glory, out of the mouths of those that have boasted nothing but threatenings, and slaughter, and blasphemies!

2. The means of their conviction; the perceived the earthquake, and saw the other things that were done. These were designed to assert the honor of Christ in his sufferings, and had their end in these soldiers, whatever they had on others. Note, The dreadful appearances of God in his providence, sometimes works strangely for the conviction and awakening of sinners.

3. The expressions of this conviction, in two things:

(1.) Their terror; they feared greatly; feared lest they should have been buried in the darkness, or swallowed up in the earthquake. Note, Guilt puts men in fear; whereas there are those who will not fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. 46: 1, 2.

(2.) The testimony extorted from them; Truly this was the Son of God; a noble confession. Peter was blessed for it, ch. 16: 16, 17. It was the great matter now in dispute, the point on which He and his enemies had joined issue, ch. 26: 63, 64. His disciples believed it, but at this time durst not confess it; our Savior Himself was tempted to question it, when He said, Why hast Thou forsaken Me? The Jews, now that He was dying on the cross, looked on it as plainly determined against Him, that He was not the Son of God, because He did not come down from the cross. And yet now this centurion and the soldiers make this voluntary confession. Note, God can maintain and assert the honor of a truth then, when it seems to be crushed; for great is the truth, and will prevail.

IV. The attendance of his friends, that were witnesses of his death, v. 55, 56. Observe,

1. Who they were; not his apostles, (only elsewhere we find John by the cross, John

Verse 54.

The wonderful events attending the crucifixion of Christ, with his mild and patient suffering, and the confidence with which He commended his departing soul into the hands of God, had a powerful effect on the minds of the Roman soldiers, though the Jewish rulers remained unimpressed. Only four soldiers were employed in nailing Jesus to the cross; but a considerable number, commanded by a centurion, watched Him whilst He hung there. These were alarmed at what they saw and heard, and glorified God, perhaps by confessing their guilt and deprecating his vengeance; and acknowledged, that 'Truly this was the Son of God.' It is not to be supposed, that the soldiers who joined with the centurion in this confession, who seem to have been the same as had crowned Jesus with thorns and mocked Him, should understand the full meaning of these words; yet we may reasonably conclude, that this conviction terminated in the conversion at least of some of them, and perhaps of the very persons who nailed Him to the cross; according to his prayer, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' (Luke 23: 34.) Some would interpret the words recorded by Matthew; 'Truly this was the Son of God,' by those of Luke, 'This was a righteous man.' But in fact that expression is explained by this; for as Jesus was crucified for saying that He was 'the Son of God'; so, if He was a righteous man and unjustly condemned, He must be 'the Son of God.' (Marg. Ref. r.) A son of a god, according to the notions of the pagans say some; but could the officers and soldiers who crucified Christ, be ignorant that He was put to death, for averting Himself to be 'the Son of God'? Surely then this supposed crime was referred to. He is condemned to death as a blasphemer, for saying, 'I am the Son of God'; but 'truly this was the Son of God.' (Mark 15: 39. Luke 23: 47.) The centurion could not fail to know the alleged blasphemy for which our Savior suffered; and had he intended, in heathen phraseology, to express his admiration of our Savior's conduct, he would not have used this expression. V. 57-66. We have here an account of Christ's burial, concerning which observe, 1. The kindness and good will of his friends. 2. The malice and ill will of his enemies.

I. His friends gave him a decent burial. Observe,

1. In general, Jesus Christ was buried; his body was deposited in the grave, that He might answer the type of Jonas, and fulfil the prophecy of Isaiah; He made his grave with the wicked. Thus in all things He must be made like unto his brethren, sin only excepted, and like us, to dust He must return. He was buried, to make his death the more certain, and his

19. 26.) their hearts failed them, they durst not appear, for fear of coming under the same condemnation. But here were a company of women, that boldly stuck to Christ, when the rest of his disciples had basely deserted Him. Note, Even those of the weaker sex are often, by the grace of God, made strong in faith, that Christ's strength may be made perfect in weakness. There have been women martyrs, famous for courage and resolution in Christ's cause. Now of these women it is said, (1.) That they had followed Jesus from Galilee, out of their great love to Him, and a desire to hear Him preach: otherwise, the males only were obliged to come up, to worship at the feast. Having followed Him such a long journey as from Galilee to Jerusalem, eighty or a hundred miles, they resolved not to forsake Him now. Note, Former services and sufferings for Christ should be an argument with us, faithfully to persevere to the end in attendance on Him, Gal. 3:3, 4. (2.) That they ministered to Him of their substance, for his necessary subsistence. How gladly would they have ministered to Him now, if they might have been admitted! But being forbidden that, they resolved to follow Him. When restrained from doing what we would, we must do what we can, in the service of Christ. Now He is in heaven, though out of the reach of our ministrations, He is not out of the reach of our believing views. (3.) Some of them are particularly named; for God will honor those that honor Christ. We have several times met with them before, and it was their praise, that we meet with them to the last.

2. What they did; they were beholding afar off.

(1.) They stood afar off; Good people, when they are in suffering, must not think it strange, if some of their best friends be shy of them. When Paul's danger was imminent, no man stood by him, 2 Tim. 4:16. If we be thus looked strangely upon, remember, our Master was so before us.

(2.) They were there beholding, in which they showed a concern and kindness for Christ; when debarr'd from any other office of love, they looked a look of love towards Him. [1.] It was a sorrowful look; they looked unto Him who was now pierced, and mourned; and, no doubt, were in bitterness for Him. We may well imagine how it cut them to the heart, to see Him in this torment; and what floods of tears it brought from their eyes. Let us with an eye of faith behold Christ and Him crucified, and be affected with that great love wherewith He loved us. But, [2.] It was no more than a look; they beheld Him, but they could not help Him. Note, When Christ was in his sufferings, the best of his friends were but lookers on, even the angelic guards stood trembling by, saith Mr. Norris; for He trod the vine-press alone, and of the people there was none with Him; so his own arm wrought salvation.

Joseph lived at Arimathea, or Ramah, the city of Samuel. (Marg. Ref. b.) He was a rich and honorable person; a counsellor, or member of the sanhedrim, and a pious man, who had not consented to the proceedings of the rulers against Jesus; for he probably absented himself when this was agitated, finding he could not make any effectual resistance. He also 'waited for the kingdom of God,' expecting the Messiah as a spiritual Redeemer, and he had secretly become a disciple of Jesus; but being timid, moving in a high rank in society, and knowing the malignity of the rulers, he had not openly confessed his faith. It pleased God to leave him thus far under the power of his unbelieving fears; because He intended him for a service from which he must have been precluded, if he had rendered himself obnoxious to the ruling powers. But when the courage of our Lord's stated followers failed them, he found himself animated to a more decided conduct; and his faith being originated by the circumstances attending the death of Christ, he determined no longer to conceal his opinion. He, resurrection the more illustrious: while the witnesses lay unburied, there were some hopes concerning them, Rev. 11:8. But Christ, the great Witness, is as one free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave. He was buried, that He might take off the terror of the grave, and make it easy to us, might warm and perfume that cold, noisome bed for us, and that we might be buried with Him.

2. The particular circumstances.

(1.) The time when He was buried; when the even was come; the same evening that He died, before sunset, as is usual in burying malefactors; not the next day, because it was the sabbath; for, burying the dead is not proper work either for a day of rest, or for a day of rejoicing, as the Sabbath is.

(2.) The person that took care of the funeral, Joseph of Arimathea. The apostles were all fled, and none of them appeared to show this respect to their Master, which the disciples of John shewed to him after he was beheaded, ch. 14:12. The women that followed Him, durst not move in it; then did God stir up this good man to do it; for Joseph was a fit man; for, [1.] He had wherewithal to do it, being a rich man. Most of Christ's disciples were poor men, such were most fit to go about the country to preach the Gospel; but here was one that was a rich man, ready to be employed in a piece of service which required a man of estate. Note, Worldly wealth, though to many an obstacle in religion's way, yet, in some services to be done for Christ, is an advantage and an opportunity, and it is well for those who have it, if withal they have a heart to use it for God's glory. [2.] He was well affected to our Lord Jesus, for he was himself his disciple, though he did not openly profess it. Note, Christ has more secret disciples than we are aware of; seven thousand in Israel, Rom. 11:4.

(3.) The grant of the dead body procured from Pilate, ch. 58. Joseph went to Pilate, who had the disposal of the body; for in things wherein the power of the magistrate is concerned, due regard must be had to that power. What good we do must be done peaceably, not tumultuously. Pilate was willing to give the body to one that would inter it decently, that he might do something towards atoning for the guilt his conscience charged him with, in condemning an innocent person. In Joseph's petition, and Pilate's ready grant of it, honor was done to Christ, and a testimony borne to his integrity.

(4.) The dressing of the body in grave-clothes; (v. 59.) though an honorable consecration, he himself took the body, as it should seem, from the tree; (Acts 13:29.) where there is true love to Christ, no service will be thought too mean to stoop to for Him. Having taken it, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth; burying in which, was then common. Note, Care is to be taken of the dead bodies of good men, a glory being intended for them at the resurrection, which we must hereby testify our belief of, and wind up the dead body, as designed for a better place. This common act of humanity, if done after a godly sort, may be made an acceptable piece of Christianity.

(5.) The depositing of it in the sepulchre, v. 60. Here was nothing of pomp and solemnity therefore, 'went boldly to Pilate,' and desired leave to take the body of Jesus, that he might give it an honorable interment; and that it might not be buried on the spot, as those of malefactors generally were. Accordingly, Pilate did not hesitate to order that the body should be delivered to Joseph, though he must have known that this would be highly displeasing to the Jewish rulers. Having obtained this permission, and being assisted by Nicodemus, Joseph took the body of Jesus from the cross, wrapped it in linen cloth, with myrrh, aloes, and other aromatics, and conveyed it into a new sepulchre prepared for himself, and situated in a garden near the spot. The interment of Christ was thus hastily performed, because the Sabbath was near; and probably Joseph and his friend proposed, afterwards, more carefully to embalm the body at the same time. Mary Magdalene and the other Mary before mentioned witnessed the transaction, and formed their plan for testifying their respect to the remains of their beloved and honored Master. (Marg. Ref. a, c, e—62-68. Mark 15:42-47. Luke 23:54-56. John 19:38-42.) This burial of Christ was an accomplishment of a remarkable prophecy; (Note, Is. 53:9, 10, v. 9.) and it is a way for the more complete proof of his resurrection.

All that day, Christ lay dead in the grave, on the seventh day He rested, and was refreshed; the chief priests and ty with the grandees of the world, v. 11: 32. A private funeral best befitted Him whose kingdom came not with observation.

[1.] He was laid in a borrowed tomb, in Joseph's burying-place; as if he had not a house of his own, while He lived, so He had not a grave of his own, when He was dead; yet in this there might be some-what of a mystery. The grave is the peculiar heritage of a sinner. Job 24: 19. There is nothing we can truly call our own but our sins and our graves; He returneth to his earth, Ps. 146: 4. When we go to the grave, we go to our own place; but our Lord Jesus, who had no sin of his own, had no grave of his own; dying under imputed sin, it was fit that He should be buried in a borrowed grave; the Jews designed that He should have made his grave with the wicked, with the thieves with whom he was crucified; but God overruled it, so that He should make it with the rich in his death, Isa. 53: 9.

[2.] He was laid in a new tomb, which Joseph, it is likely, designed for himself; it would, however, be never the worse, but a great deal the better for his lying in it, who was to rise so quickly, who has altered the property of the grave, and made it a bed of rest, nay, a bed of spices, for all the saints.

[3.] In a tomb hewn out in a rock; the ground about Jerusalem was generally rocky. Shebna had his sepulchre hewn out thereabouts in a rock, Isa. 22: 16. Providence ordered it that Christ's sepulchre should be in a solid, entire rock, that no room might be left to suspect his disciples had access to it by some under-ground passage, to steal the body; there was no access to it but by the door, which was watched.

[4.] A great stone was rolled to the door of his sepulchre, according to the custom of the Jews in burying their dead, as at the grave of Lazarus, John 11: 38. The rolling of the stone to the grave's mouth was, with them, as filling up the grave is with us, it completed the funeral. It is the most melancholy circumstance in the funerals of our Christian friends, when we have laid their bodies in the dark and silent grave, to go home, and leave them behind; but, alas, it is not we that go home, and leave them gone to the better home, and left us behind.

(6.) The company was very small and mean. Here were no relations in mourning, to follow the corpse, no formalities to grace the solemnity, but some good women that were true mourners, v. 55. These having attended Him to the cross, followed Him to the grave; as if they composed themselves to sorrow, they sat over against the sepulchre, not so much to fill their eyes with the sight of what was done, as to empty them in rivers of tears. Note, True love to Christ will carry us through, to the utmost, in following Him. Death itself cannot quench that divine fire, Cant. 8: 6, 7.

II. His enemies did what they could to prevent his resurrection; this was the next day that followed the day of the preparation, (v. 62.) the seventh day of the week, on the Jewish sabbath, yet not expressly called so, but described by this periphrasis, because it was now shortly to give way to the Christian Sabbath, which began the day after. All that day, Christ lay dead in the grave, on the seventh day He rested, and was refreshed; the chief priests and Pharisees, at the same time, dealing with Pilate about securing the sepulchre, and so adding rebellion to their sin. They that had so often quarrelled with Christ for works of the greatest mercy on that day, were themselves busied in a work of the greatest malice. Observe here,

(1.) Their address to Pilate; they were vexed that the body was given to one that would bury it decently; but, since it must be so, they desire a guard may be set on the sepulchre.

[1.] Their petition sets forth, that that deceiver (so they call Him who is Truth itself) had said, After three days I will rise again. He had said so, and his disciples remembered those very words, for the confirmation of their faith; as did his persecutors, for the provocation of their rage and malice. Thus the same word of Christ to the one was a savor of life unto life, to the other of death unto death. See how they compliment Pilate with the title of, Sir, while they reproach Christ with the title of deceiver. Thus the most malicious slanderers of good men are commonly the most sordid flatterers of great men.

[2.] It further sets forth their jealousy; lest his disciples come by night, and steal Him away, and say, He is risen.

1st. That which really they were afraid of, was, his resurrection; that which is most Christ's honor, and his people's joy, is most the terror of his enemies. So the chief priests and Pharisees labored to defeat the predictions of Christ's resurrection, saying, as David's enemies of him, (Ps. 41: 8.) Now that he lieth, he shall rise up no more; if He should rise, that would break all their measures. Perhaps the priests were surprised at the respect showed to Christ's dead body by Joseph and Nicodemus, two honorable counsellors, and looked upon it as an ill presage; nor can they forget his raising of Lazarus from the dead, which so confounded them.

2dly. What they feared was, lest his disciples should come by night, and steal Him away, which was a very improbable thing; for, 1. They had not the courage to own Him while He lived. 2. What could they promise themselves by stealing away his body, and making people believe He was risen; when, if He should not rise, and so prove Himself a deceiver, his disciples, who had left all for Him in this world, in dependence on a recompense in the other world, would of all people suffer most by the imposture, and be of all men the most miserable? The chief priests apprehend that if the doctrine of Christ's resurrection be once preached and believed, the last error will be worse than the first; a proverbial expression, intimating no more than this, that we shall all be routed, all undone. They think that it was their error, that they had so long connived at his preaching and miracles, which error they thought they had rectified by putting Him to death; but if people should be persuaded of his resurrection,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 51—60. As 'God spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him freely give us all things?' 'Hereby we know his love' to sinful men: may we then prove our love to Him, by crucifying our lusts, and resigning our dearest earthly comforts, at his word, for his glory, or in submission to his providence. In short, let us, not only 'afar off,' but as nearly and closely as we can, contemplate this affecting scene; that our hearts may be melted into godly sorrow, weaned from this world, encouraged in hope, animated by love, admiration and gratitude; that we may glory in his cross alone, and be induced to yield ourselves most willingly to his service.—The Lord has a chosen remnant among various descriptions of men: and, whilst we find a Judas among the apostles, and a Joseph in the Jewish sanhedrim, we should learn not to condemn whole societies for the crimes, or to sanction them for the good conduct, of an individual, or even of several individuals belonging to them.—The heart-searching Savior knows even his secret disciples; and though we must not excuse the timidity of such as, for a time, are afraid of confessing Him before his inveterate enemies, yet we should make allowances for difficult situations, and approve of conscientiousness and holy singularity, in men surrounded by the worst of examples: nor must we 'despise the day of small things.' But we should especially adore the mysteries of divine wisdom, in preparing men for particular services in the church; and the sovereign power of his grace, which sometimes gives courage to the fearful, when the most intrepid are intimidated. Thus He provides for the honor of his name and the support of his cause, and defeats the purposes of his most implacable and potent adversaries.—Let us then be willing to be accounted 'deceivers,' and to pass 'through evil report and good report,' as our Lord did: for if we be upright in the sight of God, all the suspicions and endeavors of men to disgrace us will tend to their confusion, and the manifestation of our integrity; even as the precautions of the Jewish rulers tended to prove the resurrection of Jesus, and to forward the success of the Gospel.

He had said repeatedly during his life-time, that He would rise again on the third day. This had always been in connection with predictions of his violent death; and the chief priests in fact had paid more attention to it than the disciples had done. (Marg. Ref. c.) As his friends therefore had been permitted to bury Him, the rulers desired that he would give orders to secure the sepulchre 'until the third day,' (which shows what they understood by the words, 'after three days;') lest his disciples should come in a clandestine manner, steal away the body, spread the report that He was risen, and thus seduce the people into a more fatal error than ever. The number of soldiers or guard is supposed to have been sixty. (28: 1—8, v. 4, 11—15.)

His own officer, of whom he would be apt to inquire how that just Man died, whom he had condemned with such reluctance; and that he gave him such an account of those things as made him conclude that truly He was the Son of God; and Pilate would give more credit to Him than to those spiteful priests that called Him a deceiver; and, if so, no marvel that He tacitly derides their project, in thinking to secure their sepulchre on Him who had so lately rent the rocks, and made the earth to quake. Tertullian, in speaking of Pilate, saith, In his conscience, he was a Christian; and it was possible he might be under such convictions at this time, on the centurion's report, and yet never be thoroughly persuaded, any more than Agrippa or Felix, to be a Christian.

(3.) The wonderful care they took, hereupon, to secure the sepulchre; (v. 66.) They sealed the stone; probably with the great seal of their sanhedrim, whereby they interposed their authority, for who durst break the public seal? But not trusting too much to that, withal they set a watch, to keep his disciples from coming to steal Him away, and, if possible, to hinder Him from coming out of the grave. So they intended, but God brought this good out of it, that they who were set to oppose his resurrection, thereby had an opportunity to observe it, and did so, and told the chief priests, who were thereby rendered the more inexcusable. Here was all the power of earth and hell combined to keep Christ a prisoner, but all in vain, when his hour was come; death, and all those sons and heirs of death, could then no longer have dominion over Him. To guard the sepulchre against the poor weak disciples was folly, because needless; but to think to guard it against the power of God, was folly, because fruitless, and to no purpose.

CHAP. XXVIII. v. 1—10. The resurrection of Christ being one of the main foundations of our religion, it is requisite we should have infallible proofs of it; four of which proofs we have in this chapter, which are but a few of many, for Luke and John give a larger account of them than Matthew and Mark do.

For the proof of Christ's resurrection, we have here the testimony of the angel, and of Christ Himself. We may think it would have been better, had a competent number of witnesses been present, and seen the stone rolled away by the angel, and the dead body reviving, as people saw Lazarus come out of the grave; but let us not prescribe to Infinite Wisdom, which ordered that the witnesses of his resurrection should see Him risen, but not see Him rise. His incarnation was a mystery; so was this second incarnation, (if we may so call it,) this new making of his body for his exalted state; it was therefore made in secret. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed. Christ gave such proofs of his resurrection as were corroborated by the Scriptures, and by the word He had spoken; (Luke 24: 6, 7, 44. Mark 16: 7.) for here we must walk by faith, not by sight. We have here, I. The coming of the good women to the sepulchre.

Observe, 1. When they came, v. 1. This fixes the time of Christ's resurrection.

(1.) He rose the third day after his death; the time He had often predicted. He was buried in the evening of the sixth day of the week, and arose in the morning of the first day of the following week, so that He lay in the grave about thirty-six or thirty-eight hours. He lay so long, to show that He was really and truly dead; and no longer, that He might not see corruption. He rose the third day, to answer the type of the prophet Jonas, (ch. 12: 40.) and to accomplish that prediction, (Hos. 6: 2.) The third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.

(2.) He arose after the Jewish Sabbath, the passover Sabbath; all that day He lay in the grave, to signify the abolishing of the Jewish feasts and the other parts of the ceremonial law, and that his people must be dead to such observances. Christ on the sixth day finished his work. He said, It is finished; on the seventh day He rested, and then on the first day of the next week did, as it were, begin a new world, and enter on new work. Let no man therefore judge us now in respect of the new moons, or of the Jewish Sabbaths, which were indeed a shadow of good things to come, but the substance is of Christ.

(3.) He rose on the first day of the week; on the first day of the first week, God commanded the light to shine out of darkness; on this day therefore did He, who was to be the Light of the world, shine out of the darkness of the grave; and the seventh-day Sabbath being buried with Christ, rose again in the first-day Sabbath, called the Lord's day, (Rev. 1: 10.) and no other day of the week is henceforward mentioned in all the New Testament than this, and this often, as the day which Christians religiously observed in solemn assemblies, to the honor of Christ. John 20: 19, 26. Acts 20: 7. 1 Cor. 16: 2. The Sabbath was instituted in remembrance of the perfecting of the work of creation. Gen. 2: 1.

(4.) He rose, as it began to dawn toward that day; as soon as it could be said that the third day was come, the time prefixed for his resurrection, He rose; after his withdrawals from his people, He returns with all convenient speed. He had said to his disciples, that though within a little while they should not see Him, yet again, a little while, and they should see Him, and accordingly He made it as little a while as possible. Isa. 54: 7, 8. Christ rose, when the day began to dawn, because then the day-spring from on high did again visit us, Luke 1: 78. Those who address themselves early in the morning to the religious services of the Christian Sabbath, therein follow this example of Christ, and that of David, Early will I seek Thee.

2. Who came to the sepulchre; Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, the same that attended the funeral, and sat over against the sepulchre, as before they sat over against the cross; still they studied to express their love to Christ, still they were inquiring after Him. Then shall we know, if we thus follow on to know. No mention is made of the virgin Mary being with them; it is probable that the beloved disciple, who had taken her to his own home, hindered her from going to the grave to weep there.

3. What they came to do: the other evangelists say they came to anoint the body; Matthew saith they came to see the sepulchre, whether it was as they left it; hearing perhaps, but not being sure, that the chief priests had set a guard on it. They went to show their good will in another visit, and perhaps not without some thoughts of their beloved Master's resurrection. Note, Visits to the grave are of great use to Christians, and will help to make it familiar to them, and to take off the terror of it, especially visits to the grave of our Lord Jesus, where we may see sin buried out of sight, the pattern of our sanctification, and the great proof of redeeming love shining illustriously even in that land of darkness.

II. The appearance of an angel of the Lord to them, v. 2—4. We have here an account of the manner of Christ's resurrection, as far as it was fit that we should know.

1. There was a great earthquake. When He died, the earth, that received Him, shook for loss; now that He rose, the earth, that resigned Him, leaped for joy in his exaltation. This earthquake loosened, as it were, the bond of death, shook off the fetters of the grave, and introduced the Desire of all nations. Hag. 2: 6, 7.

2. The angel of the Lord descended from heaven. The angels frequently attended our Lord Jesus, at his birth, in his temptation, in his agony; but on the cross we find no angel attending Him; when his Father sent Him,

3 His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow.

4 And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men.

5 And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified.

6 He is not here; for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay:

7 And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: To, I have told you.

the angel's withdrew from Him; but now that He is resuming the glory He had before the foundation of the world, now, behold, the angels of God worship Him.

3. He came, and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. He could have rolled back the stone Himself, but He chose to have it done by an angel, to signify, that, having undertaken to make satisfaction for our sin, imputed to Him, and being under arrest pursuant to that imputation, He did not break prison, but obtained his discharge from heaven, as He had made a full satisfaction; being delivered for our offences, He was raised again for our justification; He died to pay our debt, and rose again to take out our acquaintance: not that the angel raised Him from the dead, but thus he intimated the consent and joy of heaven in his release. The enemies of Christ had sealed the stone, resolving, like Balaam, not to open the house of the prisoner; shall the prey be taken from the mighty? For this was their hour; but all the powers of death and darkness are under the control of the God of life and light. An angel from heaven has power to break the seal, and roll away the stone. Thus the captives of the mighty are taken away. The angel's sitting on the stone, is observable, and bespeaks a secure triumph over all the obstructions of Christ's resurrection. The angel, having frightened away the enemies' guard, sat as a guard to the grave, expecting the women, and ready to give them an account of his resurrection.

4. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow, v. 3. This was a visible representation, by that which we call splendid and illustrious, of the glories of the invisible world, which know no difference of colors. His look upon the keepers was like flashes of lightning, he cast forth lightning, and scattered them. Ps. 144: 6. The whiteness of his raiment was an emblem not only of purity, but of joy and triumph. The glory of this angel represented the glory of Christ, to which He was now risen, for it is the same description that was given of Him in his transfiguration; (ch. 17: 2.) but when He conversed with his disciples after his resurrection, He drew a veil over the angels in their resurrection, when they shall be as the angels of God in heaven.

5. That for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men, v. 4. They were soldiers, that thought themselves hardened against fear, yet the very sight of an angel struck them with terror. Thus when the Son of God arose to judgment, the stout-hearted were spoiled, Ps. 76: 5, 9. Note, The resurrection of Christ, as it is the joy of his friends, so it is the terror and confusion of his enemies. They did shake; the word is the same with that used for the earthquake, v. 2. The keepers became as dead men. It struck a terror upon them, to see themselves baffled in their business here. They were posted to keep a dead man in his grasp—as easy a piece of service surely as was ever assigned them, and yet it proves too hard. They were told that they must expect to be assaulted by a company of feeble, faint-hearted disciples, but are amazed to find themselves attacked by a mighty angel, whom they dare not look in the face. Thus doth God frustrate his enemies by frightening them, Ps. 9: 20.

III. The message this angel delivered, v. 5-7.

1. He encourages them against their fears, v. 5. To come near to graves and tombs, especially in silence and solitude, has something in it frightful, much more was it so to these women, to find an angel at the sepulchre; but he soon makes them easy with the word, Fear not ye. The keepers shook, and became as dead men, but, Fear not ye. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid, for there is cause for it; but, Fear not, Abraham, nor any of the faithful seed of Abraham; why should the daughters of Sarah, that do well, be afraid with any amazement? 1 Pet. 3: 6. Fear not ye. Let not the news I have to tell you, be any surprise to you, for you were told before that your Master would rise; let it be no terror to you, for his resurrection will be your consolation; fear not any hurt that I will do you, nor any evil tidings I have to tell you. Fear not ye, for I know that ye seek Jesus. I know ye are friends to the cause; I do not come to frighten, but to encourage you. Note, Those that seek Jesus, have no reason to be afraid; for, if they seek Him diligently, they shall find Him, and shall find Him their bountiful Rewarder. All our believing inquiries after the Lord Jesus are observed, and taken notice of, in heaven; I know that ye seek Jesus; and shall certainly be answered, as these were, with good words, and comfortable words. Ye seek Jesus that was crucified. He mentions his being crucified, the more to commend their love to Him; 'You seek Him still, though He was crucified; you retain your kindness for Him notwithstanding.' Note, True believers love and seek Christ, not only though He was crucified, but because He was so.

2. He assures them of the resurrection of Christ; and there was enough in that to silence their fears, v. 6. To be told, He is not here, would have been no welcome news, to those who sought Him, if it had not been added, He is risen. Now, in all our inquiries after Christ, we must remember that He is risen; and seek Him as One risen. (1.) Not with any gross, carnal thoughts of Him. There were those that knew Christ after the flesh; but now henceforth know we Him so no more, 2 Cor. 5: 16. True, He had a body; but it is now a glorified body. They that make pictures and images of Christ, forget that He is not here, He is risen; our communion with Him must be spiritual, by faith in his Word, Rom. 10: 6-8. (2.) We must seek Him with great reverence and humility, and an awful regard to his glory, for He is risen. God has highly exalted Him, and given Him a name above every name, and therefore every knee and every soul must bow before Him. (3.) We must seek Him with a heavenly mind; when we are ready to make this world our home, and to say, It is good to be here, let us remember our Lord Jesus is not here, He is risen, and therefore let not our hearts be here, but let them rise too, and seek the things that are above, Col. 3: 1-3. Phil. 3: 20.

Two things the angel refers these women to, for the confirmation of their faith.

[1.] To this word now fulfilled, which they might remember. This He vouches as the proper object of faith: 'He said that He would rise, and you know that He is the Truth itself, and therefore have reason to expect that He should rise. Let us never think that strange, of which the word of Christ has raised our expectations whether the sufferings of this present time, or the glory to be revealed. If we remember what Christ hath said to us, we shall be the less surprised at what He doth with us. This angel makes it to appear that he preaches no other Gospel than they had already received, for he refers himself to the word of Christ; He is risen, as He said.

[2.] To his grave, now empty; 'Come, see the place where the Lord lay. Compare what you have heard, with what you see, and you will believe. Come, see the place, and you will see that He is not there, that He could not be stolen thence, and therefore must conclude that He is risen.' Note, It may have a good influence on us, to come, and with an eye of faith see the place where the Lord lay. When we look into the grave where we expect to lie, to take off the terror of it, let us look into the grave where the Lord lay; the place where our Lord lay, so the Syriac. The angels own Him for their Lord, as well as we; for the whole family, both in heaven and earth, is named from Him.

3. He directs them to go carry the tidings of it to his disciples, v. 7. Perhaps they were for entertaining themselves with the sight of the sepulchre, and discourse with the angels. It was good to be here, but they have other work appointed them: this is a day of good tidings, but they must not have the monopoly of it, must not hold their peace, any more than those lepers, 2 Kings 7: 9. Note, Public usefulness to others must be preferred before the pleasure of secret communion with God ourselves; for it is more blessed to give than to receive. Observe,

(1.) The disciples of Christ must first be told the news, not the chief priests and the Pharisees. God anticipates the joy of his friends more than the shame of his enemies, though the perfection of both is reserved for hereafter. Tell his disciples, [1.] That they may encourage themselves under their present sorrows and dispersions. What a cordial would this be to them now, to hear their Master is risen! [2.] That they may inquire further into it themselves. This alarm was sent them, to awaken them from stupidity, and raise their expectations to set them on seeking Him, and to prepare them for his appearance to them. Christ discovers Himself gradually.

(2.) The women are thus made, as it were the apostles of the apostles. This was an honor put on them, and a recompense for their constant, affectionate adherence to Him, at the cross, and in the grave, and a rebuke to the disciples who forsook Him. Still God chooses the weak things of the world, to confound the mighty, and puts the treasure, not only into earthen vessels, but here into the weaker vessels; as, the woman, being deceived by the sug-

8 And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy, and did run to bring his disciples word.

9 ¶ And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, 'All hail. And they came and bowed him by the feet, and worshipped him.'

10 Then said Jesus unto them, 'Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go to Galilee, and there shall they see me.'

the means of grace He will graciously manifest Himself. [2.] In consideration of the weakness of his disciples that were now at Jerusalem, who as yet were afraid of the Jews, and durst not appear publicly. Christ knows our fears, and considers our frame, and He made his appointment where there was least danger of disturbance.

Lastly, The angel solemnly affirms the truth of what he had related to them; 'Lo, I have told you.' The word spoken by angels was steadfast, Heb. 2. 2. God had been wont formerly to make known his mind to his people, by the ministration of angels, as at the giving of the law; but as He intended in gospel-times to lay aside that way of communication, (for unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, nor appointed them to be the preachers of the Gospel,) this angel was now sent to certify the resurrection of Christ to the disciples, and so leave it in their hands to be published to the world, 2 Cor. 4: 7. In saying, Lo, I have told you, he doth, as it were, discharge himself from the blame of their unbelief, if they should not receive this record; 'I have done my errand; whether you will hear or whether you will forbear, I have told you.' Note, Those messengers from God, that discharge their trust faithfully, may take the comfort of that, whatever the success be, Acts 20: 26, 27.

IV. The women's departure from the sepulchre, to bring notice to the disciples, v. 8. And observe,

1. What frame and temper of spirit they were in; they departed with fear and great joy; a strange mixture, in the same soul. To hear that Christ was risen, was matter of joy; but to be led into his grave, and to see an angel, and talk with him about it, could not but cause fear. It was good news, but they were afraid that it was too good to be true. But observe, it is said of their joy, it was great joy; it is not said so of their fear. Note, (1.) Holy fear has joy attending it. They that serve the Lord with reverence, serve him with gladness. (2.) Spiritual joy is mixed with trembling, Ps. 2: 11. It is only perfect love and joy that will cast out all fear.

2. What haste they made; the angel bid them go quickly, and they ran. Those that are sent on God's errand must not loiter, or lose time; where the heart is enlarged with the glad tidings of the Gospel, the feet will run the way of God's commandments.

3. Their errand; to bring his disciples word; and to comfort them with the same comforts wherewith they themselves were comforted of God. Note, The disciples of Christ should be forward to communicate to each other their experiences of sweet communion with Heaven; should tell others what God has done for their souls. Joy in Christ Jesus, like the ointment of the right hand, will betray itself by its odors.

V. Christ's appearing to the women, to confirm the testimony of the angel, v. 9, 10. These zealous, good women not only heard the first tidings, but had the first sight of Him after his resurrection. The angel directed those that would see Him, to go to Galilee, but before that time came, even as also, they looked after Him that lives and sees them. Note, Jesus gestions of an evil angel, was first in the transgression, (1 Tim. 2: 14.) so these women, being duly informed by the instructions of a good angel, were first in the belief of the redemption from transgression by Christ's resurrection, that that reproach of their sex might be rolled away, by putting this in the balance against it, which is their perpetual praise.

(3.) They were bid to go quickly. What haste was there? Would not the news be welcome to them at any time? Yes, but they were now overwhelmed with grief, and Christ would have this cordial hastened to them; when Daniel was humbling himself before God for sin, the angel Gabriel was caused to fly swiftly with a message of comfort, Dan. 9: 21. We must always be ready and forward; [1.] To obey the commands of God, Ps. 119: 60. [2.] To do good to our brethren, and carry comfort to them, as those that felt for their afflictions; Say not, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give; but now quickly.

(4.) They were directed to appoint the disciples to meet Him in Galilee. There were other appearances of Christ to them before that in Galilee, which were sudden and surprising; but He would have one to be solemn and public, and gave them notice of it before. Now this general rendezvous was appointed in Galilee, eighty or a hundred miles from Jerusalem; [1.] In kindness to those of his disciples that remained in Galilee, and did not (perhaps could not) come up to Jerusalem. I know thy works, and where thou dwellest. Note, The exaltation of Christ doth not make Him forget the meaner and poorer sort of his disciples, but even to them that are at a distance from the plenty of Christ is often better than his word, never worse; often anticipates, but never frustrates the believing expectations of his people.

Here is, 1 Christ's surprising appearance to the women, v. 9. Note, God's gracious visits usually meet us in the way of duty, and to those who use what they have for others' benefit, more shall be given. This interview with Christ was unexpected, or ever they were aware Cant. 6: 12. Note, Christ is nearer to his people than they imagine. They needed not descend into the deep, to fetch Christ hence; He was not there, He was risen; nor go up to heaven, for He was not yet ascended; but Christ was nigh them, and still in the Word is nigh us.

2. The salutation wherewith He accosted them; All hail. We use the old English form of salutation, wishing all health to those we meet; for so All hail signifies, and is expressive of the Greek form of salutation here used, answering to that of the Hebrew, Peace be unto you. And it bespeaks, (1.) The good will of Christ to us and our happiness, ever since He entered on his state of exaltation. (2.) The freedom and holy familiarity He used in his fellowship with his disciples: He called them friends. But the Greek word signifies, Rejoice ye. They were affected both with fear and joy; what He said to them tended to encourage their joy, (v. 9.) Rejoice ye, and to silence their fear; (v. 10.) Be not afraid. Note, It is the will of Christ that his people should be a cheerful, joyful people, and his resurrection furnishes them with abundant matter for joy.

3. The affectionate respect they paid Him, v. 9. Thus they expressed, (1.) The reverence and honor they had for Him; they threw themselves at his feet, in a posture of adoration, and worshipped Him with humility and godly fear, as the Son of God, and now exalted. (2.) The love and affection they had to Him; they held Him, and would not let Him go, Cant. 3: 4. How beautiful were the feet of the Lord Jesus to them! Isa. 52: 7. (3.) The transport of joy they were in, now that they had this further assurance of his resurrection; they welcomed it with both arms. Thus we must embrace Jesus Christ offered us in the Gospel, with reverence cast ourselves at his feet, by faith take hold of Him, and with love and joy lay Him near our hearts.

4. The encouraging words Christ said to them, v. 10. We do not find that they said any thing to Him, their affectionate embraces and adorations spake plainly enough; and what He said to them was no more than what the angel had said; (v. 5, 7.) for He will confirm the word of his messengers; (Isa. 44: 26,) and his way of comforting his people is, by his Spirit to speak over again to their hearts the same they had heard before from his angels, the ministers. Now observe, here,

(1.) How He rebukes their fear; Be not afraid. They must not fear being imposed on by these repeated notices of his resurrection, nor fear any hurt from the appearance of one from the dead. Note, Christ rose from the dead, to silence his people's fears.

(2.) How He repeats their message; 'Go tell my brethren, they must prepare for a journey into Galilee, and there they shall see Me. If there be any communication between our souls and Christ, it is He that appoints the meeting, and He will observe the appointment. Jerusalem had forfeited the honor of Christ's presence, it was a tumultuous city, therefore He adjourns the meeting to Galilee. Come, my beloved, let us go forth, Cant. 7: 11. But that which is especially observable here, is, that He calls his disciples his brethren. Go, tell my brethren, not only those of them that were akin to Him, but all the rest, for they are all his

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. v. 9, 10. It is obvious to every attentive reader, that there is some difficulty in arranging the various circumstances, recorded by the evangelists, into one compact narration: and it is plain, they did not write in concert; but the Lord was pleased to direct each of the sacred historians to write those incidents which most impressed his own mind. When the different accounts have been separately considered, a compendious view will be given of the most approved method, by which they have been shown to be consistent with each other; and that will be the proper place also, for a brief statement of the complex demonstration afforded us of this important event, on which the truth of Christianity and all our hopes depend.

(9.) They came and held Him by the feet, and worshipped Him. Exactly this kind of reverence may be seen daily among the Hindoo or A Hindoo disciple, meeting his religious guide in the public street, prostrates himself before him, and rubs the dust of his feet on his forehead and breast.

11 ¶ Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and shewed unto the chief priests all the things that were done.

12 And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, 13 Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept.

14 And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you.

did themselves see the glory of the resurrection, which none else did—and were enemies also, set there to oppose and obstruct his resurrection. Now observe here,

I. How this testimony was given in to the chief priests; (v. 11.) when the women were going to bring that news to the disciples, which would fill their hearts with joy, the soldiers went to bring the same news to the chief priests, which would fill their faces with shame. Some of the watch, probably those of them that commanded in chief, came into the city, and brought to those who employed them, the report of their disappointment: (v. 11.) told them of the earthquake, the descent of the angel, the rolling of the stone away, and the coming of the body of Jesus alive out of the grave. Thus the sign of the prophet Jonas was brought to the chief priests, with the most clear and incontestable evidence that could be; and so the utmost means of conviction were afforded them; we may well imagine what a mortification it was to them, and that, like the enemies of the Jews, they were much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. 6:16. It might justly have been expected that they should now have believed in Christ, and repented their putting Him to death; but they were obstinate in their infidelity.

II. How it was baffled and stifled by them. They called an assembly, and considered what was to be done. For their own parts, they were resolved not to believe that Jesus was risen; but their care was, to keep others from believing, and themselves from being quite ashamed from their disbelief of it. They had put Him to death, and there was no way of standing to what they had done, but by confronting the evidence of his resurrection. Thus they who have sold themselves to work wickedness, find that one sin draws on another, and that they have plunged themselves into a wretched necessity of adding iniquity to iniquity, which is part of the curse of Christ's persecutors, Ps. 69:27.

The result of their debate was, that those soldiers must by all means be bribed off, and hired not to tell tales.

1. They put money into their hands; and what wickedness is it which men will not be brought to by the love of money? These chief priests loved their money as well as most people, and yet, to carry on a malicious design against the Gospel of Christ, they were very prodigal of it. Here was large money given for the advancing of what they knew to be a lie, yet many grudge a little money for the advancement of what they know to be the truth, though they have a promise of being reimbursed in the resurrection of the just. Let us never starve a good cause, when we see a bad one so liberally supported.

2. They put a lie into their mouths; v. 13. A sorry shift indeed. (1.) This was ridiculous, and carried along with it its own confutation. If they slept, how could they know any thing of the matter, or say who came? If any one of them were awake to observe it, no doubt, he would awake them all to oppose it; for that was the only thing they had in charge. It was improbable that a company of poor, weak, dispirited men should expose themselves for so inconsiderable an achievement as the rescue of brethren, (ch. 12:50.) but He never called them so till after his resurrection; here, and John 20:17. Being, by the resurrection, Himself declared to be the Son of God with power, all the children of God were thereby declared to be his brethren. Being the First-born of the dead, He is become the First-born among many brethren, even of all that are planted together in the likeness of his resurrection. Christ did not now converse so constantly and familiarly with his disciples as He had done before his death; but, lest they should think Him grown strange to them, He gives them this endearing title, Go to my brethren, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which, speaking of his entrance on his exalted state, saith, I will declare thy name unto my brethren. They had shamefully deserted Him in his sufferings; but, to show that He could forgive and forget, and to teach us to do so, He not only continues his purpose to meet them, but calls them brethren. Being all his brethren, they were brethren one to another, and must love as brethren. His owning them for his brethren put a great honor on them, but withal gave them an example of humility in the midst of that honor.

V. 11-15. For the further proof of the resurrection of Christ, we have here the confession of the guard, whose testimony is confirmed in that they were eye-witnesses, and the dead body. Why were not the houses where they lodged diligently searched, another means used to discover it? But this was so thin a lie as one might easily see through. Had it been ever so plausible, (2.) It was a wicked thing for these priests and elders to hire these soldiers, against the consciences, to tell a deliberate lie, if it had been in a matter of ever so small importance. Those know not what they do, who draw others to commit one wilful sin; for that may debase conscience, and be an inlet to many. (3.) Considering this as intended to overthrow the great doctrine of Christ's resurrection, it was a sin against the last remedy, and in effect, a blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, imputing that to the rogues of the disciples, which was done by the power of the Holy Ghost.

But, lest the soldiers should object the penalty they incurred by the Roman law for sleeping on guard, which was very severe, (Acts 12:10.) they promised to interpose with the governor; We will persuade him, and secure you. They had lately found how easily they could manage him. If really these soldiers had slept, and so suffered the disciples to steal Him away, as they would have the world believe, the priests and elders would certainly have been the forwardest to solicit the governor to punish them for their treachery; so that their care for the soldiers' safety plainly gives the lie to the story. They undertook to secure them from the sword of Pilate's justice, but could not secure them from the sword of God's justice, which hangs over the head of those that love and make a lie. They promise more than they can perform, who undertake to save a man harmless in the commission of a wilful sin.

Well, thus was the plot laid; now, what success had it?

[1.] Those that were willing to deceive, took the money, and did as they were taught. They cared as little for Christ and his religion as the chief priests and elders did; and men of no religion can be well pleased to see Christianity run down, and lend a hand to it, if it need be. They took the money; that they aimed at, and nothing else. Note, Money is a bait for the blackest temptation; mercenary tongues will sell the truth for it.

The great argument to prove Christ to be the Son of God is, his resurrection, and none could have more convincing proofs of the truth of that than these soldiers; they saw the angel descend from heaven, the stone rolled away, the body of Christ come out of the grave, unless their consternation hindered them; and yet they were so far from being convinced by it themselves, that they were hired to lie Him, and hinder others from believing in Him. Note, The most sensible evidence will not convince men without the concurring operation of the Holy Spirit.

[2.] Those that were willing to be deceived, not only credited, but propagated, the story; v. 15. It took well enough, and answered the end. The Jews, who persisted in their infidelity, when pressed with the argument of Christ's resurrection, had this still ready, His disciples came, and stole Him away. To this purport was the solemn narrative, which (as Justin Martyr relates in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew) the great sanhedrim sent to all the Jews of the dispersion concerning this affair, exciting them to a vigorous resistance of Christianity—that, when they had crucified, and buried Him, the disciples came by night, and stole

'The more the sun shineth, the more are the wicked blinded.' Heza. 'It may be said, that this account is the representation of friends, interested in asserting the reality of the resurrection; but that there is probably another story told by the opposite party, which may set the matter in a different point of view; and that before we can judge fairly of the question, we must hear what they have to say of it. This is certainly very proper and reasonable. There is, we have observed, another account given by the Jews; and the sacred historians tell us what this opposite story was.' Bp. Porteus. It should also be observed, that this is the only account given of these transactions by the opposite party; at least, no other is extant, nor do we read of any other in ancient writers. It is not conceivable but that the chief priests and rulers must have been convinced that the events were miraculous, and afraid that Jesus was indeed risen again as He had predicted; but they had engaged all their credit, and authority, and even safety, in this unequal contest; they could not think of submitting or receding; and there was no other way left, but to conceal it, if possible, what had taken place. (Note, 2:3-6.) And this report (v. 15.) was circulated with such diligence and success, that it was commonly current among the Jews, when Matthew wrote his gospel; [Eight, eighteen, or thirty years after, Dr. A. Clarke.] and no one, as far as we can learn, attempted to disprove it, when thus published to the world. Yet was it a falsehood which confused itself, and the single omission to prosecute the disciples was a full demonstration, that they did not believe the report they so industriously circulated. It was also improbable in the extreme, that the intimidated apostles and disciples should attempt such an action, which would have been excessively rash, even in the most experienced soldiers; it was still more improbable that they should succeed; and if they had, reproach, torture, and death were the whole recompense they could possibly have expected.

15 So ^d they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews, ^e until this day.

(15.) Until this day. They went into Galilee, a long journey to go for one sight of Christ, but it was worth while. They had seen Him several times at Jerusalem, and yet went into Galilee, to see Him there.

1. Because He appointed them to do so. Note, Those who would maintain communion with Christ, must attend Him where He has appointed. Those who have met Him in one ordinance, must attend Him in another.

2. Be sure that was to be a public and general meeting. They had seen Him themselves, and conversed with Him in private, but that should not excuse their attendance in a solemn assembly, where many were to be gathered together to see Him. Note, Our communion with God in secret must not supersede our attendance on public worship, as we have opportunity; for God loves the gates of Zion, and so must we. The place was a mountain in Galilee, probably the same on which He was transfigured. There they met for privacy.

III. How they were affected with his appearance, v. 17. Now was He seen of above five hundred brethren at once, 1 Cor. 15: 6. Some think that they saw Him, at first, at some distance, above in the air. He was seen above, of five hundred brethren; (so they read it;) which gave occasion to some to doubt, till He came nearer; (v. 18.) and then they were satisfied. We are told,

1. That they worshipped Him; many of them did so, nay, it should seem, they all did that; they gave divine honor to Him, which was signified by some outward expressions of adoration. Note, All that see the Lord Jesus with an eye of faith, are obliged to worship Him.

2. But some doubted, some of those that were then present. Note, Even among those that worship, there are some that doubt. The faith of those that are sincere, may yet be very weak and wavering. They doubted, they hung in suspense, as the scales of the balance, when it is hard to say which preponderates. These doubts were afterward removed, and their faith grew up to a full assurance, and it tended much to the honor of Christ, that the disciples doubted before they believed; so that they cannot be said to be credulous, and willing to be imposed on; for they first questioned, and proved all things, and then held fast that which they found to be true.

III. What Christ said to them; v. 18-20. Though there were those that doubted, yet He did not therefore reject them; for He will not break the bruised reed. He did not stand at a distance, but came near, and gave them such convincing proofs of his resurrection as turned the wavering scale, and made their faith to triumph over their doubts. He came and spake familiarly to them, as one friend speaks to another, that they might be fully satisfied in the communion He was about to give them. He that drew near to God, to speak for us to Him, draws near to us, to speak from Him to us. Christ now delivered to his apostles the great charter of his kingdom in the world, was sending them out as his ambassadors, and here gives them their credentials.

In opening this great charter, we may observe two things:

1. The commission our Lord received Himself from the Father. Being about to authorize his apostles, if any ask by what authority He doeth it, here He tells us, (v. 18.) a very great word, and which none but He could say. Hereby He asserts his universal dominion as Mediator, which is the great foundation of the Christian religion. He has all power. Observe, (1.) Whence He hath it. He did not assume, or usurp it, but it was given Him, by Him who is the Fountain of all being, and consequently of all power. God set Him King, (Ps. 2: 6.) inaugurated and enthroned Him, Luke 1: 32. As God, equal with the Father, all power was originally and essentially his; but as Mediator, as God-man, all power was given Him; partly in recompense of his work, and partly in pursuance of his design; He had this power given Him over all flesh, that He might give eternal life to as many as were given Him, John 17: 2. This power He was now more signally invested in, upon his resurrection, Acts 13: 33. He had before power to forgive sins; (ch. 9: 6.) but now all power is given Him. He is now to receive for Himself a kingdom, (Luke 19: 12.) to sit down at the right hand, Ps. 110: 1. Having purchased it, nothing remains but to take possession; it is his own forever. (2.) Where He has this power; in heaven and earth, comprehending the universe. Christ is the sole universal Monarch, He is Lord of all, Acts 10: 36. He has all power in heaven. He has power of dominion over the angels, they are all his humble servants, Eph. 1: 20, 21. He has power of intercession with his Father, in virtue of his satisfaction and atonement; He intercedes, not as a suppliant, but as a demandant; Father, I will He has all power on earth too; having prevailed with God, by the sacrifice of atonement, He prevails with men, and deals with them as One having authority, by the ministry of reconciliation. He is indeed, in all causes and over all persons, supreme Moderator and Governor. By Him kings reign. All souls are his, and to Him every heart and knee must bow, and every tongue confess Him to be the Lord. This our Lord Jesus tells them, not only to satisfy them of the authority He had to commission them, and to bring them out in the execution of their commission, but to take off the offence of the cross; they had no reason to be ashamed of Christ crucified, when they saw Him thus glorified.

2. The commission He gives to those whom He sent forth; Go ye therefore. This commission is given, (1.) To the apostles primarily. Now were they set on thrones; (Luke 22: 30.) Go ye. It is not only a word of command, like that, Son, go work, but a word of encouragement, Go, and fear not, have not I sent you? Go, and make a business of this work; bring the Gospel to their doors. Go ye. They had doted on Christ's bodily presence, and built all their joys and hopes on that; now Christ discharges them from further attendance on his person, and sends them abroad about other work. As an eagle stirs up her nest, flutters over her young, to excite them to fly, (Deut. 32: 11.) so Christ excites his disciples, to disperse themselves into all the world. (2.) It is given to their successors, the ministers of the Gospel, whose business it is to transmit the Gospel from age to age, to the end of the world, in time, as it was theirs to transmit it from nation to nation to the end of the world in place, and no less necessary. The Old-Testament promise of a Gospel ministry is made to a succession; (Isa. 59: 21.) and this must be so understood, otherwise how could Christ be with them always, to the consummation of the world? Christ at his ascension, gave not only apostles and prophets, but pastors and teachers, Eph. 4: 11. Now observe,

[1.] How far his commission is extended; to all nations. Go, and disciple all nations. Now this plainly signifies it to be the will of Christ, 1st. That the covenant of peculiarity, made with the Jews, should now be cancelled and disannulled. This word brake down the middle wall of partition, which had so long excluded the Gentiles from a visible church state; and where as the apostles, when first sent out, were for hidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, now they were sent to all nations. 2dly. That salvation by Christ should be offered to all, and none excluded that did not, by their unbelief and impenitence, exclude themselves. The salvation they were to preach is a common salvation; whoever will, let him come; for there is no difference of Jew or Greek in Christ Jesus. 3dly. That Christianity should be interwoven with national constitutions, that the kingdoms of the world should become Christ's kingdoms, and their kings the church's nursing fathers.

[2.] The principal intention of this commission; to disciple all nations. Admit them disciples; not to denounce judgments against them, as Jonah against Nineveh, and as the other Old-Testament prophets, but go, and disciple them. The Mediator, is setting up a kingdom in the world; bring the nations to be his subjects. The work the apostles had to do, was, to set up the Christian religion in all places; an honorable work, compared with which the achievements of the mighty heroes of the world were nothing. They conquered the nations for themselves, and made them miserable; the apostles conquered them for Christ, and made them happy.

[3.] Their instructions:

1st. They must admit disciples by baptism

(15.) Until this day. This seems to intimate that our evangelist wrote his gospel several years after our Lord's resurrection. It is very observable that Justin Martyr expressly asserts, that the Jews sent chosen men of considerable rank over all the world, not only in the general to represent Christianity as an impious sect, but to assert that the body of Jesus was stolen out of his tomb by night, and that the persons who thus fraudulently conveyed Him away, took occasion from thence to report that he rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven. And this message is spoken of as having been sent before the destruction of Jerusalem.

17 And when they saw him they ^bworshipped him: ^cbut some doubted.

18 ¶ And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, ^aAll power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

19 Go ^aye therefore, and teach all nations, ^bbaptizing them ^cin the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;

the summary of the first principles of the Christian religion, and of the new covenant, and according to it the ancient creeds were drawn up. By our being baptized, we solemnly profess, (1.) Our assent to the Scripture revelation concerning God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. We confess our belief that there is a God, that there is but one God, that in the Godhead there is a Father that begets, a Son that is begotten, and a Holy Spirit of both. We are baptized not into the names, but into the name, of Father, Son, and Spirit, which plainly intimate that these Three are One, and their name One. The distinct mentioning of the Three Persons in the Trinity, both in the Christian baptism here, and in the Christian blessing, (2 Cor. 13:14.) as it is a full proof of the doctrine of the Trinity, so it has done much toward the preserving of it pure and entire through all ages of the church; for nothing

Verse 18.

It is not certain whether what is next recorded took place in Galilee, or after the return of the disciples to Jerusalem, and just before our Lord's ascension. 'The word here is authority, not power:' it is manifest that they differ from each other; for many are not able to perform those things they have a right to do; and on the contrary, many have power to do those things which they have no right to do.' *Beza (Marg. 'He to whom any office is committed, must have sufficient power and wisdom to discharge that office. Now to govern all things in heaven and earth, belongs only to Him who is the Lord and Maker of them. To have power over death, and to be able to raise the dead, is to have that power, which is proper to God alone; and to have power over the souls of men, and the knowledge of all hearts, belongs to God alone.' Whitby. Scorn.

Verse 19, 20.

The apostles were so much under the influence of Jewish prejudices, that they did not understand this commission, as authorizing them to preach to the Gentiles, till a considerable time after the descent of the Holy Spirit! (Acts 11:1-3, 13.) Two words in this passage are translated teach, and teaching; but are of different meaning. The former means the general instruction necessary to bring men to profess themselves disciples of Christ: the other relates to their subsequent instruction in all the various parts of Christianity. As the words might have stood in the same order, if it had been a command to 'go, and convert all nations to Judaism, circumcising them in the law of God, and teaching them to observe the law of Moses'; no argument can hence be fairly adduced respecting the subjects of baptism. For it would have been understood, that adult males must be circumcised on a profession of the Jewish religion, and their infant-offspring at the time appointed: as in like manner all adults, admitted into the church from among Jews and Gentiles, must be instructed in Christianity before they were baptized; though their infant-offspring must be baptized also; and the case is exactly the same still. The general nature of baptism has already been explained; (Note, 3:6.) So we have here an account of the appropriation of this institution to the Christian dispensation. The apostles and preachers of the Gospel were ordered to baptize those who embraced it, 'into the name' (not God, or Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.)' (Num. 6:21-27.) This is a most irrefragable proof of the doctrine of the Trinity; that is, of the Deity of the Son, and of the distinct personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit; for it would be absurd to suppose, that a mere man, or creature, or a mere modus, or quality of God, should be joined with the Father, in the one 'name,' into which all Christians are baptized. To be baptized into the name of any one, implies, in the person so baptized, a professed dependence on Him, and devoted subjection to Him: (1 Cor. 1:10-16, v. 13-15.) to be baptized, therefore, into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is more great and awful in Christian assemblies than these two. (2.) Our consent to a covenant relation to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baptism is a sacrament, that is, it is an oath; an oath of abjuration, by which we renounce the world and the flesh, as rivals with God for the throne in our hearts; and an oath of allegiance, by which we resign and give up ourselves to God, to be his, our own selves, our whole selves, body, soul, and spirit, to be governed by his will, and made happy in his favor. Therefore baptism is applied to the person because it is the person that is dedicated to God.

[1.] It is into the name of the Father, believing Him to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (for that is principally intended here,) by eternal generation, and our Father, as our Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, to whom therefore we resign ourselves, as our absolute Owner and Proprietor, to actuate us, and dispose of us; as our supreme Rector and Governor, to rule us, as free agents, by his law; and as our chief good, and highest end. [2.] It is into the name of the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and correlate to the Father. Baptism was in a particular manner administered in the name of the Lord Jesus, Acts 8:16. 19:5. In baptism we assent, as Peter did, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, (ch. 16:16.) and consent, as Thomas did, My Lord, and my God, John 20:28. We take Christ to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, and give up ourselves to be taught, and saved, and ruled by Him. [3.] It is into the name of the Holy Ghost. Believing the Godhead of the Holy Spirit, and his agency in carrying on our redemption, we give up ourselves to his conduct and operation, as our Sanctifier, Teacher, Guide and Comforter.

3dly. Those who are thus baptized, and enrolled among the disciples of Christ, must be taught. v. 20. This denotes two things;

1. The duty of disciples, of all baptized Christians; they must observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded, and, in order to that must submit to the teaching of those whom He implies a professed dependence on these three divine Persons, jointly and equally, and a devoting of ourselves to them as worshippers and servants. This is proper and obvious, on the supposition of the mysterious unity of three co-equal Persons in the unity of the Godhead, but not so accounted for on any other principles. Christianity is the religion of a sinner, who relies for salvation from wrath, sin, and all evil, on the mercy of the Father, through the person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and who, in consequence, gives up himself to be the worshipper and servant of the triune JEHOVAH, in all his ordinances and commandments; that, according to the ancient and excellent doxology, 'Glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be.' Baptism is an outward sign of that inward washing, or sanctification of the Spirit, which seals and evidences the believer's justification. When an adult is baptized, he avows his acceptance of this salvation, and makes his surrender of himself to the service of God and His Son. When we bring our infant-offspring to be baptized, we express our nearest desire, that they may share the same benefits, and be the redeemed and accepted worshippers and servants of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; we renew our own profession of faith, and devotedness to this one God in three Persons; and we pledge ourselves to God and his church, to use all proper means to 'bring up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,' in hope of their being made partakers of the inward and spiritual grace of baptism. As far as these things are attended to, they have a most salutary effect both on parents and children; and this sacrament, thus administered, helps to keep up the remembrance of the principal doctrines of Christianity, in all places where it is used. (2 Cor. 13:15-16. Mark 10:13-16.) There can be no reasonable doubt, that the apostles and primitive Christians always administered baptism in this very form; and it would be strange to infer their disobedience to a command of Christ, so express, from the brevity, with which matters of this nature are recorded in 'the Acts of the Apostles.' Indeed, it would be a most daring presumption in any man to alter it, as if he knew better than the Lord Himself, in what manner to administer this sacrament. Our Lord is with us in the power of his protecting providence; by the influences of his teaching, sanctifying, and comforting Spirit; and in the communication of all spiritual blessings from the favor of his omnipresent Deity; and we should realize Him with us, in secret and in social worship, and in our public assemblies. (18:20.) Scorn.

'Not only they who have learnt and been instructed, but they also who are to learn and are to be instructed, are included under the name disciple. Therefore are infants to be baptized. For, since the apostles could not have been ignorant that the children and infants of proselytes from the Gentiles were not only called proselytes, and circumcised, which the Mishna teaches, but also baptized, (which Weistain on Matt. 3:6. proves abundantly from the Gemara,) it never could so much as have entered their mind, that children and infants were to be expunged from the catalogue of disciples, or that they were to be denied baptism, unless they had been excepted and excluded by Christ in express words; which we no where read.' Ross &c.

2. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ, to expound them to his disciples, to press on them the necessity of obedience, and to assist them in applying the general commands of Christ to particular cases. They must teach them, not their own inventions, but the institutions of Christ; to them they must religiously adhere, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be trained up. A standing ministry is hereby settled in the church, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come to the perfect man, Eph. 4:11-13. The heirs of heaven, till they come to age, must be under tutors and governors.

3. Here is the assurance He gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission; v. 20. This exceeding great and precious promise is ushered in with a behold, to strengthen their faith, and engage their observation of it. 'Take notice of this; it is what you may assure yourselves of, and venture on.' Observe here.

(1.) The favor promised them; I am with you. Not, I will be with you, but I am. As God sent Moses, so Christ sent his apostles by this name, I am; for He is God, to whom past, present, and to come, are the same: see Rev. 1:8. He was now about to leave them, as to his bodily presence, and this grieved them; but He assures them of his spiritual presence, which was more expedient for them; 'My Spirit, the Comforter, shall abide with you, John 16:7. I am with you, to take your part, to hold with you, as Michael, Dan. 10:21. I am not absent, not at a distance, but a very present help.' Ps. 46:1. Christ was now sending them to set up his kingdom in the world, which was a great undertaking. He seasonably promises them his presence, [1.] 'To carry them through the difficulties they were likely to meet with. When you go through the fire or water, in the pulpit, in the prison, lo, I am with you.' [2.] 'To succeed this great undertaking; Lo, I am with you, to make your ministry effective in disciplining the nations, in pulling down the strongholds of Satan, and in setting up stronger for the Lord Jesus.' It was unlikely that they should uninge national constitutions in religion, establish a doctrine so directly contrary to the genius of the age, and persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but I am with you, and therefore you shall gain your point.

(2.) The continuance of the favor, always, even unto the end of the world. [1.] There is no day, no hour of the day, in which our Lord Jesus is not present with his churches, and with his ministers; if there were that sends. Our admission into the visible church is in order to something further; when Christ hath disciplined us, He hath not done with us, He enlists soldiers, that He may train them up for his service.

All that are baptized, are thereby obliged, (1.) To make the command of Christ their rule. There is a law of faith, and we are said to be under the law to Christ; we are by baptism bound, and must obey. (2.) To observe what Christ has commanded. Due obedience to the commands of Christ requires a diligent observation; we are in danger of missing, if we take not good heed; and, in all our obedience, we must have an eye to the command, and do what we do as to the Lord. (3.) To observe all things that He hath commanded, without exception; all the moral duties, and all the instituted ordinances. Our obedience to the laws of Christ is not sincere, if it be not universal; we must stand complete in his whole will. (4.) To confine of Christ, so as not to diminish from them, or to add to them. (5.) To learn their duty according to the law of Christ, from those whom He has appointed to be teachers in his school, for therefore we were entered into his school.

2. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ, to expound them to his disciples, to press on them the necessity of obedience, and to assist them in applying the general commands of Christ to particular cases. They must teach them, not their own inventions, but the institutions of Christ; to them they must religiously adhere, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be trained up. 3. Here is the assurance He gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission; v. 20. This exceeding great and precious promise is ushered in with a behold, to strengthen their faith, and engage their observation of it. 'Take notice of this; it is what you may assure yourselves of, and venture on.' Observe here.

(1.) The favor promised them; I am with you. Not, I will be with you, but I am. As God sent Moses, so Christ sent his apostles by this name, I am; for He is God, to whom past, present, and to come, are the same: see Rev. 1:8. He was now about to leave them, as to his bodily presence, and this grieved them; but He assures them of his spiritual presence, which was more expedient for them; 'My Spirit, the Comforter, shall abide with you, John 16:7. I am with you, to take your part, to hold with you, as Michael, Dan. 10:21. I am not absent, not at a distance, but a very present help.' Ps. 46:1. Christ was now sending them to set up his kingdom in the world, which was a great undertaking. He seasonably promises them his presence, [1.] 'To carry them through the difficulties they were likely to meet with. When you go through the fire or water, in the pulpit, in the prison, lo, I am with you.' [2.] 'To succeed this great undertaking; Lo, I am with you, to make your ministry effective in disciplining the nations, in pulling down the strongholds of Satan, and in setting up stronger for the Lord Jesus.' It was unlikely that they should uninge national constitutions in religion, establish a doctrine so directly contrary to the genius of the age, and persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but I am with you, and therefore you shall gain your point.

(2.) The continuance of the favor, always, even unto the end of the world. [1.] There is no day, no hour of the day, in which our Lord Jesus is not present with his churches, and with his ministers; if there were that day, that hour, they were were undone. Since his resurrection, He had appeared to them now and then, once a week, it may be, and scarcely that. But He assures them that they shall have his spiritual presence continued to them without intermission. Wherever we are, the Word of Christ is nigh us, even in our mouth, and the Spirit of Christ nigh us, even in our hearts. The God of Israel, the Savior, is sometimes a God that hideth Himself, (Isa. 45:15.) but never a God that absenteth Himself; sometimes in the dark, but never at a distance.

[2.] They shall have his perpetual presence, even to the end of the world. I am with you to the end of the world, not with your persons they died quickly, but, 1st. With you and your writings. A divine power goes with the Scriptures of the New Testament, not only preserving them in being, but producing strange effects by them, which will continue to the end of time, 2dly. With you and your successors; with you, and all the ministers of the Gospel, in the several ages of the church. When the end of the world is come, and the kingdom delivered up to God, even the Father, there will then be no further need of ministers and their ministration.

Two solemn farewells Jesus gives to his church, both very encouraging; one here, when He closed his personal converse with them. 'Lo, I am with you always; I leave you, and yet still I am with you;' the other was, when He closed the canon of the Scripture, by the pen of his beloved disciple, and then his parting word was, 'Surely, I come quickly. I leave you for a while, but I will be with you again shortly.' Rev. 22:20. By this it appears that He did not part in anger, but in love, and that it is his will we should keep up both our communion with Him, and our expectation of Him.

One word more remains, Amen. This is not a cipher, intended only for a concluding word, like finis at the end of a book, but has its significance. 1. It speaks Christ's confirmation of this promise, Lo, I am with you. It is his Amen. 'Verily I am, and will be, with you; I the Amen, the faithful Witness, do assure you of it.' Or, 2. It speaks the church's concurrence with it, in their desire, and prayer, and expectation. It is the evangelist's Amen, So be it, blessed Lord. Our Amen to Christ's promises turns them into prayers. Hath Christ promised to be present with his ministers, present in his Word, present in the assemblies of his people, though but two or three are gathered together in his name, and this always, even to the end of the world? Let us heartily say Amen to it; believe that it shall be so, and pray that it may be so: Lord, remember this word unto thy servants, upon which Thou hast caused us to hope.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-20. We are now called to rejoice with our risen Lord, as we were not long since to sympathize in his sufferings; and attend his funeral: let us then delight to tell to all around us, that 'the Lord is risen indeed,' and is perfected to be 'the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him.'—The believer, however, will not always be able to divest himself of fear, even when he has the most abundant cause for joy; and may think himself highly favored in this present world, if hope and cheerfulness generally prevail.—The malice of proud persecutors cannot be overcome even by demonstration; nay, avarice itself will expend large sums, to silence the evidence of the truth, and to propagate error; policy will adopt the most foolish measures in such a cause; and reasoning infidels will swallow the most absurd falsehoods with a stupid credulity! We must not impute such things to the weakness of men's understandings, but to the malice of their hearts, and to the judicial blindness to which God gives them up. Thus He leaves them to expose their own cause, and to give a constrained testimony to his truth.—But those who are teachable, and impartially seek to know the ways of God, shall be admitted to clearer and fuller discoveries of the truth; and at length their perplexities shall be all removed, by what they see, hear, and experience in their own souls. Being then compassed with such numerous witnesses of our Redeemer's resurrection, let us ever be ready to meet Him in all his appointed ordinances, for the further establishment of our faith and hope; and to show forth his praises, and express our admiring, joyful, grateful love, and hold communion with Him, and with his people; and let us often contemplate Him, as now possessed of 'all power in heaven and earth,' for the benefit of his church. He has sent his Gospel into this distant nation, to call us to be his disciples; and some of us have been 'baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;' let us then examine whether we really possess 'the inward and spiritual grace of a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,' by which 'the children of wrath' become 'the children of God.' Let us seek to experience more fully the salvation of our true God, and to be more entirely devoted to his service and worship; and let us bring up our families, as those who desire more, far more, that they may be genuine Christians, than that they should be rich, learned, or honorable in the world. Let ministers also observe, to act always under the commission, and according to the instructions, of the great 'Head of the church' and 'Lord of all;' let them still preach the Gospel to all around them, administering sacred ordinances by the rule of the holy Scriptures, and teaching the people, not only a few doctrines, but to observe all things whatever Christ hath commanded them. He is not indeed now personally present with us, and miraculous gifts have ceased; but He is yet spiritually among us, to assist and bless us in our studies and labors, public and private; and He is and will be with all his servants and disciples, 'always, even to the end of the world,' and till He have gathered them all into his heavenly kingdom, to be held and share his glory and felicity. 'Even so, Lord Jesus, be Thou with us, and with all thy people;' and 'cause thy face to shine upon us, that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations.' Amen. SCOTT.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK,

WITH AN EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

ST PETER speaks of Marcus, and calls him 'his son;' perhaps implying that Marcus was converted by his mission, and served with him in the gospel. (Note, 1 Pet. 5:13.) This Marcus, or Mark, was undoubtedly the writer of the gospel, on which we now enter: but whether he was, or was not, a different person from John surnamed Mark, of whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles, and in St. Paul's epistles, (Acts 12: 12. 13: 5, 13. 15: 37—39. Col. 4. 10. 2 Tim. 4:11.) must remain doubtful, as the most able and laborious inquirers are divided in opinion on the subject; Erotius on the one side, and Lardner on the other.—It is, however, generally agreed, that this gospel was written under the immediate inspection of the apostle Peter, and received by the church on his authority.—St. John had seen the three gospels, and wrote his own as a supplement to them, as plainly appears in the harmony of the gospels. . . Ecclesiastical history informs us, that Mark's gospel had the approbation of Peter, and that Mark was instructed by him. . . Papias conversed with the disciples of the apostles, about the beginning of the second century. He speaks of the gospels of Matthew and Mark as extant, and written by them. Justin Martyr, A. D. 150, mentions the gospels as universally received, and read in the congregations in his time. He must have conversed with Christians who were old men, and learned that the gospels were extant when they were young.' It is therefore undeniable, that from the earliest ages of the church, this gospel, and that of St. Luke, though not written by apostles, were received as authentic, and as divinely inspired. 'As Mark wrote his gospel for the use of the Christians at Rome, at that time the great metropolis and common centre of all civilized nations, we find it free from all peculiarities, and equally accommodated to all descriptions of persons. Quotations from the ancient prophets, and allusions to Jewish customs, are as much as possible avoided; and such explanations are added as might be necessary for Gentile readers at Rome: thus when "Jordan" is first mentioned in this gospel, the word "river" is prefixed, chap. 1: 5; the oriental word "Corban" is said to mean "a gift," chap. 7: 11; the "preparation" is said to be "the day before the Sabbath," chap. 15: 42; and "defiled hands" are said to mean "unwashed hands," chap. 7: 2; and the superstition of the Jews upon that subject is stated more at large than it would have been by a person writing at Jerusalem. The gospel of Mark is a simple and compendious narrative, and his style clear and correct; he is, in general, much less circumstantial than Matthew; and usually follows his arrangement. Some authors represent his gospel as an abridgment of Matthew's; but they surely mistake. He entirely omits several important things related by Matthew, such as the genealogy and birth of Christ, the massacre at Bethlehem, and the sermon on the mount. He dilates upon some facts which are concisely mentioned by Matthew, such as the case of the paralytic, chap. 2. (compare Matt. 9: 2.) and the miracle among the Gadarenes, chap. 5. (comp. Matt. 8: 28.) He now and then departs from the order of time and arrangement of facts observed by Matthew; and there have been enumerated above thirty circumstances noticed by Mark, which are not found in any other gospel: many of these are of little moment, but two are the miraculous cures recorded in ch. 7. and 8. in the middle. If, however, we except slight additions made by Mark to the narrative common to the first three evangelists, there are not more than twenty-four verses in his whole gospel which contain facts not recorded either by Matthew or Luke.'

We have heard the evidence given by the first witness to the doctrine and miracles of our Lord; here is another witness. Let us inquire,

I. Concerning Mark. Marcus was a Roman name, but he was by birth a Jew; as Saul, when he went among the nations, took the Roman name of Paul, so he of Mark. We read of John, whose surname was Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, whom Paul was displeased with, (Acts 15: 37, 38.) but afterward had a great kindness for, and not only ordered the churches to receive him, (Col. 4: 10.) but sent for him to be his assistant, with this encomium, He is profitable to us for the ministry; (2 Tim. 4: 11.) and he reckons him among his fellow-laborers, Philem. 24. We read of Marcus whom Peter calls his son, he having been an instrument of his conversion; (1 Pet. 5: 13.) whether that was the same with the other, and if not, which of them was the penman of this gospel, is altogether uncertain. It is a tradition very current among the ancients, that St. Mark wrote this gospel under the direction of St. Peter; so Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccles. Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, being sent from Rome by the brethren, wrote a concise gospel; and Tertullian saith, (Adv. Marcion. lib. 4. cap. 5.) Mark, the interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing the things which had been preached by Peter. 'Papias, who was acquainted with John, an early disciple and companion of the apostles, but not the evangelist, says, "This is what was related by the elder (i. e. John) viz. Mark being Peter's interpreter wrote, exactly, whatever he remembered of all things which were done or spoken by the Lord." This testimony has never been contradicted. On the contrary, it is confirmed by all who mention the subject.' CAMPBELL'S Pref. Mark. But as Dr. Whitby very well suggests, Why should we have recourse to the authority of Peter, for the support of this gospel, when we have every reason to think that both he and Luke were of the number of the seventy disciples, who accompanied with the apostles all along, (Acts 1: 21.) who had a commission like that of the apostles, (Luke 10: 19. compared with Mark 16: 18.) and who, it is highly probable, received the Holy Ghost when they did? (Acts 1: 15. 2: 1.) So that it is no diminution at all to the validity or value of this gospel, that Mark was not one of the twelve, as Matthew and John were. St. Jerome saith, that, after the writing of this gospel, he went into Egypt, and was the first that preached the gospel at Alexandria, where he founded a church, to which he was a great example of holy living. He so adorned by his doctrine and his life the church which he founded, that his example influenced all the followers of Christ.

II. Concerning this testimony. Mark's gospel is short, not giving so full an account of Christ's sermons, but insisting chiefly on his miracles. It is very much a repetition of Matthew; many remarkable circumstances being added to the stories there related, but not many new matters. When many witnesses are called to prove the same fact, upon which a judgment is to be given, it is not thought tedious, but highly necessary, that they should each of them relate it in their own words, again and again, that by the agreement of the testimony the thing may be established. We must not think this book of Scripture needless: it is written to put us in mind of things which we have read in the foregoing gospel, that we may give the more earnest heed to them, lest at any time we let them slip. Pure minds have need to be stirred up by way of remembrance. It was fit that such great things as these should be spoken and written once, yea, twice, because man is so unapt to perceive, and so apt to forget them. There is no ground for the tradition, that this gospel was written first in Latin, though it was written at Rome; it was written in Greek, as was St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, the Greek being the more universal language. CHAP. I.

The gospel is introduced by John the Baptist's ministry, 1-8. The baptism and temptation of Christ, 9-13. John being imprisoned, Jesus preaches in Galilee, and calls Simon and Andrew, James and John, to be his disciples, 14-20. He casts out an uncle in spirit, 21-22. Heals Peter's wife's mother, and many sick persons, 23-34. Retires very early in the morning for prayer; preaches in the synagogues of Galilee; and cleanses a leper, 35-45.

THE ^abeginning of the gospel of ^bJesus Christ, ^cthe Son of God;

2 As it is ^dwritten in the prophets, ^eBehold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.

3 The ^fvoice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

4 John ^gdid baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance ^hfor the ⁱremission of sins.

5 And ^jthere went out unto him all the ^kand of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all ^lbaptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins.

6 And John was ^mclothed with camel's hair, and with a girdle of a skin about his loins; and he did ⁿeat locusts and wild honey;

7 And preached, saying, ^oThere cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose.

8 I indeed ^phave baptized you with water; but ^qhe shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

CHAP. I. v. 1.—S. We may observe here,

1. What the New Testament is. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, v. 1. It is gospel; it brings us glad tidings, v. 2. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is called his, because He is the Author and the Subject of it. 3. This Jesus is the Son of God. That truth is the foundation on which the gospel is built, and which it is written to demonstrate; for if Jesus be not the Son of God, our faith is vain.

II. What the reference of the New Testament is to the Old, and its coherence with it. The gospel of Jesus Christ begins, as it is written in the prophets, (v. 2.) for it saith no other things than those which the prophets and Moses said should come; (Acts 26: 22.) which was proper for the conviction of the Jews, who believed the Old-Testament prophets, and ought to have evidenced that they did so, by welcoming the accomplishment of their prophecies; but it is of use to us for the confirmation of our faith both in the Old Testament and in the New, for the harmony between both shows the same divine origin.

Quotations are here borrowed from the prophecies of Isaiah and Malachi, (and there were above three hundred years between them) both of whom spake concerning the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, in the ministry of John.

1. Malachi, in whom we had the Old-Testament foretold, spake very plainly (ch. 3: 1.) concerning John Baptist, who was to give the New-Testament welcome. Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, v. 2. Christ himself had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, (Matt. 11: 10.) who was God's messenger, sent to prepare Christ's way.

2. Isaiah begins the evangelical part of his prophecy with this, which points to the beginning of the gospel of Christ; (Isa. 40: 3.) The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness; v. 3. Matthew had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, ch. 3: 3. Such is the corruption of the world, that it is something to do to make room for Christ, and to remove that which gives not only obstruction, but opposition. When the paths that were crooked are made straight, (the mistakes of the judgment rectified, and the crooked ways of the affections,) then way is made for Christ's comforts. It is in a wilderness, for such this world is, that Christ's way is prepared, and their's that follow him, like that of Israel to Canaan. The messengers of conviction and terror, that come to prepare Christ's way, are God's messengers, whom He will own, and must be received as such. They that are sent to prepare the way of the Lord, in such a vast howling wilderness as this is, have need to cry aloud, and not spare, and to lift up their voice like a trumpet.

III. What the beginning of the New Testament was. The gospel did not begin so soon as the birth of Christ, for He took time to increase in wisdom and stature; not so late as his entering upon his public ministry, but half a year before, when John began to preach the same doctrine that Christ afterward preached. His baptism was the dawning of the gospel day; for,

1. In John's way of living there was the beginning of a gospel spirit; for it bespoke self-denial, mortification of the flesh, a holy contempt of the world, which may truly be called the beginning of the gospel of Christ in any soul, v. 6. He was clothed in camels' hair, not with soft raiment; was girt, not with a golden, but with a leathern girdle; and, in contempt of dainties, his meat was locusts and wild honey. Note, The more we live above the world, the better we are prepared for Jesus Christ.

2. In John's preaching and baptizing there was the beginning of the gospel doctrines and ordinances. (1.) He preached the remission of sins, showed people their need of it, that they were undone without it, and that it might be obtained. (2.) He preached repentance, in order to it, and that there must be a renovation of their hearts, and a reformation of their lives, that they must forsake their sins, and upon those terms, their sins should be forgiven. Repentance for the remission of sins, was what the apostles were commissioned to preach to all nations; Luke 24: 47. (3.) He preached Christ, and directed his hearers to expect Him speedily to appear, and to expect great things from Him. Like a true gospel minister, he preaches, [1.] The great pre-eminence of Christ, so great that John, one of the greatest, that was born of woman, thinks himself unworthy even to untie his shoes. He comes after me in time, but is mightier than I, mightier than the mighty ones of the earth, for He is able to baptize with the Holy Ghost; and by Him govern the spirits of men. (4.) The great promise Christ makes in his gospel to those who have repented, and have had their sins forgiven; they shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, purified by his graces, and refreshed. And, lastly, All those who received his doctrine, and institution, he baptized with water, as the manner of the Jews was to admit proselytes, in token of their cleansing themselves by repentance and reformation, and of God's cleansing them both by remission and sanctification. This was afterward to be advanced into a gospel ordinance, to which John's using it was a preface.

3. In John's preaching and baptism, there was the beginning of a gospel church. He baptized in the wilderness, and declined going into the cities; but there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, inhabitants both of city and country, and were baptized of him. They entered themselves his disciples, and bound themselves to his discipline; in token of which, they confessed their sins; he admitted them his disciples, in token of which, he baptized them. Here were the foundations of the gospel-church, the dew of its youth, from the womb of the morning, Ps. 110: 3. Many of these afterward became followers

NOTES.

CHAP. I. v. 1, 2 Mark, writing after Matthew, passed over the birth of Jesus, and began with John's ministry. This was 'the beginning of the gospel,' the introduction of the new dispensation: of glad tidings relating to Jesus Christ, the anointed Savior, as foretold by the prophets. (Marg. Ref.)—The ^astory of John the Baptist is the beginning of the gospel; ^b'because he began by preaching repentance as the preparation to receive it, and faith in the Messiah as the subject of it. (Luke 16: 16.)—This he styles the 'gospel of the Son of God,'—'that we might have worthy thoughts both of the gospel, and of the Author,—so nearly related to the Father.' WHITEY. Behold, &c. (2.) Note, Matt. 11: 17.—11, v. 10. The quotation here is exactly the words which Matthew uses; and except the change of the pronoun may for thy, is literal from the Hebrew. (Notes, Mark. 3: 1.—4: 4.—6. Luke 1: 76.—79, v. 76.) SCOTT.

Wilderness.] 'It lay east from Jerusalem along the Jordan; and the Dead sea.' By wilderness, in Scripture, we are not always to understand what is commonly denominated so with us, an uninhabited region. Often, no more was denoted by it, than a country fit for pasture than agriculture, mountainous, woody, thinly inhabited.' See verse 45. CAMPBELL.

Verse 4.

For the remission of sins.] 'They were to repent, and be baptized in reference to the remission of sins. Repentance prepared the soul for it, and baptism was the type or pledge of it.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 6.

'Water baptism is nothing, only as an emblem of that which must be received from the Holy Ghost.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

9 ¶ And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan.

10 And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens *opened, and the Spirit¹ like a dove, descending upon him:

11 And there came a voice from heaven, saying, *Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

12 And immediately the Spirit driveth him into the wilderness.

13 And he was there in the wilderness forty days, *tempted of Satan, and was with the wild beasts: and the angels ministered unto him.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, 15 And saying, *The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: *repent ye, and believe the gospel.

16 Now as he walked by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon, of Christ, and preachers of his gospel, and this grain of mustard-seed became a tree.

V. 9-13. We have here,

I. Christ's baptism, which was his first public appearance, after He had long lived obscurely in Nazareth: Much hidden worth in this world is either lost in the dust of contempt, and cannot be known, or wrapped up in humility, and will not be known! But sooner or later it shall be known.

1. He owned God, by coming to be baptized of John; thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness. Thus He took upon Him the likeness of sinful flesh, that, though perfectly pure and unsupposed, He was washed as if He had been polluted; and thus for our sakes He sanctified Himself, that we also might be sanctified, and be baptized with Him, John 17: 19.

2. God owned Him.

(1.) He saw the heavens opened; thus He was owned to be the Lord from heaven, and had a glimpse of the glory and joy that were set before Him, as the recompense of his undertaking. Matthew saith, The heavens were opened to him. Mark saith, He saw them opened. Christ had not only a clear foresight of His sufferings, but of His glory too.

(2.) He saw the Spirit, like a dove, descending upon Him. Note, We may see heaven opened to us, when we perceive the Spirit descending and working upon us. God's good work in us is the surest evidence of his good will towards us. Justin Martyr says that when Christ was baptized, a fire was kindled in Jordan: and it is an ancient tradition, that a great light shone around the place.

(3.) He heard a voice which was intended for his encouragement, and therefore it is directed to Him, Thou art my beloved Son. God lets Him know, [1.] That He loved Him, never the less for that low estate to which He had now humbled himself; "Though thus made of no reputation, yet He is my beloved Son still." [2.] He loved Him much the more for that glorious and kind undertaking in which He had now engaged. God is well pleased in Him, and so well pleased, as to be well pleased with us in Him.

II. His temptation. The good Spirit that descended upon Him led Him into the wilderness, v. 12. Paul mentions it as a proof that he had his doctrine from God, and not from man—that, as soon as he was called, he went not to Jerusalem, but into Arabia, Gal. 1: 17.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. Those characters and actions, which are concealed, through humility, are commonly far more excellent, than such as are the subjects of human applause: but when the Lord's time comes, or his work requires it, He makes his servants known, and renders their eminence equal to their excellence.—The hearts of men must be prepared, before they can welcome the kingdom of God; this is commonly effected by the divine blessing on the scriptural preaching of repentance and conversion.—Ministers should perform their duty in this respect, and in administering ordinances; thus numbers may be led to confess their sins, and to repent; but without faith in the Savior, through the Holy Spirit, they cannot be accepted of God. This all faithful preachers plainly declare: and all believers speak and think humbly of themselves, and honorably of Christ, in exact proportion to the degree of their progress in the divine life. (P. O. Matt. 3: 13-17, 8: 5-13.) and when to this they join a holy indifference to worldly things, they are likely to be extensively useful.—While we rejoice in our Surety's obedience, we should copy his example: and by attending on the ordinances of God, we shall be in the way of receiving more abundant supplies of 'the Spirit of adoption,' witnessing 'that we are the children of God,' accepted through 'his Son.' Then, should we be exposed to persecutors, or to Satan's temptations, in this wilderness; we may confide in divine protection and consolation, and expect that angels will minister to us for our Redeemer's sake.

Retirement from the world is an opportunity of more free converse with God, and therefore must sometimes be chosen, for a while, even by those that are called to the greatest business. Mark observes that He was with the wild beasts. He was preserved from being torn in pieces by the wild beasts, which encouraged Him the more that his Father would provide for Him when He was hungry. Special protections are earnest of seasonable supplies. It was like wise an intimation of the inhumanity of the men of that generation, no better than wild beasts in the wilderness, nay, abundantly worse. In that wilderness,

1. The evil spirits were busy with Him; He was tempted of Satan; solitude often gives advantages to the tempter, therefore two are better than one. Christ Himself was tempted, not only to teach us, that it is no sin to be tempted, but to direct us whither to go for succor when we are so, even to Him that suffers, being tempted, that He might sympathize with us in our temptations.

2. The good spirits were busy about Him; the angels ministered to Him. Note, The ministration of good angels about us, is matter of great comfort in reference to the malicious designs of evil angels against us; much more doth it befriend us, to have the indwelling of the Spirit in our hearts.

V. 14-22. Here is,

1. A general account of Christ's preaching in Galilee. Observe,

1. When Jesus began to preach in Galilee. After that John was put in prison. When he had finished his testimony, then Jesus began his. Note, The silencing of Christ's ministers shall not be the suppressing of Christ's gospel; if some be laid aside, others shall be raised up, perhaps mightier, to carry on the same work.

2. He preached the gospel of the kingdom of God. Christ came to set up the kingdom of God among men, that they might be subject to it, and obtain salvation in it; and He set it up by his preaching of his gospel, and a power going with it.

Observe, (1.) The great truths Christ preached; The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. This refers to the Old Testament, in which the kingdom of the Messiah was promised, and the time fixed for it. They were not so well versed in those prophecies, as to understand it themselves, and therefore Christ gives them notice of it; 'The time pre-

'However much the Jews misunderstood many other prophecies, the time and place of Christ's appearance seem to have been well apprehended by the majority of them. Verses 23-23.

(Luke 4: 33-37.) This miracle is not particularly recorded by Matthew. As the possessed person was in the synagogue, it may be supposed that the unclean spirit did not harass him at all times; but took advantage of bodily disorder, or other circumstances. According to the man was seized while in the synagogue, and cried out with great vehemence, 'Let us alone?' &c. Probably, the man was led to feet destruction, instead of expecting deliverance, from Christ. (Notes, 5: 2-13. t. 7. Matt. 8: 23, 29.) No disorder could enable a man to know Jesus to be 'the Holy One of God'; this was the language of the unclean spirit or spirits, speaking by the organs of the man; intending fixed is now at hand; glorious discoveries of divine light and love, are now to be made; a new dispensation, far more spiritual and heavenly, is now to commence. Note, God keeps time; when the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand; & the vision is for an appointed time, which will be punctually observed, though it tarry past our time.

(2.) The great duties to be inferred thence. Christ gave them to understand the times, that they might know what Israel ought to do; they fondly expected the Messiah to appear in external pomp, not only to free the Jewish nation from the Roman yoke, but to make it have dominion over all its neighbors, and therefore thought, when that kingdom of God was at hand, they must prepare for war, victory, and great things in the world; but Christ tells them, they must repent, and believe the gospel. They had broken the moral law, and could not be saved by a covenant of innocence, for both Jew and Gentile are under guilt. They must therefore take the benefit of a covenant of grace, submit to a remedial law, and this is it—repentance toward God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. By repentance we must lament and forsake sin, and by faith receive forgiveness. By repentance we must give glory to our Creator; by faith we must give glory to our Redeemer, who came to save us from our sins. Both these must go together: we must not think either that reforming our lives will save us, without trusting in the righteousness of Christ, or that trusting in Christ will save us, without the reformation of our hearts and lives. Christ has joined these two together, and let no man put them asunder. They will assist and befriend each other. Repentance will quicken faith, and faith will make repentance evangelical; and the sincerity of both must be evidenced by a diligent obedience to all God's commandments. Thus the preaching of the gospel began, and thus it continues; still the call is, repent and believe, and live a life of repentance and faith.

II. Christ appearing as a Teacher, here is next his calling of his disciples, v. 16-20. Observe, 1. Christ will have followers. If He set up a school, He will have scholars; if He set up his standard, He will have soldiers; if He preach, He will have hearers. He has taken an effectual course to secure this; for all that the Father has given Him, shall come to Him. 2. The instruments Christ chose to employ in setting up his kingdom, were the weak and foolish things of the world; not called from the schools of the rabbins, but picked up by the sea-side, that the excellency of the power might appear to be wholly of God. 3. Though Christ needs not the help of man, yet He is pleased to use it in setting up his kingdom, that He might deal with us not in a formidable but in a familiar way, and that in his kingdom the nobles and governors may be of ourselves, Jer. 30: 21. 4. Christ puts honor upon those who, though mean in the world, are diligent in their business, and loving to one another; so those were, whom Christ called. He found them employed, and employed together. Industry and unity are good and pleasant, and there the Lord Jesus commands the blessing, even this blessing.

ing follow, i.e. 5 The business of ministers is to fish for souls. The children of men, in their natural condition, wander endlessly in the great ocean of this world, and are carried down the stream. Like leviathan in the waters, they play therein; and often, like the fishes of the sea, devour one another. Ministers, in preaching the gospel, cast the net into the waters, Matt. 13: 47. Some are inclosed and brought to shore, but far the greater number escape. Fishermen take great pains, and expose themselves to great perils; so do ministers. If man, a draught brings home nothing, yet they must go on. 6. Those whom Christ calls, must leave all, to follow Him; and He incites them to do so. Not that we must needs go out of the world, but sit loose to the world, and forsake every thing inconsistent, that cannot be kept without prejudice to our souls. Mark takes notice of James and John, that they left not only their father, but the hired servants, whom perhaps they loved as their own brethren, being their fellow-laborers and pleasant comrades. Not only relations, but companions, must be left for Christ. Perhaps it is an intimation of their care for their father, they did not leave him without assistance. Grotius thinks it is mentioned as an evidence that their calling was gainful, yet they left it.

III. Here is a particular account of his preaching in Capernaum, one of the cities of Galilee; for though John Baptist chose to preach in a wilderness, and did good, yet it did not follow, that Jesus must do so too; the inclinations and opportunities of ministers may differ, and yet both be in the way of their duty and useful. Observe, 1. When Christ came into Capernaum, He straightway applied Himself to his work, and took the first opportunity of preaching the gospel. Those will not lose time, who consider what a deal of work they have to do, and what a little time to do it in. 2. Christ religiously observed the sabbath, not by the tradition of the elders, in all the niceties of the sabbath-rest, yet (which was far better) by applying himself to, and abounding in, the sabbath-work, in order to which the sabbath was instituted. 3. The sabbath is to be sanctified in religious assemblies; it is a holy day, and must be honored with a holy convocation; Acts 13: 27, 15: 21. On the sabbath-days; every sabbath-day, as duly as it returned, He went into the synagogue. 4. In religious assemblies on sabbath-days, the Gospel is to be preached. 5. Christ did not preach as the scribes, who expounded the law of Moses by rote, as a school-boy says his lesson, but were neither acquainted with it, (Paul himself, when a Pharisee, was ignorant of the law,) nor affected with it. But Christ taught as one that had authority, as one that knew the mind of God, and was commissioned to declare it. 6. There is much in the doctrine of Christ, that is astonishing; the more we hear it, the more cause we shall see to admire it.

V. 23-28. As soon as Christ began to preach, He began to work miracles for the confirmation of his doctrine, to conquer Satan and cure souls. I. Christ cast the devil out of a man that was possessed, in the synagogue at Capernaum.

to bring Jesus into suspicion of confederacy with Satan. (Note, Acts 16: 16-18.) Our Lord therefore imposed silence, and constrained him to quit possession; and though he showed his malice, by convulsing the possessed person, and causing extreme anguish, yet he so entirely left him, that the people were astonished at the miracle; and it greatly increased and extended the reputation of Christ. 26 And when the unclean spirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him.

27 And they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth he even the unclean spirits, and they do obey him.

28 And immediately his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

[Practical Observations.]

29 ¶ And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John.

30 But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and anon they tell him of her.

31 And he came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them.

32 ¶ And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils.

33 And all the city

This passage was not related in Matthew, but is afterward in Luke 4: 33. There was in the synagogue a man with an unclean spirit,—in an unclean spirit; for the spirit had the man in his possession. So the whole world is said to lie—in the wicked one. He was in the unclean spirit, as a man is said to be in a fever, or in a frenzy. Observe, The devil is here called unclean, because he has lost the purity of his nature, because he acts in direct opposition to the holy Spirit of God, and because with his suggestions he pollutes the spirits of men. This man was in the synagogue; he did not come either to be taught or healed, but, as some think, to confront Christ, and hinder people from believing on Him.

The unclean spirit expressed rage at Christ; He cried out, in an agony, afraid of being dislodged; thus the devils believe and tremble, have a horror of Christ, but no hope in Him, nor reverence for Him. He speaks as one that knew his doom. (1.) He calls Him Jesus of Nazareth; and he did it with design to possess the minds of the people with low thoughts of Him, because no good thing was expected out of Nazareth; and with prejudices against Him as a deceiver, because every body knew, the Messiah must be of Bethlehem. (2.) Yet a confession is extorted from him—that He is the Holy One of God. Those who have only a notion of Christ—that he is the Holy One of God, and have no faith in Him, or love to Him, go no farther than the devil. (3.) He in effect acknowledgeth that he could not stand before the power of Christ; 'Let us alone; for Thou canst destroy us.' This is the misery of wicked spirits, they persist in their rebellion, yet know it will end in their destruction. (4.) He desires to have nothing to do with Jesus; for he despairs of being saved by Him, and dreads being destroyed by Him. 'What have we to do with Thee? If Thou wilt let us alone, we will let Thee alone.' See whose language they speak, that say to the Almighty, Depart from us. For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil. It is in vain for Satan to beg and pray, Let us alone; his power must be broken, and the poor man relieved; and therefore, (1.) Jesus commands. As He taught, so He healed, with authority. Jesus rebuked him; He imposed silence upon him: Hold thy peace; that unclean spirit, when he fears, as well as when he barks Christ disdains. Some confess Christ to be the Holy One of God, that under the cloak of that profession they may carry on mischievous designs; their confession is doubly an abomination to Jesus. But this is not all, he must come out of the man; this he dreaded—his being restrained from further mischief. But, (2.) The unclean spirit yields; v. 26. He tore him, put him into a strong convulsion; when he would not touch Christ, in fury at Him he grievously disturbed this poor creature. Thus, when Christ by his grace delivers souls out of the hands of Satan, it is not without a grievous loss and tumult in the soul; for that spiteful enemy will disquiet those whom he cannot destroy. He cried with a loud voice, to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible, as if he would have thought that though conquered, he was but just conquered.

II. The impressions which this miracle made upon the minds of the people, c. 27, 28.

1. They were all amazed. It was evident, that the man was possessed—witness the tearing of him, and the loud voice with which the spirit cried; it was evident that he was forced out by Christ; it was surprising to them, and put them upon inquiring, 'What is this new doctrine? For it must certainly be of God, which is thus confirmed. He hath certainly an authority to command us, who hath ability to command even the unclean spirits, and they obey Him.' The Jewish exorcists pretended by charm or invocation to drive away evil spirits; but this was quite another thing, with authority He commands them. Surely it is our interest to make Him our Friend, who has the control of infernal spirits.

2. It raised his reputation among all that heard it; Immediately his fame spread abroad into the whole region of Galilee, a third part of the land of Canaan. The story was presently in every one's mouth, all the country over so that it was universally concluded, that He was a Teacher come from God, and under that character He shone more bright than if He had appeared in all the external pomp, in which the Jews expected their Messiah to appear.

V. 14—23. One human instrument after another finishes his season of usefulness; but the divine Agent 'worketh his virtue,' and will forever; and though delays intervene, yet when the time is fulfilled, He will 'perfect what concerneth' the church and the believer, according to his Word.—Those who are laboring with honesty in some mean employment, are more in the way of being called forth to usefulness, than such as are disputing, or loitering, under pretence of study and preparation. (P. O. Ps. 78: 55—72. Note, Am. 7: 15—17. P. O. Matt. 4: 12—25.)—The occupation of a minister, though despised by worldly men, ought to be deemed a high preferment, not only by those who may be called to it from the fishing-boat, or the flock; but even by such as should leave the highest offices for it: the salvation of one soul is more important than the temporal prosperity of nations. But they 'who desire this good work,' must be content to forsake worldly interests that they may follow Christ; and give themselves wholly to his truth and will, that they may teach them to others. May his powerful Word call forth many disinterested and skilful 'fishers of men;' for though many have been employed, and large numbers of sinners have been brought forth from the course of this world into his church; immensely greater numbers continue in their natural estate, destroying each other, and falling a prey to that great leviathan, who takes pastime in this work of destruction.—Many scribes have possessed human learning, and made worldly preferment their leading object: our prayer ought to be, that 'scribes, well instructed' unto the kingdom of God, may teach 'with authority,' after the manner of Christ; and to the conviction of such hearers, as have been taught in a formal manner: and this would render our churches more frequented than they now are.—But there are too many, even in assemblies for sacred worship, who are slaves to unclean spirits: such may quietly attend, whilst formal teachers officiate; but if the Lord come with his faithful ministers, and his holy doctrine, and by his convincing Spirit, they begin to cry out, 'What have we to do with Thee, Jesus of Nazareth? art Thou come to destroy us?' Satan well knows Him to be 'the Holy One of God;' but he labors to hide this truth from his servants, that he may extend his empire. The immediate cure of lunatics by a word would in our days astonish. Yet a work really greater is frequently wrought, and men treat it with contempt. Otherwise the conversion of one notorious profligate to a 'sober, godly life,' would cause all to inquire 'What new doctrine is this, by which unclean spirits are constrained to depart, and rebels are made children?' It is in this way, that the fame of Jesus, and the honor of the Gospel, spread in this evil world: and if every one, who professes the doctrines of grace, were but changed, the doctrines would gradually prevail against all opposition.

35 ¶ And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place and there prayed.

36 And Simon, and they that were with him, followed after him.

37 And when they had found him, they said unto him, "All men seek for thee."

38 And he said unto them, "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth."

40 ¶ And there came a leper to him, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean."

42 And as soon as he had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed.

43 And he straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away;

44 And saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, show thy-

¶ He cured his mother-in-law. Wherever Christ comes, He comes to do good. Observe, How complete the cure was; when the fever left her, it did not as usually, leave her weak, but the same hand that healed her, strengthened her, so that she was able to minister to them; the cure is in order to fit for action, that we may minister to Christ, and to those that are his for his sake.

¶ It was at the even of the sabbath, when the sun did set or was set; perhaps many scrupled bringing their sick to Him, till the sabbath was over, but their weakness therein was no prejudice to them in applying to Christ. Though He proved it lawful to heal on the sabbath-days, yet, if any stumbled at it, they were welcome at another time. Observe,

I. How numerous the patients were; All the city was gathered at the door, as beggars. One cure in the synagogue occasioned this crowd. Others speeding well with Christ, should quicken us in our inquiries after Him. And in the evening of the sabbath, when the public worship is over, we must continue our attendance upon Christ; He healed, as Paul preached, publicly, and from house to house.

II. How powerful the Physician; He healed all that were brought to Him. Nor was it one particular disease, but He healed those that were sick of divers diseases. III. His retirement to his private devotion (p. 35.) He prayed alone; to set us an example of secret prayer. Though, as God, He was prayed to, as man He prayed. Though He was glorifying God, and doing good, in his public work, yet He found time to be alone with his Father, and thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness. Observe,

1. The time when Christ prayed. (1.) It was in the morning, after the sabbath. Note, when a sabbath is past, we must not think to intermit our devotion till the next sabbath; we must go to the throne of grace, every day in the week, and the morning after the sabbath particularly, that we may preserve the good impressions of the day. This morning was the morning of the first day of the week, which afterward He sanctified, and made remarkable, by another sort of rising early. (2.) It was a great while before day. When others were asleep, He was praying, as David, early, and directs his prayer in the morning; yea, and at midnight will rise to give thanks. When our spirits are fresh, we should take time for devout exercises. He that is the first and best, ought to have the first and best.

2. The place where He prayed; He departed into a solitary place, either out of town, or some remote garden. Though He was in no danger of distraction, or of temptation to vain-glory, yet He retired, to set us an example to his own rule, When thou prayest, enter into thy closet. Secret prayer must be made secretly. Those that have the most business in public, and of the best kind, must sometimes be alone with God.

IV. His return to his public work. The disciples thought they were up early, but found their Master was up before them; they followed Him to his solitary place, and there found Him at prayer, p. 36, 37. They told Him that He was much wanted, that there were a great many patients waiting for Him; All men seek for Thee. They were proud that their Master was become so popular already, and would have Him appear in public, yet more in that place, because it was their own city; and we are apt to be partial to the places we are interested in. 'No,' said Christ, 'Capernaum must not have the monopoly of the Messiah's preaching and miracles. Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach (Notes. Matt. 8: 1—4. 9: 30, 31. Luke 5: 12—15. 17: 11—19.) A cleansed leper might show himself to any priest who resided in the neighborhood, and thus have his cleansing legally attested; but it was requisite, that the offerings should be presented at the sanctuary; so that, this man must go to Jerusalem; and it is probable, he went to the priests at the temple, without delay. here also, for therefore came I forth, to go about doing good.' Observe, Christ had still an eye to the end wherefore He came forth, and closely pursued that; nor will He be drawn from that; for (p. 39.) He preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and, to confirm his doctrine, He cast out devils. Note, Christ's doctrine is Satan's destruction.

V. 40—45. We have here the story of Christ's cleansing a leper. It teaches us,

How to apply ourselves to Christ; (1.) With great humility; this leper came beseeching Him, and kneeling down to Him; (p. 40.) it teaches us that those who would receive grace and mercy from Christ, must ascribe honor and glory to Christ, and approach Him with humility and reverence. (2.) With a firm belief of his power; Thou canst make me clean. He believes it with application, not only in general, Thou canst do every thing, (as John 11:22.) but, Thou canst make me clean. Note, What we believe of the power of Christ, we must bring home to our particular case; Thou canst do this for me. (3.) With submission to the will of Christ; Lord, if thou wilt. With the modesty that became a poor petitioner, he refers his own particular case to Him.

His address is not in the form of prayer, yet Christ answered it as a request. Note, Affectionate professions of faith in Christ, and resignation to Him, are the most prevailing petitions. Christ was moved with compassion. This is added here, in Mark, to shew that Christ's reasons are fetched from within Himself, and we have nothing in us to recommend us to his favor, but our misery makes us the objects of his mercy. This poor leper was confident of Christ's power; Thou canst make me clean; and Christ will shew how much his power is drawn out into act by the faith of his people; and therefore speaks the word as one having authority, Be thou clean. Immediately his leprosy vanished, and there remained no more sign of it, p. 42.

When we have received mercy from Christ, we must with his favors receive his commands. When Christ had cured him, he strictly charged him; the word here is very significant, prohibiting with threats. I think that this was such a charge as He gave to the impotent man whom

He cured, John 5: 14. Go, sin no more lest a worse thing come to thee; for the leprosy was ordinarily the punishment of some particular sinners, as in Miriam's, Gehazi's, and Uzziah's case; now, when Christ healed him, He threatened him with the fatal consequence if he should return to sin again. He also appointed him (1.) To show himself to the priest, that the priest, by his own judgment of this leper, might be a witness for Christ, that He was the Messiah, Matt. 11: 5. (2.) Till he had done that, not to say any thing of it to any man: this is an instance of the humility of Christ that He did not seek his own honor. And it is an example to us, not to seek our own glory, Prov. 25: 27. He must not proclaim it, because that would much increase the crowd that followed Christ; not as if He were unwilling to do good to all, but He would do it with as little noise as might be, would have no offence given to the government, no disturbance of the public peace, not any thing done that looked like ostentation. The leper ought to have observed his orders; yet, no doubt, it was with a good design that he proclaimed the cure, and it had no other ill effect than that it increased the multitudes which followed Christ, to that degree, that He could no more openly enter into the city; because the crowd was so great, that the streets would not hold them, which obliged Him to go into desert places, to a mountain, (ch. 3: 13.) to the sea-side, ch. 4: 1. This shows how expedient it was for us, that Christ should go away, and send the Comforter, for his bodily presence could be but in one place at a time; and those that came to Him from every quarter, could not get near Him; but by his spiritual presence He is with his people wherever they are, and comes to them to every quarter.

CHAP. II. v. 1—12. Christ, having been for some time preaching in the country, returns to Capernaum, in hopes that by this time the talk and crowd would be somewhat abated.

I. But the people came as soon as it was noised that he was in town; they did not stay till He appeared in the synagogue on the sabbath, but straightway many were gathered together to Him. Where the king is, there is the court; where Shiloh is, there shall the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CHAP. I. v. 29—45. We ought to supplicate the Savior for help in all spiritual and temporal melodies, for ourselves and others, and minister to Him and his disciples: diligently recommending Him to others, knowing that nothing is too large for his grace, or omnipotence.—But when did any of us spend a single day, as Jesus spent each of his days? Were we like Him, we should 'rise a great while before' light, (if health permitted,) rather than be straitened in time for communion with God, when hindered at other hours by urgent engagements: and having had a good sabbath, we should be more earnest in prayer the next morning, lest the impression should wear off; and that we might obtain a blessing on those who have heard the word of God from us, or with us.—Men may attend on instruction with diligence, and yet not be prepared to follow Christ: but it behoves us to use opportunities that we may be established in the faith, in case we should be proved by losing them. As Christ preached the gospel in different places, we should endeavor to spread it on every side. Let all who are weary of the leprosy of sin, wait on Christ to be cleansed: for when He speaks the word, and we truly believe in Him, the most inveterate propensities and evil habits will be conquered, and sin shall have no more dominion over us. If this blessing be vouchsafed us, let us prove it in our conduct: by 'walking in all his ordinances and commandments,' as witnesses for Christ. Nor ought we to conceal our obligations to the Savior: for no reasons exist, why we should hesitate to spread abroad his praise; and the more abundantly sinners flock to Him, the greater his honor, and the more complete his triumph.

This quotation is important, in establishing the distinction between moral and natural inability, as showing, that the total want of inclination, or an entire aversion, forms as real an impossibility, as a total want of physical power; but an impossibility, which in no degree interferes with our free agency, or responsibility.—Inasmuch as Jesus, who shunned the applauses of the people, found it not fit for him to 'enter openly into the city.' Deserts.] The deserts, mentioned in the Bible, are uncultivated tracts of earth of two kinds; some mountainous, but not destitute of water; others are plains covered with sterile sands, in which fountains are very rare, and still fewer are those which afford water fit to drink. They scarcely make their way out of the thirsty earth, and are soon absorbed again. These plains produce, notwithstanding, a scanty herbage, upon which the sheep, goats, and camels feed. The mountainous deserts are not of so dreary and unproductive a character. They obtained names from the places, near which they were situated. The most celebrated is the Great Desert, which, according to Jerome, commences at the city of Tecca, six miles south of Bethlehem, extends through Arabia Deserta as far as the Persian gulf, and north along the Euphrates beyond the city of Bir. This large tract is called in the Bible the Desert of Judah, because it commences within the limits of that tribe. (Josh. 19: 34. Ps. 63: 1.)

NOTES.

CHAP. II. v. 1, 2. (Note, 1: 45.) As Jesus had been for some time absent from Capernaum, it is probable the inhabitants began to conclude that He would not return: and those who were sick, or had sick friends might fear that they had finally missed the opportunity of cures. The rumor of his return excited great attention, and such numbers assembled, that the house and the space before the door could not contain the whole company.

In the house.] No particular house is specified: probably it was that of Andrew and Peter.—There was no room.] See Note on Matt. 19: 11.

Verses 3—12.

(Notes, Matt. 9: 2—8. Luke 5: 18—26.) We find from Luke, that certain Pharisees and scribes had come from far, even from Jerusalem; doubtless to watch our Lord, and to seek for matter of accusation against Him.—(Luke 5: 17.) The house, it may be supposed, was low, perhaps only one story high, and there was some way up on the outside: (Note, Matt. 24: 15—18, p. 17.) but though there might be no opening in the roof, yet it seems not to have been very much raised above the level of the ground. They therefore uncovered its roof, and broke up what was in the way. Some think he was let down through the battlements, on the outside of the house, into the yard; but the 5 When Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, 'Son, thy sins be forgiven thee.

6 But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts,

7 Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins, but God only?

8 And immediately, when Jesus perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, he said unto them, 'Why reason ye these things in your hearts?

9 Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, 'Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk?

10 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (he saith to the sick of the palsy,)

11 I say unto thee, 'Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house.

12 And immediately he arose, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; insomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, 'We never saw it on this fashion.

gathering of the people be. In improving opportunities for our souls, we must not lose time. One invited another, (come, let us see Jesus,) so that his house could not contain his visitors. There was no room to receive them, not so much as about the door. A blessed sight, to see people flying like a cloud to Christ, and as doves to their windows!

II. Christ gave them the best his house would afford; He preached the Word unto them, v. 2. Many of them came only for cures, and many for curiosity; but He preached to them. Though the synagogue was open to Him at proper times, He thought it not amiss to preach in a house, on a week day; though some might reckon it both an improper place and time. Blessed are ye that soon beside all waters, Isa. 32: 20.

III. A poor cripple, sick of the palsy, perfectly disabled, was borne of four, upon a bed, as if he had been upon a bier. It was his misery, that he needed to be so carried, and bespeaks the calamitous state of human life; it was their charity, who did so carry him, and bespeaks the compassion that should be in men toward their fellow-creatures in distress, because we know not how soon the distress may be our own. These kind neighbors thought if they could but carry this man once to Christ, they should not need to carry him any more; and therefore made hard to get him to Him; and when they could not otherwise, they uncovered the roof where He was, v. 4. I see no necessity to conclude that Christ was preaching in an upper room, though in such the Jews that had stately houses, had their oratories; for then to what purpose should the crowd stand before the door? Probably the house He was in, had no upper room, but the ground-floor was open to the roof: and these petitioners, when they could not get through the crowd at the door, got, by some means, to the roof of the house, took off some of the tiles, and so let down the bed with cords into the house where Christ was. This bespoke both their faith and their fervency. It appeared that they were in earnest, and would not go, not let Christ go, without a blessing, Gen. 32: 26.

IV. Christ saw their faith; perhaps not so much his, for his distemper hindered him from the exercise of faith, but theirs that brought him. In curing the centurion's servant, Christ took notice of it as an instance of his faith, that he did not bring him to Christ, but believed He could cure him at a distance; here He commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through much difficulty. Note, True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense: but it shall be accepted, Christ said, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. The compellation is very tender—Son; intimating a fatherly care and concern. Christ owns true believers as his sons, though sick of the palsy. Herein God deals with you as with his sons. The cordial is very rich; Thy sins are forgiven thee. Note, 1. Sin is the procuring cause of all our pains. Christ took his thoughts off from the disease, which was the effect, and led them to sin, the cause, that he might be more concerned to get that pardoned. 2. God doth then graciously take away the sting of sickness, when He forgives sin; recovery from sickness is a mercy indeed, when way is made for it by the pardon of sin. See Isa. 38:17. Ps. 103: 3. The way to remove the effect, is to take away the cause. Pardon of sin strikes at the root of all diseases, and either cures them, or alters their property.

V. The scribes cavil. Their doctrine was true—that it is blasphemy for any creature to undertake the pardon of sin, and that it is God's prerogative, Isa. 43: 25. But their application was false, and the effect of their enmity to Christ. It is true, None can forgive sins, but God only; but it is false, that therefore Christ cannot, who had proved Himself to have divine power. But Christ perceived in rified God, saying, 'We never saw it on this fashion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Sickness and the fear of death, united to some hope of recovery, and an apprehension that the opportunity may speedily elapse, render men willing to use irksome methods of cure; and the failure of one remedy renders them eager to try another. This is not to be blamed: on the contrary, we should put ourselves to inconveniences in the relief of the afflicted: but it is most to be desired, that their afflictions may bring them to Christ for salvation, as well as for bodily health: in that case their afflictions will be either removed or sanctified. Forgiveness is far more valuable than the removal of sickness; the loss of the soul is infinitely more dreadful, than the death of the body: but how very few, act, as if they believed these truths!—(Notes, Ps. 32: 1, 2, Matt. 10: 23, 29.) We cannot deliver sinners from the maladies of the body, much less from those of the soul: but we may bring them to Christ for salvation; and should lose no opportunity, and sink from no self-denial, in attempting it.—The humble sinner, who despairs of help, except from the Savior, will seek Him, with earnestness: and difficulties will only serve to increase his resolution. He will not attempt to heal himself, or expect to become better, before he comes to his Physician; but when he receives forgiveness, it is accompanied by such power of renewing grace on his soul, that he becomes 'a new creature; old things pass away, all things become new' (Notes, Rom. 6: 1, 2. 2 Cor. 5: 17. Eph. 2: 4—10, v. 10. Heb. 6: 9, 10.) When enabled to overcome those evils to which he was enslaved, and to delight in those duties to which he had had an aversion, he has 'a witness in himself,' that he is pardoned; for He, who heals the soul, must also have power to cleanse the guilty conscience; and the former is the seal of the latter.—Whatever proud Pharisees and scribes may say against such instances of grace, the change is often so evident, that it cannot be gainsaid: and all impartial judges must own, in the conduct of many who profess the gospel, the excellency of the doctrines, and the efficacy of the grace. But if any think, that their sins are forgiven, who still remain under the power of corrupt passions and habits, they deceive themselves and bring a scandal on the gospel; for Christ is glorified in those alone, who glorify Him by their conduct, from the time when they profess to believe in his name. Should any assume to forgive sins, who have no power to cure paralytics, and to bid them 'take up their bed and walk,' they would be chargeable with blasphemy; but the feeblest believer may attempt such things at Christ's command, as otherwise would be impossible to him; for His word is power. (P. O. Matt. 9: 1—8. John 5: 1—14.)

language of the evangelists seems incapable of this meaning; and any injury done to the roof, by breaking it up, might be repaired at a small expense. Jesus did not, in the first instance, remove the man's disorder, but pronounced his sins forgiven. (Marg. Ref. k.) This afforded the scribes the occasion for which they were waiting; and though they did not openly declare their sentiments, they inwardly thought Him guilty of blasphemy.

(4.) The explanation here given by Scott is unsatisfactory. Would four men, perhaps strangers, take so great a liberty as to unroof the house of another? Besides, removing the earth, rafters, and other materials of the roof, would have endangered the crowd below. There is an easier solution. Over the court or yard of eastern houses, was usually spread a large awning to screen from the sun. Roof here means covering or awning. The four men carried the paralytic up the private stairs, on the outside, to the top of the house, which was flat roofed, uncovered the awning by losing one or more of the fastenings which were probably fixed to the parapet, and let him down, (as it should be rendered,) not through, but along the tiling. But it is said, 'and when they had broken it up,' &c. These words may refer, not as Scott and others suppose, to the roof, but to the bed. They brought him upon the bed or bierstead to the roof, then broke it up, or took it apart, and formed a couch of the sacking, which was easily let down into the yard. So in Luke 5: 19, we read, 'he men brought the sick of the palsy to the roof in a bed, and let him down with his couch.' The above accords with the opinions of Jam. Doddridge, Shair, T. Taylor, So Robinson's Calme, art. Houses; but see note on Luke: 19. Ed.

13 ¶ And he went forth again * by the sea-side, * and all the multitude resorted unto him, and he taught them.

14 And as he passed by, * he saw Levi the son of * Alpheus sitting at the * receipt of custom, and said unto him, * Follow me. And he arose, and followed him.

15 And it came to pass, that, * as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples: for there were many, and they followed him.

16 And when the scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto his disciples: * How is it that he eateth and drinketh with * publicans and sinners?

17 When Jesus heard it, he saith unto them, * They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: * I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

18 ¶ And * the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast: and they come and say unto him, * Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not?

his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves: this proves him to be God, and that He had authority to forgive sins; for He searched the heart, and knew what was in man, Rev. 2: 23. God's royalties are inseparable, and He that could know thoughts, could forgive sins. This magnifies the grace of Christ, in pardoning sin, that He knew men's thoughts, and therefore knows both the sinfulness of sins, and the particulars of them, and yet is ready to pardon. He proves his power to forgive sin, by his power to cure the palsy, v. 9—11. He would not have pretended to do the one if He could not have done the other; that ye may know that the Son of man, the Messiah, has power on earth to forgive sin, Thou, that art sick of the palsy, arise, take up thy bed. This was a suitable argument in itself. He could not have cured the disease, which was the effect, if He could not have taken away the sin, which was the cause. And besides, his curing diseases was a figure of his pardoning sin, for sin is the disease of the soul. He that could by a word accomplish the sign, could doubtless perform the thing signified. It was suited to them. These carnal scribes would be more affected with such an effect of a pardon, as the cure of the disease, and be sooner convinced by it, than by more spiritual consequences; therefore it was proper to appeal, whether it is easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? The removing of the punishment as such, was the remitting of the sin; He that could go so far in the cure, no doubt could perfect it. See Isa. 33: 24.

VI. The sick man not only arose, perfectly well, but, to show that he had perfect strength, took up his bed, because it lay in the way, and went forth before them all, and they were all amazed, and glorified God, as indeed they ought; saying, * We never saw it on this fashion; never were such wonders done before in our time. Note, Christ's works were without precedent. When we see what He doeth in healing souls, we must own that we never saw the like.

V. 13—17. I. Christ found no house or street large enough to contain his auditory; but upon the strand there might come as many as would. It should seem by this, that our Lord could and did speak loud; for wisdom crieth without, in the places of concourse. Wherever He goes, though to the sea-side, multitudes resort to Him. Wherever the doctrine of Christ is faithfully preached, though driven to corners or deserts, we must follow it.

II. Levi, the same with Matthew, had a place in the custom-house at Capernaum, from which he was denominated a publican; his place fixed him by the water-side, and thither Christ went to meet him. This Levi is here said to be the son of Alpheus or Cleopas, husband to that Mary who was near kinswoman to the virgin Mary; if so, he was brother to James the less, and Jude, and Simon the Canaanite, so that there were four brother apostles. Matthew was probably a loose, extravagant young man, or else, being a Jew, he would never have been a publican. However, Christ called him to follow Him. Paul, though a Pharisee, one of the chief of sinners, was called to be an apostle. With God, through Christ, there is mercy to pardon the greatest sins, and grace to sanctify the greatest sinners. Matthew, a publican, became an evangelist, the first and the fullest in writing the life of Christ. Great sin and scandal, before conversion, are no bar to great gifts, graces, or advancements, after; nay, God may be the more glorified. Christ prevented him with this call; in bodily cures, ordinarily, He was sought unto, but in spiritual cures, He was found of them that sought Him not. For trus s the great peril of sin, that those who are under it, desire not to be made whole.

III. Christ sat at meat in Levi's house, who invited Him and his disciples to the farewell feast he made to his friends, when he left all to attend Christ: such a feast he made, as Elisha did, (1 Kings 19: 21.) to show with what thankfulness to God he quitted all, in compliance with Christ's call. Fitly did he make the day of his espousals to Christ a festival day. This was also to testify his respect to Christ, and the grateful sense he had of his kindness in snatching him from the receipt of custom, as a brand out of the burning. Many publicans and sinners sat with Christ in Levi's house; (many belonging to that custom-house;) and they followed Him. They followed Levi; so some understood it, supposing that, like Zaccheus, he was chief among the publicans, and rich; and for that reason the inferior sort attended him for what they could get. Rather they followed Jesus, because of the report they had heard of Him. They did not for conscience' sake leave all to follow Him, but for curiosity they came to Levi's feast, to see Him; whatever brought them thither, they were sitting with Jesus and his disciples. The publicans are ranked with the worst of sinners. (1.) Because commonly they were such; so general were the corruptions in the execution of that office, taking bribes or fees to extortion, and accusing falsely. Luke 3: 13—19. A fair-dealing publican was so rare, that one Sabinus was, after his death, honored with this inscription—Here lies an honest publican. (2.) The Jews had an antipathy to their office, as an affront to the liberty of their nation, and a badge of their slavery, and therefore put them in scandal. Such as these our Lord was pleased to converse with, when He appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh.

IV. The scribes and Pharisees would not come to hear Him preach; but they would come to see Him sit with publicans and sinners. They endeavored to put the disciples out of conceit with their Master, as a Man not of that sanctity that became his character; and therefore put the question to them, How is it, that He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners? Note, It is no new thing for that which is well done and well designed, to be misrepresented, and turned to the reproach of the best of men.

V. Christ stood to what He did, and would not withdraw, though the Pharisees were offended: as Peter afterward did, Gal. 2: 12. Note, Those are too tender of their good name, who, to preserve it with some people, will decline a good work. Christ would not do so. They thought the publicans were to be hated. Christ said, * They are to be pitied, they need a physician; they are sinners, and need a Savior. They thought Christ's character should separate Him from them; * No, saith Christ, * my commission directs Me to them; I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. If the world had been righteous, there had been no occasion for my coming. It is to a sinful world that I am sent, therefore my business lies most with the greatest sinners. Or thus; * I am not come to call the righteous, the proud Pharisees, that think themselves righteous, that ask, Wherein shall we return? (Mal. 3: 7.) but publicans, that own themselves sinners, and are glad to be invited to repent. It is good dealing with those that there is hope of; there is more hope of a fool than of one that is wise in his own conceit, Prov. 26: 12.

V. 18—23. Christ had justified Himself in conversing with publicans and sinners; here 20 But the days will come, when "the Bridegroom shall be taken away from them," and then shall they fast in those days.

22 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles.

23 ¶ And it came to pass, that he went through the cornfields on the sabbath-day; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn.

24 And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, why do they on the sabbath-day that which is not lawful?

25 And he said unto them, Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and

He justifies his disciples; and in what they do according to his will, He will justify them.

1. He justifies them in their not fasting. Why do the Pharisees and the disciples of John fast? The Pharisees fasted twice in the week, (Luke 18: 12.) and probably the disciples of John did so too; and this very day, perhaps, was their fast-day, which aggravated the offence. Strict professors often make their own practice a standard, and censure all that do not come up to it. They invidiously suggest, that if Christ went among sinners to do good, yet the disciples went to indulge their appetites, for they never knew what it was to deny themselves. Note, Ill-will always suspects the worst.

Christ pleads in excuse of his disciples not fasting.

1. That these were easy days with them, and fasting was not seasonable. v. 19, 20. There is a time for all things. Those that enter into the married state, must expect trouble in the flesh, yet, during the nuptial solemnity, they are merry, and think it becomes them to be so; it was absurd for Samson's bride to weep before him, during the days that the feast lasted, Judg. 14: 17. Christ and his disciples were but newly married, the Bridegroom was yet with them, the nuptials were yet celebrating; (Matthew's particularly;) when the Bridegroom should be removed from them, then would be a proper time to sit as a widow, in solitude and fasting.

2. These were early days with them, and they were not able for severe exercises of religion. The Pharisees had accustomed themselves to such austerities; and John Baptist was an hungered, he, and they that were with him?

26 How he went into the house of God, in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shew-bread, which is not lawful to eat, but for the priests, and gave also to them which were with him?

27 And he said unto them, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath." Therefore 28 Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.

II. He justifies them in plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath, which a disciple of the Pharisees would not dare to have done; for it was contrary to an express tradition of the elders. In this instance, as in that before, they reflect upon the discipline of Christ, as not so strict as theirs: so common it is for those who deny the power of godliness, to be jealous for the form, and censorious of those who affect not their form.

Observe, 1. What poor repeat the disciples had on a sabbath morning; (v. 23,) they plucked the ears of corn. They forgot their necessary food; the Word of God was to them in-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-23. While the servants of Christ call on sinners to forsake all and follow Him, and meet with some success, there are many who accuse them of being enemies to morality; not understanding that 'Christ came, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' Christ himself did not escape such slanders; we should therefore be willing to bear them, as well as careful not to deserve them. If we omit such things as are not needful or seasonable, or do that which is not sinful, we may quietly leave Him to plead our cause. But we should attend to every part of our duty, in its proper season; and ministers should be cautious, in dealing with the weak but conscientious, not to discourage them. They should insist on the practice of holiness, the observance of the Lord's day, and of divine ordinances, in subserviency to their real good and that of others; but not be so exact in doubtful externals, as to interfere with genuine piety and justice; or with any thing, which may glorify God, or do good to men. (P. O. Matt. 9: 9-17.)

(22.) The bottles here referred to were skins of small animals sewed up—the neck of the skin serving for the neck of the bottle. When new, they were elastic and strong. When old, they were rotten and unyielding, and therefore unsafe depositories for new wine, which must have room for fermentation. See engraving at Matt. 9: 17. Ed. Our Savior's meaning. Why, say the Pharisees, do not thy disciples fast? He answers, because I am with them, and, in these times of joy, fasting would be as much out of place as fasting at a wedding. It would exhibit the folly of a person who should mend an old garment with large patches of new cloth, which, as soon as there came any strain upon them, would tear out the old, and make the rent worse; or of one who should put new wine into old, and decayed, and unelastic bottles, which, in the fermentation of the wine, would certainly burst.

Verses 23-26.

(Notes. Matt. 12: 1-8.) 'Abiathar the high priest.' Ahimelech was high priest when David took the shew-bread; but Abiathar, his son, was chief priest under him, and probably superintended the tabernacle. Ahimelech was soon after slain; and Abiathar became high priest, and continued in that office till after the death of David. He was more eminent than his father, and this shows the evangelist's reason for inserting his name, rather than Ahimelech's. 1 Sam. 21: 1-9, 22: 18-29, 23: 1-6, 2 Sam. 8: 15-14, 1 Kings 2: 26, 27.

(36.) High priest. The word is used either for high priest or chief priest: but generally in the singular, it denotes the high priest; in the plural, the chief priests.

Verses 27, 29.

(27.) 'The Jews, in carrying their observance of the sabbatical law into frivolous and childish absurdities, acted as if man were made for the Sabbath; whereas the Sabbath is a gift, for the refreshment of our bodies, and the improvement of our souls.'

GURNEY.

'Hereby God plainly shows, that it is neither out of indigence or interest that He requires men to worship and obey Him, but only out of goodness, and to make them happy.' Dr. A. CLARKE. (28.) Therefore. But how does it follow that the Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath? He had just before established his right to a divine prerogative—the forgiveness of sins. He is therefore the Son of man with power. If now the sabbath was an immutable institution, and man had been created merely to put honor upon it, as the conduct of the Jews would lead one to suppose, then would the Author of the sabbath claim no further right to change any thing concerning it. But if it was instituted for man's good, then is the Son of man its Lord, to change the day, or the manner of observing it, or make any alteration in it which man's good may demand.

Ed.

The sabbath was originally instituted for the good of man even before the fall: (Notes. Gen. 2: 2, 3.) and it was enjoined after the fall, as still more needful for men, living in society, having many troubles; the creatures of God, preparing for eternal happiness or misery, and sinners under a dispensation of mercy: but man was not made for the sabbath. When a strict observance of the external rest would be injurious to the individual, or to others, in an enlarged view of the subject, 'the Lord of the sabbath,' has granted him a license to dispense with it: but not on any other account. CHAP. III.

Jesus returned a man's withered hand in the synagogue, on the sabbath, 1-5. The Pharisees conspire his death: He retires, is followed by multitudes, and heals many, 6-12. He chooses twelve apostles, 13-19. His friends look upon Him as beside himself, 20, 21. He confutes the blasphemous absurdity of the scribes, who ascribe his casting out devils to the power of Beelzebub, 22-27. Note who in the will of God are regarded as his nearest relations, 31-35.

AND he entered again into the synagogue: and there was a man there which had a withered hand.

2 And they watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath-day; that they might accuse him.

3 And he saith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth.

4 And he saith unto them, Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath-days, or to do evil? to save life, or to kill? But they held their peace.

5 And when he had looked round about on them, with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, he saith unto the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it out; and his hand was restored whole as the other.

stead of that; and their zeal for it was not at all the same. The Jews made it a piece of religion, to eat dainty food on sabbath days, but the disciples were content with any thing.

2. Even this was grudged them by the Pharisees, upon supposition that it was not lawful to pluck the ears of corn on the Sabbath; that it was as much a servile work as reaping; (v. 24.) Why do they on the Sabbath that which is not lawful? Note, If Christ's disciples do that which is unlawful, Christ will be reflected upon, as here, and dishonor will redound to his name. When the Pharisees thought Christ did amiss, they told the disciples; (v. 16.) now when they thought the disciples did amiss, they spake to Christ, to sow discord between Christ and his disciples.

3. Christ defended them by a good precedent, in David's eating the shew-bread, when there was no other bread to be had; (v. 25, 26.) Have ye never read? Note, Many of our mistakes would be rectified, and censures of others corrected, if we would recollect what we have read in the Scripture. You have read that David, the man after God's own heart, when he was hungry, ate the shew-bread, which by the law none might eat, but priests and their families.

Note, Ritual observances must give way to moral obligations: and that may, in a case of necessity, which otherwise may not, be done. This, it is said, David did in the days of Abiathar the high-priest; or just before the days of Abiathar, who immediately succeeded Ahimelech, his father, in the pontificate, and it is probable, was at that time his father's assistant, in the office; and he it was, that escaped the massacre, and brought the ephod to David.

Again, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. This we had not in Matthew. The Sabbath is a divine institution; but we must receive it as a privilege, not as a task. God never designed it to be an imposition, and therefore we must not make it so. Man was not made for the Sabbath; for he was made a day before the Sabbath. Man was made for God, and for his service, and he must rather die than deny Him; but he was not made for the Sabbath, so as to be tied up by it, for that which is necessary to life. God designed it to be an advantage to us, and so we must make it. He made it for man. He had regard to our bodies, that they might rest, and not be tired out with constant business; (Deut. 5: 14.) that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest. Now He that intended the sabbath-rest for the repose of our bodies, certainly never intended it should restrain us, in a case of necessity, from the necessary supports of the body; it must be construed so as not to contradict itself—for edification, and not for destruction. He had much more regard to our souls. The Sabbath was made a day of rest, in order to communion with God, and thanksgiving; and the rest from worldly business is necessary, that we may apply ourselves to this work, in public and private; but then time is allowed us to fit our bodies for the service of our souls in God's service. See here, (1.) What a good Master we serve, all whose institutions are for our own benefit; it is not

He but we, that are gainers by our service. (2.) What we should aim at in our sabbath-work, the good of our own souls. If the Sabbath was made for man, we should then ask ourselves at night, 'What am I the better for this sabbath?' (3.) We ought not to make those exercises of religion burdens to ourselves or others, which God ordained to be blessings; neither adding unreasonable strictness, nor indulging corruptions adverse to the command, for thereby we make devout exercises a penance, which otherwise would be a pleasure.

Again, The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath; and He will not see the kind intentions of the institution frustrated. Note, The sabbath days are days of the Son of man, and to his honor must be observed; by Him God made the worlds, and by Him the Sabbath was first instituted; by Him God gave the law at mount Sinai, and so the fourth commandment was his law; and that alteration shortly to be made, one day forward, was to be in remembrance of his resurrection, and therefore the Christian Sabbath was to be called the Lord's day, (Rev. 1: 10.) and the Son of man, as Mediator, is always to be looked upon as Lord of the Sabbath. This argument He insists upon in his own justification, when charged with having broken the Sabbath, John 5: 16.

CHAP. III. v. 1-12. Our Lord Jesus is busy in the synagogue and by the sea-side, to teach us that his presence should not be confined either to one or the other, but wherever any are gathered together in his name, He is in the midst of them. In every place where He records his name, He will meet his people, and bless them; it is his will that men pray every where.

1. When He entered again into the synagogue, He improved the opportunity of doing good, and wrought a miracle for the confirmation of this truth—that it is lawful to do good on the sabbath day. We had the narrative Matt. 12: 9.

1. The patient had a withered hand, by which he was disabled to work for his living; those that are so, are the most proper objects of charity; let those be helped, that cannot help themselves.

2. The spectators were very unkind. Instead of interceding for a neighbor, they did what they could to hinder his cure: they intimated that if Christ cured on the Sabbath, they would accuse Him as a sabbath-breaker. It had been very unreasonable, if they should have opposed a physician in helping misery; much more absurd was it to oppose Him that cured without labor, but by a word.

3. Christ dealt fairly with the spectators and with them first, to prevent the offence, and to convince their judgment. He hid the man stand forth, (v. 3.) that they might be moved with compassion, and not account his cure a crime. Then He appeals to conscience; Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath days, or to do evil? Whether is better, to save life, or to kill? What fairer question could be put? Yet, they held their peace. Note, Those are obstinate indeed in infidelity, who, when they

NOTES.

CHAP. III. v. 1-5. (Notes, 2: 23-23. Matt. 12: 9-13.) When Christ demanded, 'whether it was lawful to do good, or evil, on the sabbath-day; to save life, or to kill.' He referred to the secret intentions of the scribes and Pharisees to compass his death. While they were forming designs of murder in the synagogue, and on the Sabbath, he bled Him for doing good, even in subserviency to the salvation of their souls.

(1.) This they did moreover, in opposition to one of their own approved maxims, that he who neglected to preserve life when it was in his power, was a murderer.

This excited his holy indignation: but their exposure to misery, and the hardness of their hearts, caused Him also to grieve over them, as well as for the mischief which they did to the people.

(4.) Is it lawful, &c. It seems from St. Matthew's narrative, that the enemies of Christ first asked Him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-days? He answered them by the question here stated, Is it lawful to do good, or not to do good when he can, doeth evil; it being evil, to neglect doing good, or showing kindness to misery; and not to preserve life when in danger, is to transgress the precept which saith, 'Thou shalt not kill.' Whitby. (Note, 1 John 3: 16, 17.)

Hold their peace.' Conscience-smitten.'

DODDIDGE.

(5.) Anger. Hence we learn, that anger is not always sinful; 'being found in Him in whom was no sin.' But anger is not properly defined a desire of revenge, or causing grief to him who hath grieved us: this desire of revenge is always evil; and though our Savior was angry with the Pharisees for the hardness of their hearts, yet He had great compassion for them. Whitby. Our Lord's anger was not sinful: it was a holy indignation, a perfectly right state of heart: the want of it would have been sinful. It would show a want of filial respect for a son to hear, without emotion, his father aspersed. Would it not then be a want of reverence for God, to hear his name blasphemed, without disapprobation? Vengeance belongs to the ruler exclusively: he may grieve at the necessity of thus expressing his disapprobation of crimes; but it is his duty. Eli ought to have shown anger, as well as grief, at the conduct of his sons. (Notes, 1 Sam. 2: 23-34. 3: 11-14.) Parents, masters, and magistrates may sin, in not expressing just displeasure; and anger is only sinful, when it springs from selfishness and malevolence; or when causeless, or above the cause; and when expressed by unbalanced words and actions. (Notes, Matt. 5: 21, 22. Eph. 4: 26, 27.)

sees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against him, how they might destroy him.

7 But Jesus withdrew himself with his disciples to the sea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed him, and from Judea,

8 And from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things he did, came unto him.

9 And he spake to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him, because of the multitude, lest they should throng him.

10 For he had healed many, insomuch that they pressed upon him to touch him, as many as had plagues.

11 And unclean spirits, when they saw him, fell down before him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God.

12 And he straightly charged them, that they should not make him known.

13 ¶ And he goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him can say nothing against a truth, will say nothing to it; and, when they cannot resist, will not yield.

When they rebelled against the light, He lamented their stubbornness: (v. 5.) He looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. The sin He had an eye to, was, the hardness of their hearts, their insensibleness to the evidence of miracles, and their resolution in unbelief. We hear and see what is done amiss; but Christ looks at the root of bitterness in the heart. He looked round upon them; for they were so many, that they surrounded Him; He looked with anger; his anger, it is probable, appeared in his countenance; his anger was, like God's, without the least perturbation to Himself, but not without great provocation from us. Note, Sin is very displeasing to Jesus Christ; and the way to be angry, and not sin, is, to be angry, as Christ was, at nothing but sin. Let hard-hearted sinners think of the anger with which He will look round upon them, when the great day of his wrath comes! He was grieved for the hardness of their hearts; as God was grieved forty years for the hardness of the hearts of their fathers in the wilderness. Note, It is a great grief to Jesus, to see sinners bent upon ruin, and obstinately set against conviction and recovery, for He would not that any should perish. This is a good reason why the hardness of our hearts and of others, should grieve us.

4. Christ dealt very kindly with the patient; He hid him stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. Christ has hereby taught us resolution in duty, how violent soever the opposition. We must deny ourselves sometimes in pleasure and convenience, rather than give offence even to those who causelessly take it, but we must serve God, and do good, though offence be taken at it. None could be more tender of giving offence than Christ; yet rather than send this man away uncured, He would venture offending all the scribes and Pharisees. He hath hereby given us a specimen of his grace on souls: our hands are spiritually withered, our souls weakened by sin. The great healing-day is the Sabbath, and the healing-power is of Christ. The command is like this recorded here; and as rational and just, though our hands are withered, and we cannot of ourselves stretch them forth, we must as well as we can, lift them up in prayer, lay hold on Christ and eternal life, and if we do our endeavor, power goes with the word of Christ. Though our hands be withered, yet, if we will not offer to stretch them out, it is our own fault that we are not healed; but if we do, and are healed, Christ must have all the glory.

5. The enemies of Christ dealt barbarously with Him. Such a work of mercy should have engaged their love, and such a work of wonder their faith. Instead of that, the Pharisees, oracles in the church, and the Herodians, supporters of the state, though of opposite interests, took counsel together against Him, how they might destroy Him. Note, They that suffer for doing good, do but suffer as their Master did.

II. He then withdrew to the sea, to teach us in troublous times to consult our own safety; but He was followed into retirement.

When some drove Him out of their country others followed Him wherever He went; and the enmity of their leaders to Christ did not cool their respect. Great multitudes followed Him from all parts of the nation; as far north, as from Galilee; as far south, as from Judea and Jerusalem; nay, and from Idumea; as far east, as from beyond Jordan; and west, as from about Tyre and Sidon, v. 7, 8. What induced them to follow Him, was the report they heard of the great things He did for all that applied to Him; some wished to see One that had done such great things, and others hoped He would do great things for them. Note, The consideration of the great things Christ has done, should engage us to come to Him, v. 10. They pressed upon Him, to touch Him, as many as had plagues. Diseases are here called plagues, chastisements; so they are designed to be, for our sins, that thereby we may be made sorry, and not return to them. Those that were under these scourgings, came to Jesus; sickness is sent, to quicken us to inquire after Christ, as our Physician. They pressed upon Him, each striving which should get nearest. They fell down before Him, as petitioners for favor; they desired leave but to touch Him, having faith to be healed, not only by his touching them, but by their touching Him; which no doubt they had many instances of, v. 9. He then spake to his disciples, who were fishermen, and had boats at command, that a small ship should constantly wait on Him, to carry Him from place to place on the same coast; that, when He had despatched the necessary business in one place, He might easily remove to another, where his presence was requisite, without pressing through crowds. Wise men, as much as they can, decline a crowd.

He did not withdraw, to be idle, nor send back those who rudely crowded after Him when He withdrew, but took it kindly, and gave them what they came for; for He never said to any that sought Him diligently, Seek ye in vain. (1.) Diseases were effectually cured; He healed many patients, ill of divers diseases. (2.) Devils were effectually conquered; unclean spirits, when they saw Him, trembled at his presence, and fell down before Him, to deprecate his wrath, and were compelled to own the Son of God, v. 11. It is sad that this great truth should be denied by men, who may have the benefit of it, when a confession of it has so often been extorted from devils, who are excluded from having benefit by it. (3.) Christ sought not applause to himself in doing those things, for He strictly charged those for whom He did them, that they should not make Him known; (v. 12.) that they should not be industrious to spread the notice of his cures, but let them leave his own works to praise Him. Let not those that are cured, be forward to divulge it, lest it should feed their pride; but let the standers-by carry intelligence of it. When we do what is praiseworthy, and not covet to be praised of men, the same mind is in us, which was in Christ Jesus.

Verses 13–19.

Notes, Matt. 10:1–4.) This appointment of the twelve apostles seems to have occurred some time before they were sent forth to preach (6:7–12.) The surname of ‘Boanerges,’ or ‘sons of thunder,’ given to James and John, doubtless related to the energy with which they addressed men’s consciences, awakened their fears, and showed them their need of salvation. (Notes, Jer. 23:23, 29.) ‘Christ seems to have given it from a foresight of the heat and zeal of their temper, of which they quickly gave an instance, in their desire to call down fire from heaven, to consume the Samaritans. (Luke 9:54.)—Hence we find in the Acts, Peter and John are the chief actors in the defence of the Gospel: and the zeal of James and Peter seems to be the reason, why the one was slain by Herod, and the other imprisoned.’ Whitty. It is evident, that John, as well as James, was naturally of a sanguine disposition: but when sanctified, it constituted that zealous, affectionate temper, which appears in his writings, and which, though it was the result of his loving spirit, (I suppose, because he so much imitates love,) as if he had been incapable of giving reproofs and awful warnings, seem to have mistaken his character: for no part of the Scripture is more suited to give offence to all hypocritical professors than his first epistle; or even to put inconsistent Christians to a stand, and make them question their own sincerity. must be set apart with prayer for the Spirit, though Christ had authority to confer the gifts of the Holy Ghost, yet, to set us an example, He prayed for them.

2. The rule He went by was his own pleasure; He called unto Him whom He would. Not such as we should have thought fittest to be called, looking upon the countenance, and the stature; but such as He thought fit to call, and determined to fit for the service to which He called them; even so, because it seemed good in thine eyes. Christ calls whom He will; his grace is his own.

3. He called them to separate themselves from the crowd, and stand by Him, and they came. Christ calls those who were given Him; (John 17: 6.) and all that the Father gave Him, shall come to Him, John 6: 37. Those whom it was his will to call, he made willing; his people shall be willing in the day of his power. Perhaps they came to Him readily, in expectation of temporal power; but when undeceived, yet they had such a prospect of better things, that they would not say they were deceived in their Master, nor repented their leaving all.

4. He ordained them, (probably by the imposition of hands, a ceremony among the Jews,) that they should be with Him constantly, to be witnesses of his doctrine, manner of life, and patience, that they might fully know it, and be able to give an account of it; and especially that they might attest his miracles; they must be with Him, to receive instructions, that they might be qualified to give instructions to others. It would require time to fit them for that which He designed them for; for they must be sent forth to preach; not to preach till they were sent, and not to be sent till by a long acquaintance with Christ they were fitted. Note, Christ's ministers must be much with Him.

5. He gave them to work miracles; and hereby put great honor upon them. He ordained them to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils. They showed that the power of Christ was original; not as a Servant, but as a Son in his own house, in that He could confer it upon others; they have a rule in law, He that is only deputed himself, cannot depute another; but our Lord had life in Himself, and the Spirit

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-19. Acts of charity can never be unseasonable; it is as awful 'to do good' to man, as it is proper to attend on the worship of God, on the Lord's day. But selfish and malicious men, who project wickedness in the midst of ostentatious devotion, are prone to censure good works, which they will not imitate; and are especially glad to find something to condemn in those, who are laboring to promote the salvation of souls, and to show the vanity of their assumed religion.—While we persevere in doing good, we may properly express an indignant abhorrence of wickedness; but it should be connected with compassion for opposers, and earnest desires of their salvation.—The rage and enmity of enemies will increase, in proportion as the power and grace of Christ are glorified; and unbelievers, of opposite sentiments and characters, will combine against evangelical godliness; but if we be at any time compelled to retire from their rage, we ought to seek for other opportunities of usefulness. What multitudes thronged after Jesus, to hear his word, and

Verses 20, 21.

Many objections have been made to this interpretation: yet I can have no doubt, that it is the real meaning of the passage. Some of Christ's relatives or acquaintances might think Him 'beside Himself' for the same reason that Festus and others did Paul; and in their natural affection for Him, might purpose to use compulsion, if persuasion would not prevail: and even his pious relatives might possibly be without measure; He could give power even to the weak and foolish.

6. He ordained twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Israel. They are here named, not just in the same order as in Matthew, nor by couples, as there; but as there, so here, Peter is first, and Judas last. Here Matthew is before Thomas, probably being called in the order; but in the catalogue of Matthew, he puts himself after Thomas; so far was he from insinuating upon precedence of consecration. Mark only notices in this list of the apostles, that Christ called James and John Boanerges, sons of thunder; perhaps they were remarkable for a commanding voice, they were thundering preachers; or, it denotes the fervency of their spirits, which would make them active for God above their brethren. These two (saith Dr. Hammond) were to be eminent ministers, which is called a voice shaking the earth, Heb. 12: 26. Yet John, one of those sons of thunder, was full of tenderness, and was the beloved disciple.

7. They went into a house. Now that this journey was unimpeded, they stood together, to hearken to their evidence. They went to settle the orders of their infant-college; and now, it is likely, the bag was given to Judas, which made him easy.

II. Continual crowds attended Christ's motions; v. 20. The multitude cometh together again, unseasonably, so that He and his disciples could not get time so much as to eat bread. Yet He did not shut his doors against them, but hid them welcome, and gave each an answer of peace. Note, They whose hearts are enlarged in the work of God, can easily bear with great inconveniences, and will rather lose a meal at any time than an opportunity of doing good. It is happy when zealous hearers and zealous preachers meet. Now the kingdom of God was preached, and men pressed into it, Luke 16: 16. This was a gale of opportunity worth improving.

III. (v. 21.) When his friends in Capernaum heard how He was followed, and what pains He took, they went out, to lay hold on Him, and fetch Him home, for they said, He is beside himself. Some understand it of a care, which had more in it of reproach than of share the beneficent effects of his miracles! Yet how few were willing to avow their relation to Him, when the time of suffering arrived! He knew their inconstancy; but we should be upon our guard; for popular applause is very dangerous and no more to be trusted than the calm of the ocean.—All our sicknesses and calamities spring from the anger of God against sin; and the removal of them, or the sanctifying blessing on them, was purchased for us by the sufferings of Christ. But the maladies of our hearts are chiefly to be deprecated: He can cure these also by a touch or word; and unclean spirits knowing Him to be 'the Son of God,' are still constrained to obey Him. May increasing numbers press to be healed and delivered from these enemies: may He send forth more of such, as have 'been with Him,' to be instruments in this blessed work: may all his ministers be 'sons of thunder,' to speak his word with energy; and may no Judas be among those who declare his truths!

respect; we must take it as we read it, He is beside himself; they suspected it themselves, or it was suggested to them, and they gave credit to the suggestion, that He was distracted, and therefore his friends ought to bind Him, and bring Him to his right mind. (See Scott's note, p. 301.) His kindred, many of them, had mean thoughts of Him, (John 7: 5.) and were willing to hearken to this ill construction which some put upon his great zeal, and to take Him off from his work. The prophets were called mad fellows, 2 Kings 9: 11. Others understand it of a well-meaning care; 'He fainteth, He has no time to eat bread, He will be stifled with the crowd, and will have his spirits exhausted with speaking, and the virtue that goes out of Him in his miracles; and therefore let us use friendly violence.' In preaching, as well as suffering, He was attacked with, Master, spare thyself. Note, They who go on with zeal in the work of God, must expect hindrances, both from the disaffection of enemies, and the mistaken affection of friends; they have need to stand upon their guard against both.

V. 22-30. 1. The scribes, that they might evade and invalidate conviction, came down from Jerusalem, v. 22, it would seem, on purpose to hinder the progress of the doctrine of Christ; such pains did they take to do mischief; and, coming from Jerusalem, polite and learned, where they had opportunity of consulting together against the Lord and his Anointed, they were in the greater capacity to do mischief; the reputation of scribes from Jerusalem would influence not only country-people, but country-scribes; they had never thought of this suggestion concerning Christ's miracles till the scribes came from Jerusalem. They could not deny but that He cast out devils, but they insinuated that He was in league with the prince of the devils. There is a trick in the case; Satan is not cast out, he only goes out by consent. There was nothing in the manner of Christ's casting out devils, that gave any cause to suspect this; He did it as one having authority; but so they will have it, who resolve not to believe.

II. The answer Christ gave to this objection was,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20-35. If we were as earnest as our Lord, 'instant in season and out of season,' in every good work, we should count no hour improper, no situation inconvenient; but we also should find, that our carnal or injudicious friends would deem us 'beside ourselves,' and use all their influence to lessen our diligence. Prudence indeed is commendable, but extremely apt to degenerate into lukewarmness and timidity; and zeal like that of Christ will seldom escape the charge of being excessive from the more decent part of mankind, or even from professors of the Gospel, who can scarcely conceive, that invisible things require more earnestness, than our most important temporal concerns. (Note, 2 Kings 9: 11.) Proud and malignant enemies will not stop here: they will impute the most beneficial effects to the basest motives or causes; and maintain that men are doing Satan's work, when sinners are brought to repentance and newness of life. Let them beware how they ascribe the operations of the Holy Ghost to the power of the devil; or deride and revile them: for in so doing, they may be guilty of such blasphemy, as shall expose them to eternal damnation. Let the servants of Christ go on with their work, depending on his power, avoiding all contentions with each other; then they will have an almighty Helper, ready to overcome their enemy, and deliver sinners from his dominion. Let all those who hear, obey the Savior, rejoice in their relation to Him, 'as his brother, his sister, or his mother;' and conduct themselves towards fellow Christians, however mean, as they would to Christ Himself, if on earth, in the same circumstances; and this, as they hope to meet Him with confidence at the judgment.'

Wholly, 'she was, no doubt, an excellent character, but not perfect: she is entitled to great estimation, but surely not to religious worship. (Notes, 322 Luke 2: 41-52. John 2: 1-5.)—(35.) My mother, &c. Notes, Matt. 7: 21-23. 25: 34-40. Luke 11: 27, 28. John 19: 25-27.—The instruction conveyed in this observation of our Lord, that we also should consider all obedient believers as his brethren and sisters for his sake, is too much overlooked, and too seldom, or too slightly pressed home to the hearts and consciences of Christians, who are stewards of God.

The brethren of our Lord were disaffected towards Him, as appears. John 7: 3-11, and did not believe in Him. These probably are the friends mentioned, v. 21, who thought Him beside Himself, and who now, from no good motive, perhaps, had come to call Him from his work. The pious mother, influenced by the misrepresentations of her other children, or by her own unjustifiable anxieties, had come with them for the same purpose. This may account for the severity with which the Sa^r treats their message.

CHAP. IV.

¹ He sowed the seed. 1-9. Why Christ taught by parables, 10-13. The interpretation of the parable, 14-20. Knowledge is given in order to be communicated, 21, 22. A call to hear with attention, 23-25. The parable of seed sown, imperceptibly growing up, and ripening by harvest, 26-29; that of the grain of mustard-seed, 30-32. Christ teaches only by parables, which He explains to his disciples, 33, 34. He still is a tempest by his word 35-41.

AND^a he began again to teach by the sea-side: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude,^b so that he entered into a ship and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land.

2 And he taught them many things^c by parables, and said unto them^d in his doctrine,

3 'Hearken; Behold, there went out a sower to sow:

4 And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the way-side,^e and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up.

5 And some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth, and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth:

6 But when^f the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had no root it withered away.

7 And some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked it, and it yielded^g no fruit.

8 And other^h fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprang up, and increased, and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred.

9 And he said unto them, 'He that hath ears to hear let him hear.

10 ¶ Andⁱ when he was alone, they that were about him, with the twelve, asked of him the parable,

11 And he said unto them, 'Unto you it is preaching, not only stood without, having no desire to come in, and hear Him, but sent a message to call Him out to them, (p. 31, 32.) as if He must leave his work, to hearken to their importunities; it is probable they had no business with Him, only to oblige Him to break off, lest He should kill himself. He knew how far his strength would go, and preferred the salvation of souls before his own life; it was therefore idle for them, under pretence of sparing Him, to interrupt Him; and it was worse, if they had business with Him, when they knew He preferred his business as a Savior, to any other business.

Christ, as at other times, put a comparative neglect upon his mother, to prevent the extravagant respect which men in after-times would be apt to pay her. Our respect ought to be governed by Christ; now the virgin Mary, or Christ's mother, is not equalled with ordinary believers, on whom Christ here puts a superlative honor. He looked upon those that sat about Him, and pronounced those of them that not only heard, but did, the will of God, to be as much esteemed as his nearest relations, p. 33-35. This is a good reason why we should honor those that fear the Lord; why we should be not hearers of the Word only, but doers, that we may share with the saints in this honor. It is good to be akin to those who are nearly allied to Christ, and to have fellowship with those that have fellowship with Christ; and woe to those who persecute Christ's kindred, his bone and his flesh, every one resembling the children of a king; (Judges 8: 18, 19.) for He will plead their cause.

CHAP. IV. v. 1-20. The foregoing chapter began with Christ's entering into the synagogue; (p. 1.) this with His teaching again by the sea-side. Thus He changed his method, that all might be reached. To gratify people that had seats, chief seats, in the synagogue, and did not care for hearing a sermon any where else, He went often into the synagogue; yet, to gratify the poor, that could not get room in the synagogue, He did not always preach there, but began again to teach by the sea-side, where they could hear. We are debtors both to the wise and to the unwise, Rom. 1: 14.

Here seems to be a new convenience found out; (ch. 2: 13.) his standing in a ship, while his hearers stood upon the land; and that inland sea of Tiberias having no tide, there was no ebb and flow of the waters to disturb them. Christ's carrying his doctrine into a ship, was a presage of his sending the Gospel to the isles of the Gentiles, and the shipping of that rich cargo, from the Jewish nation, to a people that would bring forth more fruit.

The way of teaching that Christ used with the multitude, (p. 2.) was by similitudes, which would tempt them to hear. People love to be spoken to in their own language, and careless hearers will catch at a comparison from common things, and retain that, when they have lost the truth which it was designed to illustrate; but, unless they would take pains to search into it, it would but amuse them; seeing, they would see, and not perceive, (p. 12.) and so, while it gratified curiosity, it was the punishment of their stupidity; they wilfully shut their eyes against the light, and therefore Christ put it into the dark lantern of a parable, which had a bright side toward those who were willing to be guided by it; but to those who were only willing to play with it, it gave a flash of light, but sent them away in the dark. It is just with God to say of those that will not see, that they shall not see, and to hide from their eyes, who only look with carelessness upon the things that belong to their peace.

When He was alone by himself, not only the twelve, but others, took opportunity to ask Him the meaning of the parables, p. 10. They found it good to be about Christ; good to be with the twelve, to be conversant with those that they were intimate with Him. He told them what a distinguishing favor it was to them, that they were made acquainted with the mystery of the kingdom of God, v. 11. The secret of the Lord was with them. That instructed them, which others were only amused with, and they were made to increase in knowledge, while others were never the wiser. Note, Those who know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, must acknowledge that it is given to them; they receive both light and sight from Christ, who, after his resurrection, opened the Scriptures, and the understanding, Luke 24: 27-45.

The parable of the sower, we had, Matt. 13: 3, &c. He begins (p. 3.) with, Hearken. Note, The words of Christ demand attention, and those who speak from Him, should stir it up; even that which as yet we do not thoroughly understand, or not rightly, we must carefully attend to, believing it to be both intelligible and weighty, that we may understand; we shall find more in Christ's sayings than at first there seemed to be.

Here is a question Christ put before He expounded it, which we had not in Matthew; (p. 13.) 'Know ye not this parable?' the meaning of it? How then will ye know all parables? (1.) 'If ye know not this, which is so plain, how will ye understand other parables more dark and obscure? If ye are perplexed with this, which you may see easily, how will ye understand the parables which hereafter will speak of the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, a thing ye have yet no idea of?' Note, This should quicken us both to prayer and pains that we may get knowledge--that there are a great many things which we are concerned to know; and if we understand not the plain truths of the Gospel, how shall we those that are more difficult? If we have run with the footmen, and they have wearied us, how shall we contend with horses? Jer. 12: 5.

(2.) 'If ye know not this, which is intended for your direction in hearing the Word, how shall ye profit by what ye are further to hear? This parable is to teach you to be attentive to the Word, that you may understand it. This is the key to all the rest.' If we understand not the rules we are to observe, in order to profit by the Word, how shall we profit by other rules? Before Christ expounds the parable, [1.] He shows them how sad their case was, who were not let into the meaning of the doctrine of Christ; To you it is given, but not to them. Note, It will help us to put a value upon privileges, to consider the deplorable state of those who want such privileges, especially that they are out of the ordinary way of conversion; lest they should be converted, and their sins

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. v. 1-20. (Notes. Matt. 13: 1-23. Luke 8: 4-15.) See, saith Theophylact, 'how rare are good men, and how few are saved! for only the fourth part of the seed fell on good ground and was preserved. Observe also the gradation. The seed sown in the highway comes not up at all; the seed sown upon stony ground comes up, but increaseth not; the seed sown among thorns increaseth, but bears

'no fruit; the seed sown on good ground brings forth fruit to perfection.' Whittby.

(10.) They that were about, &c. Such as more constantly attended on Christ, as his disciples, with his apostles.-(11.) To them that are without. 'The Jews gave this title to the heathen: our Savior therefore by applying it to them, seems to hint, that in a short time the kingdom of God would be taken from them; and they themselves given to know ^{the} mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto ^{them} that are without, ^{all these things} are done in parables:

12 That ^{seeing} they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should ^{be} converted, and ^{their} sins should be forgiven them.

13 And he saith unto them, ^{Know ye not this parable?} and how then will ye know all parables?

14 The ^{sower} soweth ^{the} word.

15 And ^{these} are they by the way-side, where the word is sown; but, when they have heard, ^{Satan} cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts.

16 And these are they likewise ^{which} are sown on stony ground; who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness;

17 And ^{have} no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time: afterward, ^{when} affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended.

18 And these are they ^{which} are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19 And ^{the} cares of this world, and ^{the} deceitfulness of riches, and ^{the} lusts of other things, entering in, choke the word, and it becometh ^{unfruitful}.

20 And these are they ^{which} are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and bring forth it, and bring forth fruit, some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some ^a hundred.

^{should be forgiven them, v. 12.} Those only who are converted have their sins forgiven them: and it is the misery of unconverted souls, that they lie under unpardoned guilt. [2.] He shows them what a shame it was that they needed such particular explanations of the word, and did not apprehend it at first. Those that would improve in knowledge, must be made sensible of their ignorance.

Let us only observe here, First, That, in the great field of the church, the Word of God is dispensed to all promiscuously; The sower sowneth the word, (v. 14.) at a venture, beside all waters, upon all sorts of ground. (Isa. 32: 20.) He scatters, in order to increase it. Christ was a while sowing Himself; now He sends his ministers, and sows by them. Ministers are sowers; they have need of the skill and discretion of the husbandman; (Isa. 28: 24—26.) they must not observe winds and clouds, (Ecc. 11: 4, 6.) and must look to God, who gives seed to the sower, 2 Cor. 9: 10.

Of the many that hear the Gospel, comparatively few bring forth the fruits of it; here is but one in four that comes to good. It is sad to think how much of the precious seed is sown in vain; but there is a day coming when lost sermons must be accounted for. Many, that have heard Christ preach in their streets, will hereafter be bidden to depart from Him; those therefore who place all their religion in hearing, as if that alone would save them, do but deceive themselves, and build their hope upon the sand, Jam. 1: 22.

Secondly, Many are much affected with the Word for the present, who yet receive no abiding benefit. The motions of soul they have, are like the crackling of thorns under a pot. We read of hypocrites, that they delight to know God's ways; (Isa. 58: 2.) of Herod, that he heard John gladly; (ch. 6: 20.) of others, that they rejoiced in his light: (John 5: 35.) of those to whom Ezekiel saw a lovely song, (Ezek. 33: 32.) and those here received the word with gladness, yet came to nothing.

Thirdly, The reason why the Word doth not leave abiding impressions upon the minds of the people, is, their hearts are not disposed to receive it; the fault is in themselves, not in the Word; some are forgetful hearers, and these get no good at all by the Word; it comes and goes: others have their convictions overpowered by their corruptions.

Fourthly, The devil is very busy about loose hearers, as fowls about seed above ground; when the heart, like the highway, is unploughed, unhumbed, when it lies common, to be trodden on by every passenger, as their's that are great company-keepers, then the devil comes swiftly, and carries away the Word. When, therefore, these fowls come down upon the sacrifices, we should take care, as Abraham did, to drive them away; (Gen. 15: 11.) that, though we cannot keep them from hovering over our heads, we may not let them nestle in our hearts.

21 ¶ And he said unto them, ^{Is} a candle brought to be put under a ^{bushe}, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick?

1 Cor. 5: 12, 13. Col. 4: 5. 1 Thes. 4: 19. 1 Tim. 3: 7. Matt. 13: 13. 1 Deut. 29: 4. Is. 6: 9, 10. 44: 18. Jer. 5: 21. Mic. 1: 13, 14, 15. Luke 8: 10. John 12: 37—41. Acts 28: 25—27. Rom. 11: 8—10. u Jer. 31: 18—20. Ex. 18: 27—32. Acts

Fifthly, Many that are not openly and avowed, so as to throw off their profession, as the stony ground, yet have the efficacy of it secretly choked, so that it comes to nothing; they continue in a barren profession, which brings nothing to pass, and go down as certainly, though more plausibly, to hell.

Sixthly, Impressions that are not deep, will not be durable; like footsteps on the sand of the sea, which are gone the next high tide of persecution; when iniquity doth abound, the love of many to the ways of God waxeth cold; many that keep their profession in fair days, lose it in a storm; as those that go to sea only for pleasure, come back again when the wind rises. It is the ruin of hypocrites, that they have no root; they do not act from a fixed principle; they do not mind heart-work, and without that, religion is nothing; he is the Christian, that is one inwardly.

Seventhly, Many are hindered from profiting by the Word of God, by their abundance of the world. Many a good lesson of self-denial, and heavenly-mindedness, is choked and lost by that prevailing complacency in the world, which they are apt to have on whom it smiles. Many professors, that otherwise might have come to something, prove like Pharaoh's lean kine and thin ears.

Eighthly, Those that are not incumbered with the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, yet lose the benefit of their profession by the lusts of other things; this is added here in Mark, by the desires which are about other things, (so Dr. Hammond,) an inordinate appetite toward those things that are pleasing to sense or fancy. Those that have but little of the world, may yet be ruined by indulgence of the body.

Ninthly, Fruit is the thing that God expects and requires from those that enjoy the Gospel: a temper of mind, and a course of life, agreeable to the Gospel; Christian graces daily exercised, Christian duties daily performed.

Lastly, No good fruit is to be expected but from good seed. If the seed be sown on good ground, if the heart be humble, and holy, and heavenly, there will be good fruit, and it will abound sometimes even to a hundred fold, Gen. 26: 12.

V. 21—34. The lessons which our Savior designs to teach us here, are these:

I. Those who are good, ought to do good; that is, bring forth fruit. God expects a grateful return of his gifts, and a useful improvement; for, (v. 21.) Is a candle brought, to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? No, but that it may be set on a candlestick. The apostles were ordained to receive the Gospel, not for themselves only, but for the good of others. All Christians, as they have received the gift, must minister the same. Note, 1. Gifts and graces make a man as the candle of the Lord, (Prov. 20: 27.) lighted by the Father of lights: the most eminent are but poor lights, compared

Our Lord here gently reproved the dullness of his disciples, and intimated, that, as He had many things to teach in parables, they ought to apply their minds to them, that they might be able to explain them to others. (19.) Lusts of other things. Anxious cares in the poor, and riches in the wealthy, are unfavorable to religious improvement: but the eager pursuit of any earthly object has the same effect.—This addition to the parable, as delivered by Matthew, with very many other variations, (more than could be conceived, without comparing the evangelists in the original,) demonstrate that Mark was no copier of Matthew, even when he recorded the same actions. No seed, except "the Word of God," produces genuine fruit: regenerating grace attends no instruction which does not make the heart fall in with "good ground." (Notes, 1 Cor. 3: 4—9.)

(19.) Lusts of other things. [There is here somewhat of obscurity, which is, perhaps, occasioned by the guarded modesty of the expressions; which I cannot find noticed by any other commentator but Grotius. Certainly, by the "other things," are to be understood gluttony, drunkenness, and "intemperance, and sensuality of every kind."

BLOOMFIELD.

22 For, °there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad.

23 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

24 And he saith unto them, °Take heed what ye hear: °with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that °hear shall more be given.

25 For he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath.

[Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And he said, °So is the kingdom of God, °as if a man should cast seed into the ground;

27 And should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and with the Sun of righteousness. A candle gives light but a little way, and but a little while, and is easily blown out, and continually burning down and wasting. 2. Many, who are lighted as candles, put themselves under a bed, or under a bushel: they do not manifest grace themselves, nor minister grace to others; they have estates, and do no good with them; have limbs and senses, wit and learning, but nobody is the better for them; they have spiritual gifts, but do not use them; like a taper in an urn, they burn to themselves. 3. Those who are lighted as candles, should improve all opportunities of doing good, for the glory of God, and the service of others.

The reason given for this is, there is nothing hid which should not be made manifest, (so it might better be read,) v. 22. There is no treasure of gifts and graces lodged in any but with design to be communicated; nor was the Gospel made a secret to the apostles; it should come abroad, to all the world. Though Christ expounded the parables to his disciples privately, it was to make them more useful; they were taught, that they might teach; and it is a general rule, the ministration of the Spirit is given to every man to profit himself and others.

II. It concerns those who hear the word of the Gospel, to make good use of it, because their real or woe depends upon it. He saith again, If any man hath ears to hear, let him hear, v. 23. Let him give the Gospel of Christ a fair hearing; but it is added, (v. 24.) Take heed what ye hear; Consider what ye hear. Note, What we hear doth us no good, unless we consider it; those especially that are to teach others, must themselves be very observant of the things of God; take notice of the message they deliver, that they may be exact. We likewise take heed what we hear, by proving all things, that we may hold fast that which is good. We must be cautious, lest we be imposed upon. To enforce this caution, consider,

1. As we deal with God, God will deal with us. So Dr. Hammond explains these words, °With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you. If ye be faithful servants to Him He will be a faithful Master to you: with the upright He will show Himself upright.

2. As we improve the talents we are intrusted with, we shall increase them; if we make use of the knowledge we have, it shall grow, as stock in trade. Unto you that hear, shall more be given; to you that have, it shall be given, v. 25.

If the disciples deliver that to the church, which they have received of the Lord, they shall be led more into the secret of the Lord. Gifts and graces multiply by exercise: God has promised to bless the hand of the diligent.

3. If we do not use, we lose, what we have; From him that hath not, that doeth no good with what he hath, and so hath it in vain, shall be taken even that he hath. Burying a talent is the betraying of a trust, and amounts to a forfeiture; gifts and graces rust for want of wear.

III. The Gospel by degrees, produces wonderful effects, but without noise; (v. 26, &c.) So is the kingdom of God, the Gospel when received, as seed in good ground.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-25. While we lament, that so few are instructed, and that so large a majority of those who are favored, derive no benefit from it; let us look to our own hearts, that they be not as fallow ground, or 'the way-side,' through carelessness and inattention.—Satan is ever active in preventing the success of the Gospel: and if men do not immediately secure what they have heard, by meditation and obedience, he will immediately take it away. No impressions will be durable, which are not deep: the heart, that is not broken, and changed, will not be made fruitful; and superficial convictions or affections will gradually vanish: this will especially be evident when 'persecution and affliction arise because of the Word.' We cannot be real Christians, if we 'have not that root in ourselves,' which would withstand persecution; but many prove, even in the most quiet times, how they would act in trying circumstances, while 'the cares of the world, and the lusts of other things, choke the Word, and it becometh unfruitful.' Let us then earnestly beseech the Lord, that, by his grace, our hearts may become 'good ground'; that the good seed may produce a large increase in our lives, of those good works, 'which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God.' Thus will it appear, that 'to us it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God,' while numbers know it not, because of the pride and carnality of their hearts, being given up by God.—Unless we understand this parable of the Sower, which is so plain and universally interesting, how shall we understand divine mysteries? Let us then attend more diligently to instruction, and pray for a teachable disposition, and for illumination: for we are called to 'shine as lights' in the world: and though our light is only as a candle, compared with 'the Sun of righteousness;' yet we may hope to receive from Him, and to communicate some rays of heavenly wisdom; provided we do not put our candle under a bushel, but let it shine before men, in our profession and conversation.—Though no human teaching can make 'the natural man receive the things of the Spirit of God;' yet it is our business to make known the truths of the Gospel, according to the duties of our stations. But, as so many discordant doctrines are propagated on every side, it is incumbent on us to take heed what, as well as how, we hear. If we believe, and impart to others, the truths of Scripture, blessings will be measured to us in great abundance; but woe to those, who reject or conceal the light, which Christ came to diffuse. All their earthly possessions, admired abilities, and opportunities shall be taken from them; and they will be left to eternal contempt, poverty, and misery.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 5: 14-16. 6: 22, 23. 10: 24—25.) These verses were intended for the disciples. Christ meant to qualify them to be instructors of others; as candles are lighted, to give light. 'These words being only spoken to Christ's disciples, are as if Christ had said, I give you a light, by which you may discern the import of this and other parables: not that you may keep it to yourselves, but that it may by you be made beneficial to others.... And though I give you the knowledge of "these mysteries"....privately; "there is nothing (thus) hid, which should not be made manifest;" neither was any thing made secret (by me) but that it should (afterwards) come abroad.... Had Christ's apostles so obscurely write the Scriptures which contain the rule of faith, as the Romanists pretend, they must have hid this "candle under a bushel;" and not have manifested it to the world, as Christ here requires them to do.' Whitby. (Note, 2 Cor. 3: 12-6.)

21.) Under a bed.] 'This must not be understood of the bed, but of the sofa or divan, which, as Grotius observes, had such a cavity as to admit of a candelabrum being put under it, and, it seems any thing much larger: indeed, from the citations adduced by Wetstein, it appears to have been used by the ancients as a common hiding-place or 'urking-hole.'

of a bed, with the addition of two thick cotton quilts. The corner is the place of honor.' CALMET.

Version 24.

Take heed, mind what you hear.] 'That is, the more attentive you shall be in hearing, so much the greater progress will you daily make in the knowledge of my doctrine. Know. Or it may be thus expressed: "Whatsoever may be the measure of your attention, such shall be the measure of your knowledge." So is the kingdom.] 'This parable is mentioned only by Mark, a proof that Mark did not abridge Matthew.' Dr. A. CLARKE.
'This parable was formed to teach the Jews that neither the Messiah, nor his servants, would subdue men by the force of arms, as the Jews supposed; and also to prevent the apostles from being disappointed, when they did not see success immediately following their labors.'

Version 26-29.

'As the seedman when he hath sown, ° commits the seed to God who brings it to maturity, so I, having cast the seeds of my religion, commit the reason to Him who worketh in men to will and to do: and though my religion is at present low in the world, it will prevail.' In JNOEL.

grow up, & knoweth not how.

28 For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear.

29 But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come.

30 And he said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it?

31 It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth:

32 But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it.

33 And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it.

34 But without a parable spake he not unto them: and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples.

35 And the same day, when the even was, he saith un-

1. It will come up; though it seems lost under the clods, it will find its way through them. The seed cast into the ground will spring. Let but the Word of Christ live the place it ought to have in a soul, and it will show itself, as the wisdom from above, in a good conversation. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the surface of it altered! How gay and pleasant when covered with green!

2. The husbandman cannot describe how it comes up; it is one of the mysteries of nature; it springs and grows up, he knows not how, v. 27. He sees it has grown, but he cannot tell in what manner it grew, or what was the cause and method of its growth. Thus we know not how the Spirit by the Word makes a change in the heart, any more than we can account for the blowing of the wind. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: how God manifested in the flesh came to be believed on in the world, 1 Tim. 3: 16.

3. The husbandman, when he hath sown the seed, doth nothing toward the springing of it; He sleeps, and rises, night and day; goes to sleep at night, gets up in the morning; but follows his pleasures or other business, and yet the earth brings forth fruit of itself, according to the ordinary course of nature, and by the concurring power of the God of nature. Thus the Word of grace, when it is received in faith, is in the heart a Word of grace, and the preachers contribute nothing to it. The Spirit of God is carrying it on when they sleep, and can do no business, (Job 33: 15, 16,) or when they rise to go about other business. The prophets do not live forever; but the Word which they preach, is doing its work, when they are in their graves, Zech. 1: 5, 6. The dew by which the seed is brought up, tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men, Mic. 5: 7.

4. It grows gradually; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear, v. 28. When it is sprung up, it will go forward; nature will have its course, and so will grace. Christ's interest, both in the world and in the heart, is a growing interest; and though the beginning be small, the latter end will greatly increase. Though thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, yet God will give to every seed its own body; though at first it is but a tender blade, which the frost may nip, or the foot crush, yet it will increase to the full corn in the ear. Nature does nothing abruptly. God carries on his work unobscuredly and without noise, but without fail.

5. It comes to perfection at last; (v. 29.) When the fruit is brought forth, that is, when it is ripe, the owner plucks in the sickle. This intimates, That Christ now accepts the services which are done to Him by an honest heart from a good principle; and gathers in a harvest of honor to Himself. See John 4: 35. He will reward them in eternal life. When those that receive the Gospel aright, have finished their course, the harvest comes, when they shall be gathered as wheat into God's barn, (Matt. 13: 30,) as a shock of corn in his season.

23:35, 14:45, Am. 9:11-15, Mic. 4:1-2, Zech. 2:11, 8:20-23, 12:8, 14:5-9, Mal. 3:11, Acts 24:14, 4: 4: 5:14, 19:20, 21:20, Greek Rev. 11:15, 20:1-8.

IV. The work of grace is small in its beginnings, but great at last; (v. 30-32.) Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God, now he be set up? How shall I make you understand the design of it? Christ speaks as one considering and consulting with himself, how to illustrate it with an apt similitude; With what comparison shall we compare it? Shall we fetch it from the motions of the sun, or moon? No, it is like a grain of mustard-seed; He has compared it before to seed sown, here to the seed, intending thereby to show,

1. That the beginnings of the gospel-kingdom would be very small, like the least of all seeds. When a Christian church was sown in the earth, it was contained in one room, and the number of the names was but one hundred and twenty, (Acts 1: 15,) as the children of Israel, when they went down into Egypt, were but seventy souls. The work of grace in the soul is, at first, the day of small things; a cloud no bigger than a man's hand. Never were there such great things undertaken by such a handful, as that of disciplining the nations by the apostles; nor a work that was to end in such great glory raised from such weak and unlikely beginnings. Who hath begotten me these?

2. The perfection of it will be very great. When it grows up, it becomes greater than all herbs. The Gospel shall spread to the remotest nations of the earth, and continue to the last ages of time. The church hath shot out great branches, spreading far, and fruitful. The work of grace in the soul has mighty products, while it is in its growth; but what will it be, when it is perfected in heaven? The difference between a grain of mustard-seed and a great tree, is nothing to that between a young convert and a glorified saint! See John 12: 24.

With many such parables he spake the Word unto them; (v. 33,) probably referring us to the larger account of the parables of this kind, Matt. 13. He spake in parables, as they were able to hear them: He fetched comparisons from things familiar to them, and level to their capacity, and delivered them in plain expressions; though He did not let them into the mystery of the parables, yet his manner of expression was easy, and such as they might hereafter recollect to edification. But, for the present, without a parable spake He not unto them, v. 34. The glory of the Lord was covered with a cloud, and God speaks to us in the language of the sons of men, that by degrees, we may understand his meaning; the disciples themselves understood those sayings of Christ afterward, which at first they did not. These parables He expounded to them, when they were alone. We cannot but wish we had had that exposition, as we had of the parable of the sower; but it was not so useful; because, when the church should be enlarged, that would expound these parables to us.

V. 35-41. This miracle we had before; (Matt. 8: 23, &c.) but it is here more fully related.

It was the same day that he preached out

g Ps. 80:9-11, Ec. 31:3-10, Dan. 3: John 16:12, 1 Cor. 3:1, 2, Heb. 5: 11-14, 14:30-32, 11:34, 10:11, 7:17-28, Matt. 13:36, 46: 15:15, &c. Luke 8:9, &c. 24:27, 44-46, m Matt. 8:23, Luke 8:22.

to him "he passes his days and nights." A very beautiful image of security and freedom from anxiety. So Ps. 3: 5.

(28.) The full corn. The ripe wheat. The grain sown to its proper size. By this is denoted, undoubtedly, that grace or religion in the heart is of gradual growth. The religious principle is at first tender, feeble, perhaps almost imperceptible, like the first shootings of the grain in the earth. Perhaps also, like grain, it often lies long in the earth before there are signs of life. Tender piety in the heart of a child, like the tender grain, needs care, kindness, culture, and shelter from the frosts and storms of a cold, unfeeling world. It needs instruction, prayer, and tenderly counsel from parents, teachers, ministers and experienced Christians, that it may grow and bring forth the full fruits of holiness.

(29.) By these parables it appears, that a preacher is employed by God to sow good seed in the souls of men: that is, a sin to stay in the field and not sow; that it is a sin to pretend to sow, when a man does not furnish with any more seed; that it is a high offence against God to change the Master's seed, to mix it or to sow but seed in the place of it; and that he who sows his Master's seed, with an upright heart, shall come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

Faithful preachers sow the good seed of the Word, and use other means of success; but much of the good done will generally be unknown at the time, and perhaps become visible after their death; and they will at last glorify God for the blessed increase of their patient labors, which perhaps at the time they concluded to be almost entirely unsuccessful. (Note, John 4: 35-38.) (Notes, Matt. 13: 36-43.) 1 Cor. 3: 4-9.)

Verses 30-32.

No words, conveying precisely the same meaning, can well be more different, than those of the two evangelists Matthew and Mark. (Notes, Matt. 13: 31, 32, 44, 45.)

Verses 33, 34.

Our Lord taught the people in that manner, which was most suited to their state of mind. They were too much prejudiced to profit by such plain declarations of doctrinal truth, as his apostles afterwards made: but his parables, without giving needless offence, or affording his enemies any advantage, were calculated to excite inquiries, and to prepare the way for particular instructions. He privately expounded all to his disciples; and so prepared the way for that plainness of speech, which He intended they should use. (Notes, 1st. 49: 1-4, 78: 2, John 16: 12, 13, 1 Cor. 3: 1-3, Heb. 5: 11-14.)

of a ship, v. 35. When He had been laboring all day, instead of reposing, He exposes Himself, to teach us not to think of constant rest till we come to heaven. The ship that Christ made his pulpit, is taken under his special protection, and, though in danger, cannot sink. What is used for Christ, He will take care of.

He put to sea at night, because he would lose no time; Let us pass over to the other side. Christ went about doing good, and no difficulties in his way hindered Him; thus industriously we should be in serving Him, and our generation.

They did not put to sea, till they had sent away the multitude, that is, had answered all their requests; for He sent none home, complaining that they had attended Him in vain. Or, They sent them away with a solemn blessing; for Christ came into the world to bless mankind.

They took Him even as He was, that is, in the same dress in which He preached, without any cloak to throw over Him, which He ought to have had on the sea at night, after preaching. We must not hence infer that we may be careless of our health, but we may learn not to be too solicitous about the body.

The storm was so great, that the ship was full of water, (v. 37.) not by a leak, but partly with the shower, for the word signifies a tempest of wind with rain; however, the ship being little, the waves beat into it so that it was full. Note, It is no new thing for that ship to be greatly endangered, in which Christ and his disciples, his name and Gospel, are embarked.

There were with him other little ships, which, no doubt, shared in the distress. Probably, those little ships carried those who were desirous to go with Christ, for the benefit of his preaching and miracles on the other side. The multitude went away when He put to sea, but some would venture upon the water with Him. Those follow the Lamb aright, that follow Him, wherever He goes. And those that hope for happiness in Christ, must be willing to take their lot with Him, and run the same risks. One may boldly and cheerfully put to sea in Christ's company, though we foresee a storm.

Christ was asleep in this storm; we are told that it was in the hinder part of the ship, at the helm, to intimate that,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26-41. In endeavoring to promote the kingdom of God, we should rest satisfied with having done our part, and wait in patient hope on God, that He may do his: He reserves to Himself the power of giving the increase; and does it in an incomprehensible manner, that He may secure the whole honor to his own great name. We should, therefore, bear up against discouragement, though we do not perceive much success in our labors: we ought to redouble our diligence, and be more fervent in prayer; but, however anxious, we cannot make the seed grow, nor understand why it springs up in one case, and not in another. The effects we may often see, but the method of operation we cannot comprehend. Let us then go on with our work, in assurance, that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not; and let us seek unto the Lord to give the increase; and pray, that all Christians may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ, and ripen for the harvest.—We should not despise feeble beginnings, in individuals, or in the diffusing of the light of truth in dark places; as the kingdom of heaven is like the grain of mustard-seed, and as great consequences often spring from feeble causes. These things will not be obvious to others, but Christ will expound them to his disciples: and if we follow Him closely, He will afford us his special presence; and teach us self-denial by his precepts and example.—Storms may indeed assail us, and our fears may be great; but when He seems to slumber, He restrains the violence of the winds and waves, and the fury of wicked men and spirits: and when He awakes for our help, He will speak every tempest into a calm, and turn our terrors into adoring love. But, while 'He careth for us, that we perish not,' He will rebuke our unbelief: and indeed our excessive fears, in little difficulties, sometimes seem to indicate, that we have almost no faith, notwithstanding we have experienced his power and love. He is 'the mighty God and the Prince of peace,' and 'never faileth those who trust in Him.'—Instead therefore of dreading outward dangers, to the dishonor of the Lord, let us adore Him, whom 'even the winds and seas obey.'

Verbes 35-41.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 8: 23-27.) All the parables, contained in this chapter, and in the thirteenth of Matthew, seem to have been spoken during the remainder of that day, on which the friends of Jesus were dissatisfied with his unwearied labors: (Notes, 3: 20, 21, 31-33,) not having persisted in them till the evening. He put to sea, even 'as he was' in the ship whence he had preached, and without any peculiar attention to his health, ease, or indulgence, after so great fatigues!

Such an example did he set us of enduring hardship, and avoiding all needless regard to ourselves, whilst employed in doing good to the souls of men! (Note, Phil. 2: 24-30.)

CHAP. V.

Some commentators on a legion of devils; and suffer them to enter and destroy a herd of swine, 1-13. The devils entreat him to depart; and it is man, who had been possessed, desires to be with him; but is sent to declare him, Jesus had done for him, 14-20. Jairus entreats Christ to heal his daughter, 21-24. By his way, he heals a woman of an hysterical issue of blood, 25-34. He raises Jairus's daughter to life, 35-43.

AND they came over unto the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes.

2 And when he was come out of the ship, immediately there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit,

3 Who had his dwelling among the tombs, and no man could bind him, no, not with chains;

4 Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him.

5 And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, crying, and cutting himself with stones.

6 But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped him,

7 And cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not.

8 (For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit.)

is a great carn. It is God's prerogative to command the seas, Jer. 31: 35. By this therefore Christ proves Himself to be God. He that made the seas, can make them quiet.

The reproach Christ gave them for their fears, is here carried further than in Matthew. There it is, Why are ye fearful? Here, Why are ye so fearful? Though there may be cause for fear, yet not for fear to such a degree. There it is, O ye of little faith. Here it is, How is it that ye have no faith? The disciples believed that Jesus is the Son of God; but at this time their fears prevailed so that they seemed to have no faith. It was out of the way, when they had occasion for it, and so it was as if they had not had it. How is it, that in this matter ye think I would not come with seasonable relief? Those may suspect their faith, who can entertain such a thought, as that Christ careth not though his people perish.

Lastly, The impression this miracle made upon the disciples, is here differently expressed. In Matthew it is said, The men marvelled; here it is said, They feared greatly. They feared a great fear; so the original. Their fear was now rectified by their faith. When they feared the winds and the seas, it was for want of reverence for Christ. Now that they saw a demonstration of his power over them, they feared them less, and him more. They feared lest they had offended Christ by their unbelieving fears; and therefore studied now to give him honor. They had feared the power and wrath of the Creator in the storm, and that fear had torment; now they feared the power and grace of the Redeemer in the calm; they feared the Lord and his goodness; and it had pleasure in it, and by it they gave glory to Christ, as Jonah's mariners, who, when the sea ceased from her raging, feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, Jon. 1: 16. This sacrifice they offered to Christ; they said, What manner of man is this? Surely more than a man, for even the winds and the seas obey him.

CHAP. V. v. 1-20. We have here an instance of Christ's dispossessing the strong man armed, to make it appear that He was stronger than he. This He did when He was come to the other side, whither He went through a storm; his business there was to rescue this soul out of the hands of Satan. Thus He came from heaven to earth, to redeem a remnant of mankind out of the hands of the devil.

9 And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion; for we are many.

10 And he besought him much that he would not send them

Matthew said they were two possessed with devils; here it is said to be a man possessed with an unclean spirit. If there were two, there was one, and Mark doth not say that there was but one; it is probable that one of them was much more remarkable than the other, and said what was said. Observe,

1. The miserable condition this poor creature was in; he was under the power of an unclean spirit, and the effect of it was not, as in many, a silent melancholy, but a frenzy; he was raving mad; worse than any of the possessed that were Christ's patients.

2. He had his dwelling among the tombs. Their tombs were out of the cities, in desolate places; (Job 3: 14.) which gave the devil great advantage: for woe to him that is alone. Perhaps the devil drove him to the tombs, to make people fancy that the souls of the dead were turned into demons, and did what mischief was done. The touch of a grave was polluting, Num. 19: 16. The unclean spirit drives people into that company that is defiling, and so keeps possession of them. Christ, by rescuing souls out of Satan's power, saves the living from among the dead.

3. He was ungovernable; No man could bind him. Not only cords, but chains, and fetters of iron were broken, v. 3, 4. Deplorable is the case of such as need to be thus bound, and they are most to be pitied; but his case was worst, in whom the devil was so strong, that he could not be bound. This sets forth the sad condition of souls in which the devil has dominion: Some wilful sinners are like this madman; all are herein like the horse and the mule, that need to be held in with bit and bridle, but some are like the wild ass, that will not be held. The commands and curses of the law are as chains and fetters, to restrain sinners from their wicked courses; but they break those bands in sunder, and it is an evidence of the power of the devil in them.

3. He was a terror and torment to himself and all about him, v. 5. The devil is a perfect tyrant; this wretched creature was night and day in the mountains and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones, either bemoaning his own deplorable case, or in rage against Heaven. Men in frenzies often wound and destroy themselves; what is a man when reason is dethroned, and Satan enthroned? The worshippers of Baal in their fury cut themselves, like this madman. The voice of God is, Do thyself no harm; the voice of Satan, Do

NOTES.

CHAP. V. v. 1. (Matt. 8: 23.) The region of the Gergesenes was of larger extent than that of the Gadarenes, which was included in it.

[Gadara,] a town situated on the eastern shore of the lake Gennesareth, opposite to Tiberias, and about seven or eight miles distant from it. It is called by Josephus a Grecian city, and few of its inhabitants were Jews.

Verses 2-13.

(Notes, Matt. 8: 23, 29. Luke 8: 26-39.)

2. Mark mentions but one demoniac, (Matthew two) as being the more important, or rather, perhaps, because the mention of one was sufficient for his purpose, to show forth the power of Christ.

CALMET.

SCOTT.

3. [The words.] These were, according to the oriental custom, erected singly on solitary places, or at least apart from the public roads. Such ruins, &c. would be no indifferent shelter for maniacs. Indeed, we find from Diogenes Laërtius, that they formed no contemptible habitations, and were sometimes used as such.

BLOOMFIELD.

Many circumstances here require particular consideration.—It is probable, that our Lord had landed, intentionally, near the place where the demoniac wandered, and was immediately met by him. He was possessed with an unclean or fallen spirit, an enemy to God, in whose judgment all sin is uncleanness, and filthiness of flesh or spirit.

[Note, 2 Cor. 7: 1.] The words, 'unclean spirits,' and 'demons,' are used as synonyms. (12, 13.) Though many evil spirits possessed the man, one is first mentioned, who may be considered as the ruler of [2:28]

the company. The force, which they exerted by the limbs of the man, was so great, that his friends could by no means confine him. He was therefore left to wander, night and day, without clothes, among solitary tombs, and on the mountains; where he cried, hideously, as one in excessive anguish, and cut himself with stones, by running among them lying down naked, or in a frantic manner. (Note, Dan. 4: 23-33.)

(4.) 'His strength was supernatural, because he was possessed with devils. But say some, denying divine testimony, "there is no devil, and there can be none." Why? Because we have never seen one, and we think the doctrine absurd. Men sent from God to bear witness of the truth tell us, there were demoniacs in their times. These persons say, "no, they were only diseases." Whom shall we credit? men sent from God, or men wise in their own conceit?'

A legion is well known to have been a body of Roman soldiers, which at that time consisted of above six thousand men. (Note, Matt. 26: 47-56, v. 53.) The question was doubtless asked, and the answer extorted, in order to display the number of those unclean spirits, which Sadducees, ancient and modern, have denied and which most men unwisely disregard.

(7.) Torment me not.] Here was such a reference to the final sentence Christ is to pass on these rebel spirits, as could not be dictated by lunacy, and it is doubtful, whether the person speaking, or any of the hearers, but Christ Himself and these spirits, understood the sense and propriety of it.

FOR MYSELF

11 Now there was there, high upon the mountains, a great herd of swine feeding.

12 And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them.

13 And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine; and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, (they were about two thousand,) and were choked in the sea.

[Practical Observations.]

14 And they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done.

15 And they come to Jesus, and see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind; and they were afraid.

16 And they that saw it, told them how it befel to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine.

thyself all the harm thou canst; God's word is despised, and Satan's regarded. Perhaps his cutting of himself with stones was only cutting his bare feet.

II. His application to Christ; (v. 6.) When he saw Jesus afar off, coming ashore, he ran, and worshipped Him. He usually ran upon others with rage, but he ran to Christ with reverence. That was done by an invisible hand of Christ, which could not be done with fetters; his fury was all on a sudden curbed. Even the devil was forced to tremble before Christ, and bow to Him: or, rather, the man came, and worshipped Christ, in a sense of his need of help, the power of Satan being suspended.

III. Christ said to the unclean spirit, (v. 8.) Come out of him. He made the man desire to be relieved, when He enabled him to run, and worship Him, and then put forth his power for his relief. If Christ work in us to pray for deliverance from Satan, He will work for us that deliverance. Here is an instance of the power and authority with which Christ commanded the unclean spirits, and they obeyed Him, ch. 1: 27. He said, Come out of the man. The design of Christ is to expel unclean spirits out of the souls of people; 'Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit, that the Holy Spirit may take possession of the heart, and have dominion.'

IV. The dread which the devil had of Christ. The man ran, and worshipped Christ; but it was the devil in the man that cried with a loud voice, What have I to do with Thee? v. 7. ch. 1: 24. 1. He calls God the most high God. By the name Eliou—the Most High, God was known among the Phœnicians, and the nations that bordered upon Israel; and by that name the devil calls Him. 2. He owns Jesus to be the Son of God. Note, It is no strange thing to hear the best words drop from the worst mouths. There is such a way of saying this as none can attain to but by the Holy Ghost; (1 Cor. 12: 3.) yet it may be said, after a sort, by the unclean spirit. There is no judging of men by their loose sayings; but by their fruits ye shall know them. Piety from the teeth outward is an easy thing. The most fair-spoken hypocrite cannot say better than to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet that the devil did. He disowns any

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1–13. This chapter calls us to contemplate our Redeemer's power and love; and each of the instances here set before us, may be considered, not only as a miracle, but also as an emblem of his gracious operations on the souls of men. If a legion of apostate spirits were combined against one man, who can conceive the numbers, which there are in this wicked world, of which their great leader is 'the god' and 'prince!' (Notes, John 12: 27–33, v. 31. 14: 29–31, v. 30. 2 Cor. 4: 3, 4. Eph. 2: 1–3. 1 John 4: 4–6. 5: 19. Rev. 12: 7–12, v. 9.) The intention of all their efforts is to destroy mankind, body and soul. May these alarming thoughts warn us to flee to that refuge, which God has prepared for us in the kingdom of his Son! (Note, Col. 1: 9–14, vv. 12–14.) Unconverted sinners are under a more fatal possession, than that which distracted men, and destroyed their health: (though it is the restraining power of God, that preserves us even from these calamities;) but some wicked men seem to be possessed by a legion; their evil actions are so numerous. Frequently, we see or hear of persons carried away by their own passions and Satan's temptations, into pollution and iniquity; so that they dwell among those 'whose feet go down to death, whose steps take hold on hell.' Neither fear, conscience, nor regard to interest or health, can restrain them: neither the affection and authority of friends, human laws, the feelings of present painful effects of vice, nor the dread of 'the wrath to come,' can deter them from their courses. In whatever way they be bound and fettered, their strong and evil habits break loose, and 'no man can tame them.' (Note, Rom. 8: 3, 4.) Thus they reduce themselves to penury, disease, a prison, or ignominious death; in the mean time, they are the reproach and grief of their friends, the terror and nuisance of the neighborhood, and a pernicious part of community. Yet, if Jesus be pleased to exert his power, He can bring the most abandoned of them, to fall down before Him, and effect a blessed change in character and conduct. But the sinner, when his work is first begun, often fears that the Savior means to destroy him, and is ready to cry out, 'What have I to do with Thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God?' This arises not only from unbelief, but also from the artifice of these enemies, who are reluctant to leave those, over whom they have hitherto reigned. They dare not however resist the power of Christ, who can, if He pleases, consign them to the place of torment: and, knowing this, they on some occasions even become his suppliants, and earnestly adjure Him to respite their punishment. But all the hosts of hell, formidable as they are, cannot destroy one sinner, except the Redeemer grants them permission. This is a most encouraging thought to the believer: but what comfort can Satan's willing servants derive from it? (Note, Job 1: 9–12.) Yet, even in respect of them, his power is limited: for the same agency which hurried the swine into the sea, would have been sufficient for the immediate destruction of their availing possessors, had not the power of Christ restrained it. Long-suffering and mercy may therefore be recognised in those corrections, by which men are deprived of property; while their lives are preserved, and warning is given them to seek salvation.

SCOTT.

(11.) Our Savior, as has been remarked on the parallel passage in Matthew, by permitting the legion to enter into and destroy the swine, might have aimed a severe rebuke at those Jews who, contrary to the spirit of their law, kept vast herds of these unclean animals, for gain.

[Practical Observations.]

21 ¶ And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side, much people gathered unto him, and he was nigh unto the sea.

darkness of this world, which supposes a lower rank; the devil and his angels: which makes those enemies the more formidable.

VI. Their request was, 1. That He would not send them away out of the country, (v. 10.) not only that He would not confine them to their infernal prison, and so torment them before the time, but that He would not banish them that country, though they had been such a terror to it.

They seem to have had a particular affection for that country, or a particular spite to it; and to have liberty to walk to and fro through the rest of the earth, will not serve, (Job 1:7.) unless the range of those mountains be allowed them for their pasture, Job 39:3. But why would they abide in that country? Grotius saith, Because in that country there were many apostate Jews, who had thrown themselves out of the covenant of God, and had thereby given Satan power over them. And some suggest, that, having by experience got the knowledge of the dispositions of the people, they could the more effectually do them mischief by their temptations. 2. That He would suffer them to enter into the swine, by destroying which, they hoped to do more mischief than they could by entering the body of any particular person, which they knew Christ would not permit.

VII. Christ gave them leave to enter the swine, (v. 13.) He let them do as they had a mind. Thus He would let the Gadarenes see what spiteful enemies devils are, that they might thereby be induced to make Him their Friend, who alone was able to control them. Immediately the unclean spirits entered into the swine, which by the law were unclean. Those that, like the swine, delight in the mire of sensual lusts, are fit habitations for Satan, and are, like Babylon, the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird, (Rev. 18:2.) as pure souls are habitations of the Holy Spirit. The consequence of the devils entering into the swine was, that they all ran mad into the adjoining sea, where they were drowned, to the number of two thousand. The man possessed, only cut himself, for God had said, he is in your hands, only save his life. But hereby it appeared, that, if he had not been so restrained, he would have drowned himself. How much we are indebted to the providence of God, for preservation from malignant spirits!

VIII. They that fed the swine hastened to the owners, to give account of their charge, v. 14. This drew the people together; and, 1. When they saw the man cured, they conceived a veneration for Christ, v. 15. They had many a time been frightened at the sight of him that was possessed with the devil; and were now as much surprised to see him sitting clothed, and in his right mind; thus he came to himself. Note, Those who are grave and sober, and consider, thereby make it appear, that the devil's power is broken in their souls. The sight of this made them afraid; and forced them to own that Christ is to be feared. But, 2. When they found that their swine were lost, they conceived a dislike of Christ, and prayed Him to depart out of their coasts, for they think not any good He can do them sufficient to make amends for the swine. Now the devils had what they would have; for by no handle do these evil spirits more effectually manage sinful souls than by the love of the world. They were afraid of some further punishment, if Christ should tarry among them, whereas, if they would but part with their sins, He had life and happiness for them; but, being loth to quit either their sins or their swine, they chose rather to abandon their Savior. Thus they do, who, rather than let go a base lust, will throw away their interest in Christ. They should rather have argued, 'If He had such power as this over devils and all creatures, it is good having Him our Friend; if the devils have leave to tarry in our country, (v. 10.) let us entreat Him to tarry, who alone can control them.' But such misconstructions do carnal hearts make of the judgments of God, instead of being driven to Him, they set Him at a greater distance: though He hath said, Provoke Me not, and I will do you no hurt, Jer. 25:6.

IX. The poor man after his deliverance, desired that he might go with Christ, (v. 18.) perhaps for fear of the evil spirit; or, rather, that he might receive instruction from Him. Those that are freed from the evil spirit, cannot but covet fellowship with Christ. Christ would not suffer him to go with Him, lest it should savor of ostentation, and to let him know that He could both protect and instruct him at a distance. Besides, He had other work for him to do; he must go home to his friends, and tell them what great things the Lord had done for him; that Christ might be honored, and his friends edified, and invited to believe in Christ. He must notice rather Christ's pity than his power, for that is it which especially He glories in; he must tell them what compassion the Lord had had on him. The man, in the transport of joy, proclaimed, all the country over, what great things Jesus had done for him, v. 20. This is a debt we owe Christ and our brethren, that He may be glorified and they edified. As the effect of it, all men did marvel, but few went any further. Many wonder at the works of Christ, yet do not wonder after Him.

V. 21—34. The Gadarenes having desired Christ to leave their country, He presently went to the other side; (v. 21.) and there much people gathered to Him. Note, If there be some that reject Christ, there are others that bid Him welcome. A despised gospel will cross the water, and go where it will be entertained. Among the many that applied to Him,

1. Here is one that comes to be a cure for a child; one of the rulers of the synagogue; or, as some think, one of the judges of the consistory-court, which was in every city, consisting of twenty-three. He was not named in Matthew; he is here, Jairus, or Jair; Judg.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—20. Losses and alarms frequently terrify and exasperate, instead of promoting repentance; and those who are determined not to part with iniquitous gain, or to mortify their passions, are as averse to the Gospel of Christ, as unclean spirits. But when the most enslaved sinner is delivered from Satan and the bondage of sin, he will gladly sit at the feet, and hear the word of his Deliverer. Being 'come to himself,' and to 'his right mind,' he now learns to love Christ, and longs to be with Him and like Him. (Notes, Phil. 1: 21—26. 1 Jhr. 3: 1—3.) When these desires grow vigorous, and are accompanied with an assured hope of heaven, he is willing to be absent from the body that he may be present with the Lord: wonder, therefore, that he chooses rather to part with the nearest relations and most valued possessions, than to forsake Christ. Words cannot express the blessed change which takes place, when Jesus delivers such wretched slaves of Satan, and numbers them among his saints. They now enjoy a felicity before unknown; they henceforth become the ornament of their families; they are made partakers of heavenly wisdom, and a glorious liberty; they are rendered useful in those communities to which before they were a terror, or a temptation. They go among their friends and neighbors, 'showing what great things Christ hath done for them,' and, while their conduct evinces the reality and excellency of the change, they often excite great attention, and are made the instruments of inducing even their more orderly neighbors to hearken to the Gospel. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5: 17—21. Gal. 1: 15—24. 1 Thes. 1: 5—8. 1 Tim. 1: 12—16. 2 Pet. 1: 13—15.) The Lord sometimes makes choice of such converts for his ministers: and while they publish through cities and countries, what great things Jesus has done for them; their simple testimony, confirmed by their characters, renders them extensive blessings, sometimes in those places where they were once mischievous. We all seem to be continued in this world of sin and sorrow, after our conversion, chiefly to declare, by word and deed, the Savior's grace among our fellow sinners.

34 And he said unto her, ^{Daughter}, thy faith hath made thee whole; ^{go} in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

[Practical Observations.]

10:3. He addressed himself to Christ, though a ruler, with great reverence; When he saw Him, he fell at his feet, as One really greater than He appeared to be; and besought Him greatly, as one that valued mercy, and knew he could obtain it no where else. His little daughter, about twelve years old, the darling of the family, lies a dying; but he believes that if Christ will come, and lay his hands upon her, she will return even from the gates of the grave. He said, at first, when he came, She lies a dying; (so Mark;) but afterward, upon fresh information sent him, he saith, She is even now dead; (so Matthew;) but he still prosecutes his suit; see Luke 8: 42, 49. Christ readily agreed, and went with him, v. 24.

11. Here is another, that comes to steal a cure; and she got relief. This cure was wrought by the way, as He was going to raise the ruler's daughter, followed by a crowd. See how Christ improved his time. Many of his discourses, and some of his miracles, are dated by the way-side; we should be doing good, not only when we sit in the house, but when we walk by the way, Deut. 6: 7.

This woman had a constant issue of blood for twelve years, which had thrown her into great weakness, embittered life, and threatened death. She had had the best advice of physicians, and had made use of the medicines they prescribed; as long as she had any thing to give them, they had kept her in hopes that they could cure her; but now that she had spent all, they gave her up. Skin for skin, and all that a man has, will he give for life and health. It is ill with those patients who suffer by their physicians, instead of being relieved by them. Those that are not bettered by medicines, commonly grow worse. It is usual with people not to apply themselves to Christ, till they have tried all other helpers, and find them physicians of no value. He will be found a sure Refuge, even to those who make Him their last Refuge.

She had strong faith in the power of Christ; she said, though it doth not appear that she was encouraged by any preceding instance to say it, If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be made whole, v. 28. She believed that He cured, not as a Prophet, by virtue derived from God, but as the Son of God, by a virtue inherent in Himself. Her case was such as she could not in modesty tell Him publicly, as others did their grievances, and therefore she wished for a private cure, and her faith was suited to her case.

She came in the crowd behind Him, to touch his garment, and immediately felt herself perfectly well: by this it appears that the cure was altogether miraculous; for those that in such cases are cured by natural means, recover their strength slowly, and gradually, and not at once; but as for God, his work is perfect. Note, Those whom Christ heals of the disease of sin, experience in themselves a universal change for the better.

35 ¶ While he yet spake, ^{there} came from the ruler of the synagogue's house, certain which said, Thy daughter is dead; why troublest thou ^{the} Master any further?

1: 6, 5, 13. 16: 8. 2 Kings 5: 11.

Christ inquired after, and encouraged his concealed patient. He knew in Himself that virtue had gone out of Him, v. 30. He knew it not by any deficiency, but rather by an agility of spirits, in the exerting of it, and the inward pleasure He had in doing good. And being desirous to see his patient, He asked, not in displeasure, but in tenderness, Who touched my clothes? The disciples, not without rudeness, almost ridiculed his question; (v. 31.) The multitudes throng thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? Christ looks round, not to blame her that had done this thing, but to commend her faith, and by his own act confirm the cure. He needed not that any should inform Him. Note, As secret acts of sin, so are secret acts of faith, known to the Lord Jesus. If believers derive virtue from Christ ever so closely, He knows it, and is pleased with it. The poor woman hereupon presented herself to Jesus, (v. 33.) fearing and trembling, not knowing how He would take it. Note, Christ's patients often tremble when they have reason to triumph. She might have come boldly, knowing what was done in her. It was a surprise, and was not yet a pleasing surprise. However, she fell down before Him. Note, There is nothing better for those that fear than to throw themselves at the feet of Jesus; to humble themselves before Him, and refer themselves to Him. She told Him all the truth. Note, We must not be ashamed to own the secret transactions between Christ and our souls; but, when called to it, mention, to his praise, and the encouragement of others, what He has done for our souls. And the consideration that nothing can be hid from Christ, should engage us to confess all to Him. What an encouraging word He gave her; (v. 34.) Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. Note, Christ honors faith, because faith honors Christ. But what is done by faith on earth, is ratified in heaven; Christ saith, Be whole of thy disease. Note, If our faith sets the seal to the power and promise of God, saying, 'So let it be to me; God's grace will set the seal to the prayers of faith, saying, 'So it shall be to thee.' Therefore, Go in peace; thy cure is honestly come by; take the comfort of it. Note, They that are healed of spiritual diseases, have reason to go in peace.

V. 35—43. Disease and death came in, on the way by the sin of the first Adam; but by the second Adam, both are conquered. Christ having healed an incurable disease, here goes on to triumph over death, as He had triumphed over a devil.

1. The melancholy news is brought to Jairus, that his daughter is dead, and therefore ^{the} Christ he as other physicians. He comes too late. While there is life, there is hope; but when life is gone, it is past recall; Why troublest thou the Master any further? v. 25. Ordinarily, the proper thought in this case, is, 'The matter is determined, the will of God is done, and I sub-

See John 11:41, 42. Similar to this is the following remark of Blomfield: 'The truth is, that it is a popular mode of speaking, and therefore, not to be referred to philosophical principles. But now that it is dead, wherefore should I weep? I shall go to it, but it shall not return to me.* With such words we should quiet ourselves at such a time, that our souls may be as a child that is weaned from his mother: but here the case was extraordinary; the death of the child doth not end the narrative.

II. Christ encouraged the afflicted father yet to hope, that his application to Him should not be vain. Christ had staid to work a cure by the way, but he shall be no loser by the gain of others; Be not afraid, only believe. We may suppose Jairus at a pause, whether he should ask Christ to go on or no; but have we not as much occasion for the grace of God and his consolations, and of the prayers of our ministers and friends, when death is in the house, as when sickness is? Christ soon determines this; 'Be not afraid that my coming will be to no purpose, only believe that I will make it turn to a good account.' Note, 1. We must not

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21—34. Our Lord will not obtrude himself on those, who are not disposed to entertain Him; nor refuse his salvation to any, who are prepared to welcome Him.—The distress for which men can obtain no adequate remedy, frequently brings them to Christ. Severe family trials are sometimes appointed in love, to show those in affluence especially the vanity of their distinctions; and lead them to inquire after a better portion. Those who are in temporal distress, readily find words to express their desires: how is it then that men feel such difficulty in presenting their supplications to God? Because they have not so distinct an understanding of their wants, nor so deep a feeling of their misery.—There are different degrees and exercises of faith; but that which most honors Christ, will be most advantageous to us. The history of his life is an account of his continued earnestness in doing good; so that we know not whether we should most admire his divine power, or his use of it; and, while we derive encouragement from this reflection, let us learn to use our ability in doing what we can, for the benefit of mankind. And if we look around, we shall find many Christians, wasted by disease, and pinched by penury, while stately palaces are often scenes of riot to infidels, profligates, and cruel oppressors. But 'the prosperity of fools destroys them,' and the afflictions of the righteous conduce to their everlasting felicity.—Men often prove vain helpers, even in temporal calamities, and only add to our sufferings by their efforts to relieve us: yet the aversion of sinners to seek help from God, is very conspicuous; for they will try every method, and persevere, after disappointments, before they will apply to Him, who alone can render means successful, and help us when all other helpers fail! Many, through obstinacy, waste their time and strength by applying to 'physicians of no value,' from whom they 'suffer many things,' and get no better, but 'rather grow worse.' Some run into diversions, and gay company, to quiet conscience, or relieve dejection of spirits; many plunge into business, abstruse speculations, or even into intemperance, for the same purpose; and others 'go about to establish their own righteousness,' or torment themselves by vain superstitions. Happy are they who, by many disappointments, hearken to the Gospel, and expect help from Jesus alone: their remaining infirmity will not prevent the desired blessing. (Note, Matt. 11: 23—30.)—The example before us may likewise instruct us to encourage those, who seem humbly to rely on Christ, though in many respects defective.—In proportion as our faith in Christ brings peace of conscience, and destroys the love and power of sin, it is genuine: and the more singly we depend on Him, the more we shall find that He is become our salvation. Thus He gradually teaches his people, by their own experience: He evinces to them his knowledge of their difficulties; and shows his power and love in helping them. But, while we have the benefit, He will secure to himself the glory; and will at length bring to light, in numberless instances, the 'virtue that hath gone forth from Him,' to heal hidden evils, under which his people had groaned for years before they sought Him. Yet, while multitudes throng around Him, as it were, by crowding the places where the Gospel is preached; only here and there one thus 'touches Him.'—Even disciples of Christ are apt to express themselves dissatisfied with the dispensations of his providence and grace. This is the effect of remaining pride, ignorance and unbelief: for no believer, to this hour, could ever conceive of his compassion so highly as it deserves, though He sometimes conceals it under a frown or a rebuke. Humble souls, therefore, in seeking Him, are apt to tremble and fear lest He should abhor or destroy them; while his heart yearns with pity, and He is about to say to them, 'Be of good comfort, go in peace, thy faith hath saved thee.' For He will honor that faith, which honors Him. SCOTT.

Why make ye this ado? 'The grief of the orientals formerly, on an occasion of death, was, as it is to this day in the East, very extreme. As soon as a person dies, the females of the family with a loud voice set up a sorrowful cry. They continue it as long as they are without taking breath, and the first shriek of wailing dies away in a w sob. After a short space of time, they repeat the same cry, and so continue for eight days.' Many other indications of grief are often given, such as tearing the hair and clothes, smiting the breast, stamping the foot, tearing their faces with their nails lying down in ashes, or putting dust and ashes upon their heads, &c.

It is worthy of observation, that of the three persons, whom Christ particularly recorded to have raised from the dead, one was the only son of a widow, another, this only daughter of Jairus, and the third, the beloved brother of Martha and Mary: so much compassion and condescension did He show to the feelings of natural affection! V. 35-43. The Lord waits for our extremities, that He may manifest his glory, and encourage our faith and hope. He regards no application to Him as a trouble, and no case can be difficult. He undertakes: we should not therefore yield to fear, but persist in faith, in the most difficult circumstances; and He will then fulfil his word, and all our expectations. (Notes, Rom. 4: 19-25.) No wonder that worldly men wail and lament when bereaved of those whom they love; they have no prospect, or a very gloomy one, beyond the grave: but Christ's is should not sorrow as men without hope, for them who sleep in the Lord: nor should they be inconsolable, for any loss; as the Lord still lives to be their Friend and Comforter. Indeed, death is but a sleep to believers: and we shall soon join our Christian friends in that world, where sin and its effects will be known no more. (Notes, Prov. 14: 32. 1 Thes.

1. The child was extremely beloved; the relations and neighbors wept and wailed greatly. It is very afflictive when that which is come forth like a flower, is soon cut down, and withereth before it is grown up; when that grieves us, of which we said, This same shall comfort us.

2. It was evident beyond dispute, that the child was really dead. Their laughing Christ to scorn, for saying, she is not dead, but sleepeth, though reprehensible, is proof of this.

3. Christ put those out as unworthy to witness the miracle, who were noisy in their sorrow, and so ignorant in the things of God, as not to understand Him when He spake of death as a sleep, or so scornful as to ridicule Him for it.

4. He took the parents of the child to witness the miracle, because in it He had an eye to their faith, and designed it for their comfort, who were the true, for they were the silent mourners.

5. Christ raised the child to life by a word, which is recorded in Syriac, (the language in which Christ spake,) for the greater certainty of the thing; Talitha, cumi; Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. Dr. Lightfoot saith, it was customary with the Jews, when they gave physic, to say, Arise from thy disease; meaning, We wish thou mayest arise; but to one that was dead, Christ said, Arise from the dead; meaning, I command that thou arise; nay, there is more in it—the dead have not power to arise, therefore power goes with this word. Give what thou commandest, and command what thou wilt. Christ works while He commands, and by the command, and therefore may command what He pleaseth, even the dead to arise. Such is the gospel-call to those that are dead in sins, and can no more rise from that death by their own power, than this child; yet that word, Awake and arise from the dead, is not in vain, when it follows immediately, Christ shall give thee life. Eph. 5: 14. By the word of Christ, spiritual life is given. I said unto thee, Live, Ezek. 16: 6.

6. The damsel, as soon as life returned, arose and walked, v. 42. Spiritual life will appear by our rising from the bed of sloth, and walking in a religious conversation, in Christ's name and strength. Those that are of the age of twelve years, should walk as those whom Christ has raised to life.

7. All who saw it, and heard of it, were astonished with a great astonishment. They could not but acknowledge that there was something in it extraordinary, yet they knew not what to infer from it. Their wonder should have worked faith, but it rested in astonishment.

8. Christ charged them straitly that no man should know it. It was known to a competent number, but He would not have it as yet proclaimed; his own resurrection was to be the great instance of his power over death, and therefore the divulging of other instances must be reserved till that great proof was given.

9. Christ took care something should be given her to eat. By this it appeared that she was raised not only to life, but to a good state of health. It is observable, that, as Christ when He made man, provided food for Him (Gen. 1: 29.) so now, when He had given a new life, He took care to give livelihood. Where Christ hath given spiritual life, He will provide for the nourishment of it unto life eternal, for He will never forsake the work of his own hands.

CHAP. VI. v. 1-6. Here,

I. Christ visits his own country, the place not of his birth, but of his education; that was Nazareth. He had been in danger of his life among them, (Luke 4: 29.) and yet He came among them again: so strangely doth He wait to be gracious, and seek the salvation of his enemies. Thither He went, though into danger; his disciples followed Him; (v. 1.) for they had left all to follow Him whithersoever He went.

II. He preached in their synagogue, on the Sabbath, v. 2. There was not such flocking to Him here as in other places, so that He had no opportunity of preaching till they came together on the Sabbath; and then He expounded a portion of Scripture with great clearness. In religious assemblies, on sabbath-days, the Word of God is to be preached according to Christ's example. We give glory to God by receiving instruction from Him.

III. They could not but own, 1. That He spake with great wisdom, and that that wisdom was given Him, for they knew He had no learned education. 2. That He did mighty works with his own hand, for the confirming of his doctrine. They acknowledged the two great proofs of the divine original of his Gospel—divine wisdom in the contrivance of it, and divine power exerted to ratify and recommend it; yet, though they could not deny the premises, they would not admit the conclusion.

IV. They studied to disparage Him, and raise prejudices in the minds of people against Him, notwithstanding. All this wisdom, and all these mighty works, shall be of no account, because He had not been at the feet of any of their doctors; (v. 3.) Is not this the carpenter? In Matthew they upbraided Him with being the carpenter's son, his supposed father Joseph being of that trade. But it seems, they could say further, Is not this the carpenter? Our Lord, it is probable, employed himself in that business with his father, before He entered upon his public ministry. 1. He would thus humble himself, and make Himself of no reputation, as one that had taken upon Him the form of a servant. Thus did our Redeemer stoop, when He came to redeem us out of our low estate. 2. He would thus teach us to abhor idleness, and rather to take up with laborious employments, from which no more is to be got than a bare livelihood, than indulge ourselves in sloth. Nothing is more pernicious for young people than a habit of sauntering. The Jews had a good rule for 4: 13-18.) Our Redeemer, while He rebukes our sorrow, allows the feelings of nature and affection; and, though we cannot now expect to have our deceased relatives restored to us, we may hope to experience consolations proportioned to our trials. When sinners ridicule Christ, they exclude themselves from witnessing or experiencing his grace, for He has power over death and the unseen world; and He will ere long bring forth the nations of the dead to appear before his tribunal, call them to eternal felicity, or hid them depart into everlasting punishment. (Notes, Matt. 25: 31-46. John 5: 23, 29. Rev. 20: 11-15.) May He raise our souls from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; that we may now feed on his spiritual provisions, and live as monuments of his grace; that when He shall appear, we may appear with Him in glory. (Note, Col. 3: 1-4.) Scott.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. v. 1-4. (Notes, Matt. 13: 54-58. Luke 4: 16-32.) In this account of our Lord's last visit to Nazareth, (as it appears to have been) we find that the people asked, 'Is not this the carpenter?' whence it has reasonably been concluded, that He had wrought with Joseph at this laborious business, during the former years of his life.—John Murray says, that, 'being among men he made ploughs and

'yokes, which are the works of carpenters.'—By the Jewish canon, all fathers were bound to teach their children some trade. Jesus was not educated in the schools of human learning; but having, 'for our sakes become poor,' He, 'the second Adam,' submitted to the sentence denounced on the 'first Adam,' and ate his 'bread in the sweat of his brow.' (Notes, Gen. 3: 17-19. Acts 13: 1-6.) Scott.

5 And he could there do no mighty works, save that he laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them.

6 And he marvelled because of their unbelief. And he went round about the villages teaching.

7 And he calleth unto him the twelve and began to send them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean spirits;

8 And commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse:

9 But be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats.

10 And he said unto them, 'In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place.

11 And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you; when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for that city.

12 And they went out, and preached that men should repent.

this—their young men, who were designed for scholars, were yet bred to some trade, as Paul was a tent-maker, that they might have some business to fill up their time with, and, if need were, to get their bread. 3. He would thus put an honor upon mechanics, and encourage those who eat the labor of their hands, though great men look down upon them.

Another thing they upbraided Him with, was, the meanness of his relations; 'He is the son of Mary; his brethren and sisters are here with us; we know his family and kindred;' and therefore, though they were astonished at his doctrine, (v. 2.) yet they were offended at his person (v. 3.) and looked upon Him with contempt; and for that reason would not receive his doctrine, so well recommended. May we think that they had not known his pedigree, but He has dropped among them from the clouds, without father, without mother, and without descent, they would have entertained Him with any more respect? Truly, no; for in Judea, where this was not known, it was made an objection against Him: (John 9: 29.) As for this fellow, we know not from whence he is. Obstinate unbelief will never want excuses.

V. Let us see how Christ bore this contempt.

1. He partly excused it, as a common thing, and what might be expected, though not reasonable or just; v. 4. A prophet is not despised any where but in his own country. Some exceptions there may be to this rule; doubtless many have got over this prejudice, but ordinarily it holds good; that ministers are seldom so acceptable in their own country as among strangers; familiarity in the younger years breeds a contempt; the advancement of one that was an inferior begets envy, and men will hardly set those among the guides of their souls, whose fathers they were ready to set with the dogs of their flock; in such a case, therefore, it must not be thought hard treatment; it was Christ's, and wisdom is profitable to direct to other soil.

2. He did some good among them, notwithstanding the slights they put upon Him, for He is kind even to the evil and unthankful; He laid his hands upon a few sick folks, and healed them. Note, It is generous, and becoming the followers of Christ, to content themselves with the satisfaction of doing good, though they be unjustly denied the praise of it.

3. Yet He could there do no such mighty works, as in other places, because of the unbelief that prevailed among the people, by reason of the prejudices of their leaders, v. 5. It is a strange expression, as if unbelief tied the hands of Omnipotence; He would have done as many miracles there as He had done elsewhere, but He could not, because people would not make application for his favors; He could have wrought them, but they forfeited the honor of having them wrought. Note, Unbelief and contempt of Christ stop the current of his favors.

4. He marvelled because of their unbelief, v. 6. We never find Christ wondering but at the faith of Gentile strangers, as the centurion, (Matt. 8: 10.) and the woman of Samaria, and at the unbelief of Jews, his own countrymen. Note, The unbelief of those that enjoy the means of grace, is most amazing.

5. He went round about the villages, teaching, v. 6. If we cannot do good where we would, we must do it where we can, and be glad of any opportunity of serving Christ and souls. Sometimes the gospel of Christ finds better entertainment in villages, where there is less wealth, and mirth, and subtlety, than in populous cities.

V. 7—13. Here is, I. The commission given to the twelve apostles; it is the same which we had more largely, Matt. 10. Mark doth not name them as Matthew doth, because he had named them before when they were first called into fellowship with Him, ch. 3: 16. Hitherto they had been conversant with Christ, had heard his doctrine and seen his miracles; now He determines to make some use of them; they received, that they might give, had learned, that they might teach; and therefore now He began to send them forth. They must not always be studying to get knowledge; they must preach in the country, to do good with their knowledge. Though they were not as yet so well accomplished as they were to be, yet, according to their present ability, they must be set to work, and make further improvement afterward. Observe here,

1. Christ sent them forth by two and two; this Mark takes notice of. They went two and two to a place, that out of the mouth of two witnesses every word might be established; and to be company for one another when they were among strangers, and strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts, one of another. Every common soldier has his comrade; and it is an approved maxim, Two are better than one. Christ would thus teach his ministers to associate, and both lend and borrow help.

2. He gave them power over unclean spirits. He commissioned them to attack the devil's kingdom, and empowered them to cast him out of the bodies of those that were possessed. Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that they cured diseases, and cast out devils, by the Spirit, but preached that only which they had learned from the mouth of Christ.

3. He commanded them not to take provisions with them, neither victuals nor money, that they might appear, wherever they came, to be poor men, not of this world, and therefore might, with the better grace, call people from it to another world. When afterward He bid them take purse and scrip, (Luke 22: 36.) that did not intimate that his care of them was abated; but that they should meet with worse times, than at their first mission. In Matthew and Luke they are forbidden to take staves with them, that is, fighting staves; but here in Mark they are bid to take nothing save a staff only, such as pilgrims carried. They must not put on shoes, but sandals, which were only the soles of shoes tied under their feet; they must go in the readiest dress they could, and not so much as have two coats; for their stay abroad would be short; they must return before winter, and what they wanted, those they preached to would cheerfully accommodate them with.

4. He directed them, whatever house they came to, (v. 10.) 'There abide till ye depart from that place.' Since ye know ye come on an errand sufficient to make you welcome, have that charity for your friends that first invited you, as to believe they do not think you burdensome.

5. He pronounces a very heavy doom upon those that reject the gospel they preached; v. 11. 'Whosoever shall not receive you, or will not so much as hear you, depart thence, and shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them.' Let them know that they have had a fair offer of life; witness that dust; but that, since they have refused it, they cannot expect ever to have another; let them take up with their own dust, for so shall their doom be. That dust, like the dust of Egypt, (Exod. 9: 9.) shall turn into a plague to them; and their condemnation, in the great day, will be more intolerable than that of Sodom; for the angels were sent to Sodom, and were abused there; yet that would not bring on so great a guilt and ruin, as the contempt and abuse of the apostles of Christ, who bring the offers of gospel grace.

II. The apostles were conscious to themselves of great weakness, and expected no secular advantage by it, yet, in obedience to their

V. 11-13. They who are placed in inferior situations, should cheerfully go on with their employments; and, if God have work of another kind for them, this will prove no hindrance to their future usefulness. The Lord Jesus, the Fountain of all authority in his church, dispenses to every man as He pleases: and He will surely qualify and assist those whom He commissions to preach his Gospel.—Where the truth has hitherto been but little known, it is very desirable that ministers should go forth at least by two and two; that they may have the comfort and benefit of each other's society, counsel, and prayers. (Note, Ec. 4: 9-12) —While faithful preachers earnestly desire and uprightly design to be a blessing to the people; and, content with food and raiment, however mean and scanty, seek 'not their's but them;' they often prove the occasion of deeper condemnation to those who constrain them to 'shake off the

Learned men have bestowed pains to show, that it was usual, with the Jews to anoint the sick with oil, in order to their recovery: and some think, that the apostles complied with this custom, without any direction from their Lord. But this is not at all probable: nor can we suppose that the miraculous effect would have followed, had they acted without orders. Doubtless, in this they observed the directions given them by Christ: and the observance was intended to be an outward sign of his inward operation; which was itself an emblem of healing our souls by the union of the Holy Spirit. This practice was continued for some time in the church, as the token of a miraculous cure: but it was obvious, that it must be left off, when miracles ceased. Yet the popish ceremony (or sacrament, as they call it), of 'extreme unction,' seems absurdly to have been derived from it: for that is not used in order to a miraculous cure, but when all hope of recovery is given up. (Note, James 5: 14, 15.)

Anointed with oil.] This is not mentioned by either of the other evangelists; but it is evident from James 5: 14, that in the age of miracles oil was thus employed: yet the reason of this, as of many other things in Scripture, we are not able to assign.

In the countries * the South and East, the oil is very mild, and was used by the ancients (especially by Jews) for the cure of various dis-

Master's order, and in dependence upon his strength, they went out as Abraham, not knowing whither they went. Observe,

1. The doctrine they preached; They preached that men should repent; (v. 12.) that they should change their minds, and reform their lives, in consideration of the near approach of the kingdom of the Messiah. Note, The great design and tendency of gospel preaching should be, to bring people to a new heart and a new way. They did not amuse people with curious speculations, but told them that they must repent of their sins and turn to God.

2. The miracles they wrought. The power Christ gave them over unclean spirits was not ineffectual, nor did they receive it in vain; for they cast out many devils; (v. 13.) and they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them. Some think this oil was used medicinally, according to the custom of the Jews; but I rather think it was used as a sign of miraculous healing, by the appointment of Christ, though not mentioned; and it was afterward used by those elders of the church, to whom, by the Spirit, was given the gift of healing, Jam. 5: 14. It is certain here, and therefore probable there, that anointing the sick with oil, is appropriated to that extraordinary power which is long ceased, &c. herefore that sign must cease with it.

V. 14-29. Here are,

1. The wild notions that the people had concerning Jesus, v. 15. His own countrymen could believe nothing great concerning Him, because they knew his kindred; but others, that were not under the power of that prejudice against Him, were yet willing to believe any thing rather than that He was the Son of God, and the true Messias; they said He is Elias, whom they expected; or, He is one of the Old Testament prophets raised to life; or, as one of the prophets, a prophet newly raised up, equal to those under the Old Testament.

II. The opinion of Herod concerning Him. He heard of his name and fame; and he said, 'It is certainly John whom I beheaded,' v. 16. He is risen from the dead; and though while with us he did no miracle, yet, having removed for a while to another world, he is come with greater power, and now mighty works do show forth themselves in him.'

Note 1. Where there is an idle fancy, there is commonly a working fancy. The people said, It is a prophet risen from the dead; Herod said, It is John Baptist risen from the dead. It seems by this, that the rising of a prophet from the dead, to do mighty works, was thought neither impossible nor improbable, and it was now readily suspected when it was not true; but afterward, when it was true concerning Christ, and a truth undeniably evidenced, it was obstinately denied. Those who most wilfully disbelieve the truth, are commonly most credulous of errors and fancies.

2. They who fight against the cause of God, will find themselves baffled, even when they think themselves conquerors; they cannot gain their point, for the word of the Lord endures forever. They who rejoiced when the witnesses were slain, fretted as much when, in three or four days, they rose again in their successors, Rev. 11: 10, 11. The impenitent sinner, that escapeth the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay.

3. A guilty conscience needs no accuser. Herod charges himself with the murder of John, which perhaps no one else dare charge him with; I beheaded him; and the terror of it made him imagine that Christ was John. He feared John while he lived, and fears him ten times worse when he is dead. One might as well be haunted with ghosts and furies, as with the horrors of an accusing conscience; these, therefore, who would keep an undisturbed peace, must keep an undefiled conscience, Acts 24: 16.

4. There may be strong conviction, where there is not saving conversion. This Herod, who had this notion concerning Christ, afterward sought to kill Him. (Luke 13: 31.) and set Him at nought; (Luke 23: 11.) so that he will not be persuaded, though it be by one risen from the dead; no, not by a John the Baptist risen from the dead.

III. A narrative of Herod's putting John Baptist to death is brought in upon this occasion, as it was in Matthew. Here we may observe,

1. The great veneration which Herod sometimes had for John Baptist, (which is related only by this evangelist, v. 20.) Here we see what a great way a man may go towards grace and glory, and yet come short of both and perish.

(1.) He feared John knowing that he was a just man, and a holy. It is possible that a man may have a great reverence for good men, and especially for good ministers, yea, and for that in them that is good, and yet himself be a bad man. Observe, [1.] John was a just man, and dust of their feet for a testimony against them, by refusing to hear and receive their message.—How heinous a sin must unbelief be, in all who have the adequate means of conviction; seeing a righteous God will render the final doom of those who refuse the salvation of the Gospel, even more intolerable than that of Sodom and Gomorrah! Notes, John 3: 19-21. Heb. 2: 1-4. 12: 22-25.—The servants of Christ must go forth in his name, every where 'preaching, that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance;' and enforcing their exhortations both by the terrors of the law, and by the promises of the Gospel. In this way we may hope that our labors will be blessed, to turn many 'from darkness unto light, and the power of Satan unto God,' and that we shall be the instruments of healing their souls. SCOTT.

orders. Celsus. Galen. Many maintain that the oil was here used as a medicine. So Kuinoel, Schutz, Michaelis, Paulus, Pott and Wetstein. I agree with the older commentators and Rosenmuller, that the healing was miraculous, and that the anointing was only a symbolical action, typical of the relief and joy imparted by Divine assistance. The first Christians (says Grotius,) who were accustomed to practise, in visible signs, the allegorical allusions in the Scriptures, used oil in their rites, as at baptism, and on the imposition of hands which succeeded it. Thus St. Paul, 2 Cor. 1: 21, and John 2: 20, 27, speaking of the unction of faith, or of the Spirit. The Christians used oil in the ordination of priests, (says Tertullian,) and in re-admission of heretics. As the art of medicine (observes Willan, ap. Eusebius) was practised among the Jews by the priests and prophets, its remedies became partly sacred; and unction in dangerous cases became a religious ceremony with imposition of hands, and prayers for the sick.' Verses 14-29.

Notes, Matt. 14: 3-12. Luke 3: 19, 20. 9: 7-9.—(14.) King Herod. Thus his courtiers and flatterers called him, though only a tetrarch, or governor of Galilee under the Romans: being a fourth part of his father's kingdom. (Notes, Matt. 14: 1, 2. Luke 3: 1.)—It is not easy to meet with a more striking instance, than this, of the force of conscience over a guilty mind, or a stronger proof how perpetually

18 For John had said unto Herod, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife."

19 Therefore Herodias had *a quarrel against him, and would have killed him; but she could not.

20 For Herod "feared" John, knowing that he was a just man, and an holy, and "observed" conversation; and when he heard him, he did many things, "and heard him gladly."

21 And "when a convenient day was come, that Herod on "his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee;"

22 And when "the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced and pleased Herod, and them that sat with him; the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee."

23 And "he sware unto her, "Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom."

24 And she went forth, and "said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, "The head of John the Baptist."

25 And she came in straightway "with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me now and by, in "a charger, the head of John the Baptist."

26 And the king "was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her."

a holy; to make a complete good man, both justice and holiness are necessary; holiness toward God, and justice toward men. John was mortified to this world, and so was a good friend both to justice and holiness. [2.] Herod knew this, not only by common fame, but by personal acquaintance with him. Those that have but little justice and holiness themselves, may yet discern it with respect in others. And, [3.] He therefore feared (honored) him. Holiness and justice command veneration, and many that are not good themselves, have respect for those that are.

(2.) He observed him; he sheltered him from the malice of his enemies; (so some understand it); or, rather, he had a regard to his exemplary conversation, and took notice of that in him that was praiseworthy, and commended him in the hearing of those about him.

(3.) He heard him preach; which was great condescension, considering John's appearance. To hear Christ himself preach in our streets, will be but a poor plea in the great day, Luke 13:26.

(4.) He did many of those things which John, in his preaching, taught him. He was not only a hearer of the word, but in part a doer. Some sins which John, in his preaching, reproved, he forsook, and some duties he bound himself to; but it will not suffice to do many things, unless we have respect to all the commandments.

(5.) He heard him gladly. He did not hear him with terror, as Felix heard Paul, but with pleasure. There is a flashy joy, which a hypocrite may have in hearing the word; Ezekiel said to his hearers a lovely song; (Ezek. 33:32.) and the stony ground received the Word with joy, Luke 8:13.

2. John's faithfulness to Herod, in telling him of his faults. Herod had married his brother Philip's wife, v. 17. All the country, no doubt, cried shame on him for it; but John reproved him, told him plainly, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. This iniquity he could not leave when he did many things that John taught him; therefore John tells him of this particularly. Though he were a king, he would not spare him, any more than Elijah did Ahab, when he said, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? Though John had an interest in him, and might fear his plain-dealing would destroy his interest, yet he reproved him; for faithful are the wounds of a friend; (Prov. 27:6.) and though there are some swine that will turn again, and rend those that cast pearls before them, yet, ordinarily, he that rebuketh a man, (if the person reproved has the understanding of a man,) afterward shall find more favor than he that flattereth with his tongue, Prov. 28:23. Though it was dangerous to offend Herod, and much more to offend Herodias, yet John would run the hazard. Note, Those ministers that would be found faithful in the work of God, must not be afraid of the face of man. If we seek to please men, further than is for their spiritual good, we are not the servants of Christ.

"it goads the sinner, not only with well-grounded apprehensions of impending vengeance, but with imaginary terrors and visionary dangers... There is reason to believe that Herod... was of the sect called the Sadducees; yet his fears overruled all the prejudices of his sect, and raised up the semblance of the murdered Baptist... Herod had even married a considerable time to the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea; but conceiving a violent passion for his brother Philip's wife, Herodias, he first seduced her affections from her husband, then dismissed his own wife, and married Herodias during the lifetime of his brother... Herodias had a passion to gratify, stronger perhaps than any other, when it takes full possession of the human heart, and that was revenge. She had been mortally injured, as she conceived, by the Baptist; and she not only felt the highest indignation at this insult, but was afraid that his repeated remonstrances might at length prevail... Herodias 'had a quarrel against John' according to the original, 'she fastened a "quarrel upon him," and was determined not to let go her hold, till she had destroyed him.' We are informed by Josephus, that Herod's marriage with Herodias drew "in him the resentment of Aretas, the father of his first wife, who

3. The malice which Herodias bore to John for this; v. 19. She had a quarrel with him, and would have killed him; but when she could not obtain that, she had him committed to prison, v. 17. Herod respected him, till he touched him in his Herodias. Many that pretend to honor prophesying, are for smooth things only, and love good preaching, if it keep far enough from their beloved sin; but if that be touched, they cannot bear it. No quarrel if the world hate those who testify that its works are evil. But it is better that sinners persecute ministers for their faithfulness, than curse them eternally for their unfaithfulness.

4. The plot laid to take John's life. I think that Herod was himself in the plot, notwithstanding his pretences to be displeased, and that the thing was concerted between him and Herodias; for it is said to be when a convenient day was come, (v. 21.) fit for such a purpose. (1.) There must be a ball at court, upon the king's birthday, and a supper prepared for his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee. (2.) To grow the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias must dance publicly, and Herod must be wonderfully charmed; and if he be, they that sit with him, cannot but, in compliance to him, be so too. (3.) The king hereupon must make her an extravagant promise, to give her whatever she would ask, even to the half of the kingdom; and yet, that, if rightly understood, would not have reached the end designed, for John Baptist's head was worth more than his whole kingdom. This promise is bound with an oath, that no room might be left to fly from it; He swore to her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask, I will give. I can scarcely think he would have made such an unlimited promise, but that he knew what she would ask. (4.) She, being instructed by Herodias her mother, asked the head of John Baptist; and she must have it brought her in a charger; (v. 24, 25.) and there must be no delay. (5.) Herod granted it, and the execution was done immediately while the company were together, which we can scarcely think the king would have done, if he had not determined the matter before. But he takes on him, [1.] To be very backward to it, and that he would not for all the world have done it, if he had not been surprised into such a promise; The king was exceeding sorry that he seemed to be so, but it was all grimace, he was really pleased that he had found a pretence to get John out of the way. The man who cannot dissemble, knows not how to reign. And yet he was not without sorrow for it; natural conscience will not suffer men to sin easily; the very commission of it is vexatious; what then will the reflection upon it be? [2.] He takes on him to be very sensible of the obligation of his oath; whereas if the damsel had asked but a fourth part of his kingdom, doubtless he would have found out a way to evade his oath. The promise was rashly made, and could not bind him to an unrighteous thing.

"declared war against him, and defeated his army with great slaughter. This, says the historian, the Jews considered as the just judgment of God for his murder of John. Not long after this, both he and Herodias were deprived of their kingdom by the Roman emperor, and sent into perpetual banishment; and it is added by an early historian, that Salome met with a violent and untimely death."

He mentions "that the dancer Laal-kouer gained such a complete ascendancy over the Mogul emperor, Maaz-eddin, that he became joint governess of the empire with himself!"

V 14—29. When the truths and honor of Christ are spread abroad, by the successful labors of ministers, men will make their observations or conjectures respecting them, according to their different humors or prejudices: and then the secret remorse and horror of conscience, which wicked men experience, will often be brought to light. (Note, Ps. 73:18—22.)—No infidel principles, or hardness of heart, or worldly grandeur, can at all times preserve the enemies of God from terrors and anxieties. They are seldom wholly exempt from convictions of their own guilt, and they are often unable to exclude the dread of divine vengeance. They may imprison or murder their reprovers, but this only increases the clamor of their inward accuser: and any person, who believes the Bible, may predict the consequence of a man's determining to mount, if possible, the summit of prosperity, by whatever means and at any rate; for if he succeed, he will find his desired eminence a turbulent and perilous situation; and unless he have the wisdom and grace to descend into the valley of humiliation, he will soon be cast into the depths of hell. We may see the reason, why men can not receive the message of God's ministers, and why they treat them with enmity; they feel that their example and doctrine is a reproach; their pride is affronted, their consciences are disquieted, and their darling indulgences opposed: thus they have an irreconcilable quarrel against the very persons whom they cannot but stand in awe of, as 'just and holy men,' whom they have often heard with apparent satisfaction, and at whose instance they have 'done many things.' But the frame of men's minds is very different, when they are hearing the word of God, as delivered by a heart-searching, awakening preacher, than it is at those times,

(37.) Sent an executioner.] 'The word translated executioner properly denotes a spy or sentinel, and as these sentinels kept guard at the residences of Roman governors, so they were employed in other offices, and often performed the service of executioners. As, however, we learn from Josephus, that Herod was at this very time engaged in a war with Aretas, king of Arabia, in consequence of Herod having divorced his daughter to marry Herodias, and as this event occurred at an entertainment given at the castle of Machabes, while his army was on its march against his father-in-law, we are furnished with an additional reason why a spectator or sentinel should have been employed as an executioner; and are thus able to discover such a latent and un-

Sinful oaths must be repented of, and not performed; for repentance is the undoing of what have done amiss, as far as is in our power. When Theodosius the emperor was urged by a suitor with a promise, he answered, I said it, but did not promise it, if it be unjust. If we may suppose that Herod knew nothing of the design when he made that promise, it is probable that he was hurried into the doing of it by those about him; for he did it for their sakes who sat with him, whose company he was proud of, and therefore would do any thing to gratify them. Thus d. princes make themselves slaves to those whose respect they covet. None of Herod's subjects stood in more awe of him than he did of his lords, high captains, and chief estates. The king sent an executioner, a soldier of his guard. Bloody tyrants have executioners ready to obey their most cruel decrees. Thus Saul has a Doeg at hand, to fall upon the priests of the Lord, when his own footmen declined it.

5. The effect of this is, (1.) That Herod's wicked court is all in triumph, because this prophet tormented them; the head is made a present of to the damsel, and by her to her mother, v. 28. (2.) That John Baptist's friends are all in tears; his disciples little thought of this; they took up the neglected corpse, and laid it in a tomb; where Herod, if he had pleased, might have found it, when he frightened himself with the fancy that John Baptist was risen from the dead.

I. The apostles had dispersed themselves into several quarters of the country for some time, but when they had made good their several appointments, by consent they gathered themselves together, to compare notes, and came to Jesus, their Centre, to give Him an account of what they had done: as the servant that was sent to invite to the feast, and had received answers from the guests, came, and shewed his lord all these things; they told Him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. Ministers are accountable both for what they do, and for what they teach; and must watch over their own souls, and for the souls of others, as those that must give account, Heb. 13:17. Let them neither do any thing, nor teach any thing, but what they are willing should be related and repeated to the Lord Jesus. It is a comfort to ministers, when they can appeal to Christ concerning their doctrine and manner of life, both which, perhaps, have been misrepresented by men; and He gives them leave to be free with Him, and to lay open their case before Him, to tell Him all things, what treatment they have met with, what success, and what disappointment.

II. See the tender care of Christ for their repose, after their fatigue, v. 31. He said unto them, perceiving them to be almost spent, Come ye yourselves apart, into a desert place, and rest awhile. It would seem that John's disciples came to Christ with tidings of their master's death, about the same time with his own disciples. Note, Christ takes cognizance of the frights of some, and the toils of others, of his disciples, provides suitable relief for both, rest for the tired, and refuge for the terrified. With kindness and compassion Christ says to them, Come, and rest! Note, The most active servants of Christ cannot be always upon the stretch of business, but have bodies that require relaxation; we shall not be able to serve God without ceasing, day and night, till we come to heaven, where they never rest from praising Him, Rev. 4:8. The Lord considers our frame, and not only allows time for rest, but puts in mind of resting. Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers. Return to thy rest. And those that work diligently and faithfully, may cheerfully retire to rest. The sleep of the laboring man is sweet. But observe, 1. Christ calls them to come themselves apart; for, if they had any body with them, they would have something to say, or something to do, for their good; if they must rest, they must be alone. 2. He invites them not to some pleasant country-seat, to fine buildings and gardens, but into a desert place, where the accommodations were poor, fitted by nature only, and not by art, for quiet and rest. But no wonder that He, who had a ship for his preaching place, had but a desert for his resting place. 3. He calls them only to rest awhile; they must not expect to rest long, only to get breath. There is no remaining rest for when they are celebrating luxurious and joyous feasts, indulging their appetites, surrounded with flatterers, ar. carousing with dissipated companions. (Note, Dan. 5:1—4.) such revels are Satan's opportunities: he waits for them, in order to take his advantage, to push men forward into enormities, from which they were restrained by remaining scruples, in their more sober hours. Hence it has often been known, that the most atrocious murders have been hastily committed, as it were, to grace a riotous banquet, or to gratify some worthless individual, who had contributed to the luxury or conviviality of the occasion! (Note, 2 Sam. 13:22—29.) Thus the great murderer of men carries his point, and employs his servants in the work of destroying lives and souls.—If the history of persecutions and martyrs could be written, under the guidance of inspiration, it would be found, that thousands of the most valuable lives had fallen a sacrifice to the revenge of some ambitious and licentious Herodias; or of some base wretch, whose pride had been affronted, and whose success in wickedness had been impeded by faithful reproofs. Yet even those who are instigated by such prompters often avow, that their conscience and honor are concerned; and devise to connect oaths, and regard to friends, to the public peace, or the good of the church, with the gratification of revenge! They can, however, do the servants of God no real harm: He will vouchsafe them another kind of recompense, than they receive from men, and avenge their cause. But woe will be the doom of those, who have instigated even their own children, and nearest relatives, to the most atrocious crimes, in order to gratify their own malignant passions! (P. O. Matt. 14:1—12.)

designed evidence, as clearly evinces the truth of the evangelical narrative.

(29.) 'Josephus attributes the execution of the Baptist to the fact that his authority with the people might lead to a rebellion. Exclusive of inspiration, the consistency, the nearness of time to the event related, being contemporary, and, as it were, on the spot, (a brother of Peter, the friend of Mark, having been, amongst others, John's disciple,) the minuteness, the impartiality, and moderation, in showing how Herod was surprised into consent, would, between two Greek or Roman historians, give the preference to the evangelists. Josephus was born some years after John was beheaded, and was neither known to his disciples, nor interested to inquire minutely into the subject.' MARKIN

32 And they departed into a desert place by ship privately.

33 And the people saw them departing, and many knew him, and ran a-foot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto him.

34 And Jesus, when he came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: and he began to teach them many things.

35 ¶ And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him, and said, This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed;

36 Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat.

37 He answered and said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat?

38 He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes.

39 And he commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass.

40 And they sat

the people of God till they come to heaven. 4. The reason given for this is, not so much because they had been in constant work, but because they now were in a constant hurry; so that they had not their work in any order; for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. Let but proper time be kept for every thing, and a great deal of work may be done with great ease; but if people be continually coming and going, and no rule or method be observed, a little work will not be done without trouble. 5. They withdrew, accordingly, by ship; not crossing the water, but making a coasting voyage to the desert of Bethesda, v. 32. Going by water was much less toilsome than going by land. They went away privately, that they might be by themselves. The most public persons cannot but wish to be private sometimes.

III. The people, however, followed him. It was rude to do so, when He and his disciples were desirous, for such good reason, to retire; and yet they are not blamed for it, nor bid to go back, but welcomed. Note, A failure in good manners will easily be excused in those who follow Christ, if it be but made up in a fulness of good affections. They followed Him without being called upon. Here is no time set, no meeting appointed, no bell tolled; yet they fly like a cloud, and as doves to their windows. They followed Him out of the cities, quitted their houses and shops, to hear Him preach. They followed Him afoot, though He was gone by sea, and seemed to slight them, yet they ran afoot, and made such haste, that they outwent the disciples, and came together with an appetite to the Word of God. Nay, they followed Him into a desert place, despicable and inconvenient. The presence of Christ will turn a wilderness into a paradise.

IV. Christ, when He saw much people, instead of being moved with displeasure, as many a good man would have been, was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep having no shepherd; they seemed to be well inclined, and willing to be taught, but they had no one to lead and guide them right; none to feed them; and therefore, in compassion to them, He not only healed their sick, as it is in Matthew, but taught them many things, and we may be sure that they were all good.

V. His hearers He generously made his guests, and treated them at a splendid entertainment: so it might truly be called, because miraculous.

1. The disciples moved that they should be sent home. When the day was now far spent, and night drew on, they said, This is a desert place, and much time is now passed; send them away to buy bread, v. 35, 36. This the disciples suggested to Christ; but we do not find that the multitude themselves did. They did not say, Send us away, (though they could not but be hungry,) for they esteemed the words of Christ's mouth more than their necessary food, and forgot themselves when they were hearing Him; but the disciples thought it would be a kindness to dismiss them. Note, Willing minds will do more, and hold out longer, than one would expect.

2. Christ ordered that they should all be fed; (v. 37.) Give ye them to eat. Though their crowding after Him and his disciples hindered them from eating, (v. 31,) yet He would not therefore, to be even with them, send them away fasting, but, to teach us to be kind to those who are rude to us, He ordered provision to be made for them; that bread which Christ and his disciples took with them into the desert, that they might make a quiet meal of it for themselves. He will have them to partake of. Thus was He given to hospitality. They attended on the spiritual food of his word, and then He took care that they should not want other food. The way of duty, as it is the way of safety, is the way to supply. God fills the pools with rain from heaven, and makes a well, even in the valley of Baca, for those that are going Zion-ward, from strength to strength, Ps. 84: 6, 7. Providence, not temptation, but duty trampled, never yet failed any, but has refreshed many with reasonable and surprising relief. It has often been seen in the mount of the Lord, Jehovah-jireh, that the Lord will provide.

3. The disciples objected against it as impracticable; Shall we go, and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat? Through the weakness of their faith, instead of waiting for directions from Christ, they perplex the cause with projects of their own. It was a question whether they had two hundred pence with them, and whether the country would, of a sudden, afford so much bread, if they had, and whether that would suffice so great a company; but thus Moses objected, Num. 11: 22. Shall the flocks or herds be slain for them? Christ would let them see their folly in forecasting for themselves, that they might put the greater value upon his provision.

4. They had brought with them five loaves, in their ship; and two fishes, perhaps, they caught as they came along. This was but a little for Christ and his disciples, and yet this they must give away, as the widow her two mites, and as the churches of Macedonia's deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality. We often find Christ at others' tables, dining with one and supping with another: but here we have Him supping a great many at his own charge, which shows that, when others ministered to Him of their substance, it was not because He could not supply Himself otherwise; (if He were hungry, He needed not tell them;) but it was a piece of humiliation, that He was pleased to submit to, nor was it agreeable to the intention of miracles, that He should work them for Himself. Observe,

(1.) The provision was ordinary. Here were no rarities, though Christ, if He would please, could have furnished his table with them; thus He would teach us to be content with food convenient for us, and not be desirous of dainties. If we have for necessity, it is no matter though we have not for delicacy. God, in love, gives meat for our hunger; but, in wrath, gives meat for our lusts, Ps. 78: 18. The promise to them that fear the Lord, is, that verily they shall be fed, not fasted. If Christ and his disciples took up with mean things, surely we may.

(2.) The guests were orderly; they sat down by companies upon the green grass, (v. 39.) in ranks by hundreds and by fifties, (v. 40.) that the provision might the more easily be distributed amongst them; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. Thus care was taken that every one should have enough, and none be overlooked, nor any have more than was fit.

(3.) A blessing was craved upon the meat; He looked up to heaven, and blessed. Christ did not call one of his disciples to crave a blessing, but did it himself; (v. 41.) and by virtue of this blessing the bread strangely multiplied, and so did the fishes, for they did all eat, and were filled, though they were five thousand, v. 42, 44. This miracle was significant, and shows that Christ came into the world to be the great Feeder as well as Healer; not only to restore, but to preserve and nourish spiritual life; and in Him there is enough for all that come to Him; none are sent empty away from Christ, but those that come to Him full of themselves.

(4.) Care was taken of the fragments that remained, with which they filled twelve baskets. Though Christ had bread enough at command He would hereby teach us, not to waste: remembering how many there are that want, and we know not but we may some time or other want such fragments as we throw away.

In ranks. The word is taken from beds in a garden, to which companies of people, seated in rows, twice the number in rank as in file, would bear resemblance. Many expositors seem to think, that the whole multitude formed one body, a hundred in rank and fifty in file; but the plural number leads us to conclude, that several distinct companies were formed, but all arranged in the same manner.

This passage we had, Matt. 14: 22, &c. only what was there related concerning Peter, is omitted here.

I. Christ constrained his disciples to go before by ship to Bethsaida, intending to follow them, as they supposed, by land. The people were loth to scatter, so that it cost Him some time and pains to send them away. For now that they had been fed, they were in no haste to leave Him. But as long as we are here in this world, we have no continuing city, no, not in communion with Christ. The everlasting feast is reserved for the future state.

II. Christ departed into a mountain, to pray. Observe, 1. He prayed; though He had so much preaching work upon his hands, yet He was much in prayer; He prayed often, and long, which is an encouragement to us to depend upon his intercession at the right hand of the Father. 2. He went alone, to pray; though He needed not to retire for the avoiding either of discretion or of ostentation, yet, to set us an example, and to encourage us in our secret addresses to God, He prayed alone, and for want of a closet, went up into a mountain. A good man is never less alone than when alone with God.

III. The disciples were in distress at sea; The wind was contrary, (p. 45.) so that they toiled in rowing, and could not get forward. This was a specimen of the hardships they were to expect, when hereafter He should send them abroad to preach the gospel; they must expect to toil in rowing, work hard against so strong a stream; they must likewise expect to be tossed with waves; and by exposing them now, He intended to train them up for such difficulties, that they might learn to endure hardness. The church is often like a ship at sea, tossed with tempests, and not comforted; we may have Christ for us, and yet wind and tide against us; but it is a comfort to Christ's disciples in a storm, that their Master is in the heavenly mount, interceding for them.

IV. Christ made them a kind visit upon the water. He could have checked the winds, where He was, or have sent an angel to their relief; but He chose to help them in the most endearing manner possible, and therefore came to them Himself.

51 And he went up unto them into the ship; ²¹and the wind ceased: ²²and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered.

52 For ²³they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for ²⁴their heart was hardened.

53 ¶ And when they had passed over, they came into ²⁵the land of Gennesaret, and drew to the shore.

54 And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they ²⁶knew him, 55 And ²⁷ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard he was.

56 And whithersoever he entered, into villages, or cities, or country, ²⁸they laid the sick in the streets, and besought him that they might ²⁹touch if it were but ³⁰the border of his garment; and as many as touched ³¹him were made whole.

1. He did not come till the fourth watch of the night, three o'clock in the morning; but then He came. Note, If Christ's visits be deferred long, yet at length He will come; and in their extremity, his opportunity will appear so much the more seasonable. Though the salvation tarry, yet we must wait for it; at the end it shall speak, though in the fourth watch of the night, and not lie.

2. He came, walking upon the waters. The sea was now tossed with waves, yet Christ came, walking upon it; for though the floods lift up their voice, the Lord on high is mightier Ps. 93: 3, 4. No difficulties can obstruct Christ's gracious appearance, when the set time is come. He will find, or force, a way through the most tempestuous sea, for their deliverance, Ps. 42: 7, 8.

3. He would have passed by them, that is, He set his face, and steered his course, as if He would have gone farther, and took no notice of them; this He did, to awaken them to call to Him. Note, Providence, when it is acting designedly and directly for the succor of God's people, yet sometimes seems as if it regarded not their case. They thought that He would, but we may be sure that He would not, have passed by them.

4. They were frightened at the sight of Him, supposing Him to have been an apparition; They all saw Him, and were troubled, (p. 50.) thinking it had been some demon, that haunted them, and raised this storm. We often perplex and frighten ourselves with the creatures of our own imagination.

5. He encouraged them, and silenced their fears, by making Himself known to them; saying, Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. Note, (1.) We know not Christ till He is pleased to reveal Himself: It is I; your Master, Friend, Redeemer and Savior. It is I, that came to a troublesome earth, and now to a tempestuous sea. (2.) The knowledge of Christ, as He is in Himself, and near to us, is enough to make the disciples of Christ cheerful even in a storm, and no longer fearful. If it be so, why am I thus? If it is Christ that is with thee, be of good cheer, be not afraid. Notes, Matt. 14: 22—32. The same words are sometimes used for the remaining, and in a degree prevailing evil in true disciples, as for the total dominion of evil in unbelievers. (Matt. 16: 23. CHAP. VII.

The Pharisees find fault with the disciples for eating with unwashed hands; and Jesus shows, that their traditions 'make void the law of God,' 1-19. He teaches the source and nature of defilement, 14-23; heals the daughter of a Syrophenician woman, 24-30; and a man who was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, 31-37.

THEN came together unto him the Pharisees and certain of the scribes, which came from Jerusalem.

2 And when they saw some of his disciples eat bread with * defiled, that is to say, with unwashed hands, they found fault.

3 For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands † oft, eat not, holding ^a the tradition of the elders.

4 And when they come from the market, ^a except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, and sence with us, in a stormy day, is enough to make us of good cheer, though clouds and darkness be round about us. He said, It is I. He doth not tell them who He was; (there was no occasion,) they knew his voice, as the sheep know the voice of their own shepherd, John 10:4. How readily doth the spouse say, once and again, It is the voice of my Beloved! Cant. 2:8, 5:2. He said, I am He; or, I am; it is God's name, when He comes to deliver Israel, Exod. 3:14. So it is Christ's, now that He comes to deliver his disciples. When Christ said to those that came to apprehend Him by force, I am He, they were struck down by it, John 18:6. When He saith to those that come to apprehend Him by faith, I am He, they are raised up by it, and comforted.

6. He went up to them into the ship, embarked with them, and made them easy. Let them but have their Master with them, and all is well. And as soon as He was come into the ship, the wind ceased. In the former storm that they were in, it is said, He arose, and rebuked the winds, and said to the sea, Peace, be still; (ch. 4:39.) but here we read of no such formal command given, only the wind ceased. Note, Our Lord Jesus will be sure to do his own work always effectually, though not always alike solemnly, and with observation. Though we hear not the command given, yet, if thus the wind cease, and we have the comfort of a calm, say, it is because Christ is in the ship, and his decree is gone forth or ever we are aware, Cant. 6:12. When we come with Christ to heaven, the wind ceaseth; there are no storms in the upper region.

7. They were more astonished at this miracle than became them; They were sore amazed in themselves; as if they were a new and unaccountable thing, as if Christ had never done the like before, and they had no reason to expect He should do it now; they ought to admire the power of Christ, and to be confirmed hereby in their belief of his being the Son of God; but why all this confusion about it? It was because they considered not the miracle of the loaves; had they given that its due weight, they would not have been so much surprised at this; for his multiplying the bread was as great an instance of his power as his walking on the water. They were strangely stupid, and their heart was hardened, or else they would not have thought it a thing incredible that Christ should command a calm. It is for want of a right understanding of Christ's former works, that we are transported at the thought of his present works, as if there never were the like before.

V. When they came to the land of Gennesaret, which lay between Bethsaida and Capernaum, the people bid them welcome; The men of that place presently knew Jesus, (v. 54.); and knew what a universal Healer He was; they knew likewise that He used to stay but a little while at a place, and therefore were concerned to improve this opportunity. They ran through that whole region round about, with all possible expedition, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick; there was no danger when they hoped to get a cure, v. 55. Let Him go where he would, He was crowded with patients—in towns, cities, in the villages about the cities; they laid the sick in the streets, to be in his way, and begged leave for them to touch if it were but the border of his garment, as the woman with the bloody issue did, by whom, it should seem, this method of application was first brought in; and as many as touched were made whole. We do not find that they were desirous to be taught by Him, only to be healed. If ministers could cure people's bodily diseases, what multitudes would attend them! But it is sad to think how much more concerned the most of men are about their bodies, than about their souls.

CHAP. VII. v. 1-23. One design of Christ was, to set aside the ceremonial law: to take away for which, He begins with the ceremonial law which men had made, and added to the law of God, and discharges his disciples from the obligation of it. These Pharisees and scribes are said to come from Jerusalem to Galilee, fourscore or a hundred miles, to quarrel with our Savior, where they supposed Him to have the greatest reputation. Had they come so far to be taught, their zeal had been commendable; but to come so far to oppose Him, and to check the progress of his Gospel, was wicked. It would seem that the scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem pretended not only to a pre-eminence,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30-56. While the enemies of God are triumphing in their success, and his friends are mourning over the loss of those who have entered into their rest; He will send forth other ministers to spread his gospel, and protect them in their labors till they be finished.—Every minister must give an account of himself to Christ at last: and it behoves us now to do it continually, before his 'throne of grace'; both concerning 'all we have done, and all we have taught.' Thus we shall have the comfort of his gracious acceptance of that which has been right, and obtain his blessing upon our labors; and thus we may seek his forgiveness of what has been wrong, pray that the effects of it may be counteracted, and learn to profit even by our own mistakes and offences.—Our Lord, knowing our frailty, will allow and provide seasons of relaxation after fatiguing exertions in his service: that we may be recruited for our work; recollect ourselves respecting the state of our souls; and receive further instructions concerning our future conduct: and if He, by sickness, or any other providential hindrance, lay us aside for a season from our work, we should not think the time wasted, but listen more attentively to his teaching. Those who know the preciousness of Christ and his salvation, will break through all hindrances, to seek Him; nor will He refuse assistance to those, who deviate from ordinary rules, to obtain blessings. He has compassion for them who are 'as sheep not having a shepherd;' and such as wait on Him, obtain all things needful for soul and body: for, as He died on the cross, that He might feed our perishing souls with 'the Bread of life,' He will not fail to give us food for our bodies also. While we therefore cheerfully depend on grace, let us copy his example, in being accessible at all times to those who want our help; in compassionating the temporal afflictions of our neighbors, as well as the condition of their souls; and in being always 'ready to distribute, and glad to communicate.' In order to this, we should be frugal in our expenses, that we may have the more to employ in liberality; and we may trust in the Lord to make up, by his blessing, whatever is necessary to our state in life. We should also learn to connect piety and charity together; and to delight alternately in communion with God, and in doing good to men: and should we meet with storms and difficulties in the path of duty, we may by faith behold our Advocate pleading our cause, and ready to come to our help, as it were 'walking upon the waves.' Did we duly regard even our own experience of his power and love, we should not be so much alarmed at renewed difficulties; our expectations would be raised higher; and, though our amazement at his renewed interpositions might be less, our gratitude and praise would be greater, than they now are. But we lose much of our comfort, by forgetfulness and hardness of heart.—Did men value the health of their souls as they do that of their bodies and had they strong faith in the Redeemer's power and grace they would flock to Him, sparing neither trouble nor inconvenience, and beseech Him, that they might, in faith, 'touch the hem of his garment;' for those who thus apply to Him, will be made whole of their most inveterate diseases.—Let us learn to be doing good wherever we go, and seek the salvation of Christ, for others and ourselves.

(Note, Matt. 15:1, 2) If we suppose, that they always bathed the whole body, after they returned from the markets, which is not very probable, we cannot conceive that they plunged their cushions in water also. The Pharisees blamed Christ's disciples for 'eating with unwashed hands;' and not for immersing their bodies in water: so it seems undeniable, that by the words baptize and baptisms, a partial application of water was intended, in this, as well as in several other places (Notes, Luke 11:37, 38. Heb. 9:8-10.) SCOTT.

The Pharisees observed a multitude of traditions; i. e. unwritten ordinances which originated with their ancestors, and some of them, they pretend, with Moses himself. Among these was the duty of always pots, brazen vessels, and of tables.

5 Then the Pharisees and scribes asked him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashed hands?

6 He answered and said unto them, 'Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me.

7 Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

8 For, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do.

9 And he said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition.

10 For Moses said, Honor thy father and thy mother; and, Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death.

11 But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, A gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be but to an authority over the country clergy, and therefore kept up their visits, and sent inquisitors among them, as they did to John when he appeared, John 1: 19.

1. The tradition of the elders was to wash their hands before meat; a cleanly custom, and no harm in it; and yet to be over-nice in it discovers too great a care about the body; but they placed religion in it, and would not leave it indifferent, as it was in its own nature; they interposed their authority, and commanded it, upon pain of excommunication, as a tradition of the elders. The papists pretend to a zeal for the authority of the church, and talk much of councils and fathers, when it is nothing but a zeal for their own wealth and dominion, that governs them; and so it was with the Pharisees.

The Pharisees and all the Jews, washed their hands oft; (so we render it;) others think it signifies the pains they took in washing their hands; they washed with great care, they washed their hands to their wrists; (so some;) they lifted up their hands when they were wet, that the water might run to their elbows. 2. They particularly washed before they ate bread; that is, before a solemn meal. Whosoever eats the bread over which they recite the benediction, Blessed be He that produceth bread, must wash his hands before and after; or else he was thought defiled. 3. They took special care, when they came from the markets, to wash their hands; it signifies any place of concourse where it might be supposed there were heathen or Jews under a ceremonial pollution, by coming near to whom they thought themselves polluted. The rule of the rabbins was, that, if they washed their hands well in the morning, it would serve for all day, provided they kept alone; but, if they went into company, they must not eat or pray till they had washed their hands; thus the elders gained a reputation among the people for sanctity, and kept up an authority over conscience. 4. They added to this washing of cups, and pots, and brazen vessels, which they suspected had been made use of by heathens, or persons polluted; and the tables on which they ate their meat. There were many cases in which, by the law of Moses, washings were appointed; but they added to them, and enforced their own impositions as much as God's institutions.

II. Christ's disciples knew the law, and the common usage; but they would not be bound by it; they ate bread with defiled, that is, with unwashed hands, &c. 2. Eating with unwashed hands, they called eating with defiled hands; thus men kept up their superstitious vanities by putting things into an ill name. The disciples knew (it is probable) that the Pharisees had their eye upon them, and yet they would not humor them by a compliance with their traditions, but took their liberty and ate bread with unwashed hands; and herein their righteousness, however it might seem to come short, did really exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, Matt. 5: 20.

III. The Pharisees took offence at this; they censured them as profane, and men of loose conversation, or rather as men that would not submit to the power of the church, and were therefore rebellious, and schismatical. They brought a complaint against them to their Master, expecting that He would order them to conform; for they that are fond of their own inventions, are commonly ready to appeal to Christ, as He should countenance them. They do not ask, Why do not thy disciples do as we do (Though they meant to make themselves the standard.) But why do not they walk according to the tradition of the elders? &c. To which it was easy to answer, that, by receiving the doctrine of Christ, they had more understanding than all the ancients, Ps. 119: 99, 100.

IV. Christ argues with the Pharisees concerning the authority by which this ceremony was imposed; but this He did not publicly, to the multitude, (as appears by his calling the people to Him, v. 14.) lest He should seem to stir them up to faction and discontent at their governors; but addressed it as a reproof to the persons concerned.

1. He reproves them for their hypocrisy in pretending to honor God, when they had no such design in their religious observances; (v. 6, 7.) They honor me with their lips, pretend it is for the glory of God that they impose those things; but their heart is far from God, and governed by ambition and covetousness. They would be thought to appropriate themselves as a holy people to the Lord, when it is the farthest thing in their thought. They rested in the outside of religious exercises, and their hearts were not right with God, and this was worshipping God in vain; for neither was He pleased with such devotions, nor they profited by them.

2. He reproves them for placing religion in the injunctions of their elders and rulers. They taught for doctrines the traditions of men. When they should have pressed upon people the great principles of religion, they enforced the canons of their church, and judged of people according as they did, or did not, conform to them, without considering whether they lived in obedience to God's laws or no. It was true there were divers washings imposed by the law of Moses, (Heb. 9: 10,) which were intended to signify inward purification of the heart, from worldly lusts, which God requires as absolutely necessary to our communion with Him; but, instead of providing the substance, they added to the ceremony, and were very nice in washing pots and cups; and observe, He adds, Many other such like things ye do, v. 8. Note, Superstition is an endless thing. If one human invention is admitted, though seemingly innocent, as this of washing hands, behold, a troop comes; a door is opened for many other such things.

3. He reproves them for laying aside the commandment of God, not urging it in their preaching and in their discipline, conniving at the violation of it, as no longer of force, v. 8. Note, It is the mischief of impositions, that too often they who are zealous for them, have little zeal for the essential duties of religion, but can contentedly see them laid aside. Nay, they rejected the commandment of God, v. 9. Ye do fairly disannul the commandment of God; and by your traditions make the Word of God of no effect, v. 13. God's statutes shall not only lie forgotten, as obsolete laws, but they shall in effect stand repealed. They were intrusted to expound the law, and to enforce it; and, under pretence of using that power, they violated the law, and dissolved the bonds of it; destroying the text with the comment.

This he gives them a particular and flagrant instance of:—God commanded children to honor their parents, not only by the law of Moses, but, antecedent to that, by the law of nature; and

(Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 15: 3—6.) Corban is a Hebrew word, very frequently used in the Old Testament, for different kinds of sacred oblations.—The words seem to mean generally, that any man's vow, or devote his substance, or what could be spared, to the Corban, was supposed not only to excuse him from relieving his parents, but to subje-profited by me; he shall be free.

12 And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother;

13 Making^a the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye.

14 ¶ And when he had called all the people unto him, he said unto them, Hearken unto me every one of you, and understand:

15 There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man.

16 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

17 And when he was entered into the house from the people, his disciples asked him concerning the parable.

18 And he saith unto them, Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him:

19 Because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats?

20 And he said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man.

whoso reileth, or speaketh evil of, father or mother, let him die the death, v. 4. Hence it is easy to infer, that it is the duty of children, if their parents be poor, to relieve them, according to their ability; and if those children are worthy to die, that curse their parents, much more those that starve them. But if a man will but conform himself, in all points, to the tradition of the elders, they will discharge him from this obligation, v. 11. If his parents be in want, and he has wherewithal to help them, but has no mind to do it, let him swear by the Corban, that is, by the gold of the temple, and the gift upon the altar, that his parents shall not be profited by him, that he will not relieve them; and, if they ask any thing of him, let him tell them this, and it is enough; as if by the obligation of this wicked vow he had discharged himself from the obligation of God's law; thus Dr. Hammond understands it: and it is said to be an ancient canon of the rabbins, that vows take place in things commanded by the law, as well as in things indifferent; so that, if a man makes a vow which cannot be ratified without breaking a commandment, the vow must be ratified, and the commandment violated; so Dr. Whitby. So the Papists discharge children from all obligation to parents by their monastic vows, and their entrance into religion, as they call it. He concludes, And many such like things do ye. Where will men stop, when once they have made the word of God give way to their tradition? These eager impostors at first only made light of God's commandments, in comparison with their traditions, but afterward made void God's commandments, if they stood in competition with them. All this, in effect, Isaiah prophesied of them; what he said of the hypocrites of his own day, was applicable to the scribes and Pharisees, v. 6. Note, When we complain of the wickedness of the times, yet we do not inquire wisely of that matter, if we say, that all the former days were better than these, Eccl. 7: 10. Hypocrites and evil doers have had their predecessors.

Christ instructs the people concerning the principles upon which this ceremony was grounded. It was requisite that this part of his discourse should be public, for it related to daily practice, and was designed to rectify a great mistake which the people were led into by their elders; He therefore called the people unto Him, (v. 14.) and bid them hear and understand. Note, It is not enough for the people to hear, him to a dreadful curse, if he did: to avoid which, he would rather break the commandment of God. This makes the contrast very striking.

(12.) Corban.] 'That is, be it devoted. By this expression, the son did not give or mean to give any thing to God, but only to preclude himself from ever doing any thing for his parents. If he should repent and go to assist his parents, then his property, by force of the vow, fell into the hands of priests and Pharisees who kept the sacred treasury, and who encouraged, for self purposes, these impious maxims. By the word corban addressed to his parents, the son said, "May I incur all the infamy of sacrilege and perjury, if ever ye get a farthing from me." This vow, though made in anger, was forever binding, according to the tradition of the Pharisees.'

Entereth.] 'Though it is very true, that a man may bring guilt upon himself by eating what is pernicious to his health, or by excess in the quantity of food and liquor: and a Jew might have done it, by presumptuously eating what was forbidden by the Mosaic law, which still continued in force; yet in all these instances, the pollution would arise from the wickedness of the heart, and be just proportionable to it, which is all our Lord asserts.'

Verse 19.

Purging all meats.] 'The meaning is, that the economy or process by which life is supported, purifies or renders nutritious all kinds of food. The unwholesome parts are separated, and the wholesome only are taken into the system. This agrees with all that has since been discovered of the process of digestion, and of the support of life. The food taken into the stomach is converted by the gastric juice, as is but they must understand. When Christ would run down the tradition of the Pharisees about washing before meat, He strikes at the opinion which was the root of it. Note, Corrupt customs are best cured by rectifying corrupt notions.

See now what the pollution is, which we are in danger of being damaged by, v. 15. (1.) Not by meat, though eaten with unwashen hands; that is but from without, and goes through a man. But, (2.) It is by the breaking out of the corruption that is in our hearts; the mind and conscience are defiled, guilt contracted, and we become odious in the sight of God, by that which comes out of us; our wicked thoughts and affections, words and actions, these defile us, and these only. Our care must therefore be, to wash our hearts from wickedness.

Our Lord gives his disciples, in private, an explication of the instructions He gave the people. They asked Him by himself, concerning the parable; (v. 17.) for to them, it seems, it was a parable. In answer to their inquiry, (1.) He reproves their dulness; 'Are ye so without understanding also? As the people that cannot understand, as the Pharisees that will not?' He doth not expect they should understand every thing; 'But are you so weak as not to understand this?' (2.) He explains this truth to them, that they might perceive it, and then they would believe it, for it carried its own evidence along with it. Some truths prove themselves, if they be but rightly explained and apprehended. If we understand the spiritual nature of God and of his law, and what it is that is offensive to Him, we shall soon perceive, [1.] That that which we eat and drink cannot defile us, so as to call for any religious washing; what there may be in it that is defiling, is gone; God shall destroy both it and them. But, [2.] It is that which comes out from the corrupt heart, that defiles us. As by the ceremonial law, whatsoever (almost) comes out of a man defiles him, (Lev. 15: 2. Deut. 23: 13.) so what comes out from the mind of a man, is that which defiles him before God, and calls for a religious washing; v. 21. From within, out of the heart of men, which they boast the goodness of, and think is the best part of them, thence comes all the mischief. As a corrupt fountain sends forth corrupt streams, so doth a corrupt heart send forth corrupt reasonings, appetites and passions, and all those wicked words and actions which are produced by them.

generally thought, into a thick pulp, called chyme. The nutritious part of this is conveyed into small vessels, and changed into a milky substance, called chyle. This is changed into blood, and the blood conveys nutriment and support to all parts of the system. The useless parts of the food are thrown off.

Our Savior, who 'knew what was in man,' by this illustration appeals to the consciences of the Pharisees, and exposes their internal uncleanness and abominable hypocrisy.

Verse 21.

Compare the parallel passage in Matthew. 'For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed all corrupt and evil reasonings, adulteries, fornications, and all sorts of uncleanness; acts of violence and murder, thefts, insatiable desires, and malevolent affections of inhumanity and cruelty to mankind: the injuries arising from false witness and deceit: the abominations of lasciviousness and intemperance; an envious, grudging eye, the outrages of blasphemy and pride; in a word, all kinds of folly, wild imaginations, ungoverned passions, and moral extravagancies,' says Doddridge. Truly, God made man upright, but he hath sought out many inventions. What a scourge to our world have been the ill-regulated propensities and self-seeking affections of our nature! Will knowledge and intellectual vigor of themselves restrain this selfishness inherent in man? How oft have they but given sad power to the selfish passions, spreading wide a moral desolation, in the midst of which they triumph, like the Roman conqueror amid the ruin he had caused! What but the love of God shed abroad in the soul, subduing, regulating, and balancing the intellect, the affections and propensities, can effect that moral revolution, in which every false tendency shall be a neighbor, and each shall love his neighbor as himself. 1

22 Thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness:

23 All these evil things come from within, and defile the man.

27 But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs.

Divers particulars are specified, as in Matthew; we had one there, which is not here, and that is, false witness bearing; but seven are mentioned here, to be added to those we had there. First, Covetousness; immoderate desires of wealth, and the gratifications of sense, still crying, Give, give. Hence we read of a heart exercised with covetous practices, 2 Pet. 2: 14. Secondly, Wickedness; malice, hatred, and ill-will, a desire to do mischief, and a delight in mischief done. Thirdly, Deceit; which is wickedness covered and disguised, that it may be the more securely and effectually committed. Fourthly, Lasciviousness; that filthiness and foolish talking which the apostle condemns; the eye full of adultery, and all wanton dalliances. Fifthly, The evil eye; the envious and the covetous eye, grudging others the good we give them, or do for them, (Prov. 23: 6.) or grieving at the good they do or enjoy. Sixthly, Pride; exalting ourselves in our own conceit above others, and looking down with scorn and contempt upon others. Seventhly, Foolishness; imprudence, inconsideration; or vain-glorious boasting, which St. Paul calls foolishness, (2 Cor. 11: 1, 19.) because it is here joined with pride; but rather that rashness in speaking and acting, which is the cause of so much evil. Ill-thinking is put first, as that which is the spring of all our commissions, and unthinking put last, as that which is the spring of all our omissions. Of all these he concludes, (v. 23.) 1. That they come from within, from the corrupt nature, the evil treasure in the heart; justly it is said, that the inward part is very wickedness, when all this comes from within. 2. They defile the man; render him unfit for communion with God, bring a stain upon the conscience; and, if not mortified and rooted out, will shut men out of the new Jerusalem, into which no unclean thing shall enter.

V. 24—30. I. Christ was pleased humbly to conceal Himself. Never man was so cried up as He was in Galilee, and therefore, to teach us, though not to decline any opportunity of doing good, yet not to be fond of popular applause, He arose from thence, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, where He was little known; and there He entered, not into a place u John 4:50—52.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. Those 'clean hands and that pure heart,' which Christ requires, are different from the external decency, and superstitious forms of sanctity, which have distinguished Pharisees in every age. (Notes, Matt. 5:8. 2 Cor. 7:1. Jam. 4:7—10.) Their outward purifications can neither purge the conscience from guilt, nor the affections from sensuality, or hypocrisy; and if our hearts be purified by faith, we need no human inventions, but 'all things will be made clean unto us.' Yet formalists commonly find fault with true disciples, for not complying with their superstitions; and plead his authority for them, in order to bear down his cause and persecute his people!—Men may be very zealous for plausible and burdensome observances, and exact in attending to them; yet remain strangers to religion, enemies of Christ, and hypocritical worshippers. This must be the case of those zealots, of every denomination, who 'reject the commandments of God,' and the doctrines of the gospel, 'that they may keep their own traditions;' and all engagements must be impious, which allow children to dishonor their parents; or which authorize men to violate the obligations of justice, and truth. A spiritual understanding of the law of God, and of the evil of sin; an acquaintance with the human heart, and the defilement, which thence flows into the conduct; and a discernment of the scriptural way of cleansing a guilty conscience, will effectually wean a man from human inventions.—The enlightened Christian will seek the Holy Spirit, to enable him to repress the evil affections of his heart; as he is aware that the very 'thought of wickedness is sin'; he will endeavor to purge out the sensual desires of his heart. He will seek deliverance from all enmity and hard thoughts of God; from ingratitude, selfishness, and inordinate love even of lawful things. He will pray to be cleansed from every inclination, inconsistent with piety; and will know, that if purified from inward evil, he is certainly made partaker of that 'holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord'; and his grand object will then be, to increase more and more in grace.

Verses 24—30.

(Murg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 15: 21—23.) This woman, of Canaan's devoted race, seems to have had no other instruction, than that derived from reading the Old Testament. Yet, having heard concerning Jesus, 3: v. Matt. 4: 24.) and doubtless having compared what she heard with the prophecies of the Messiah, she knew that He was the Messiah, and without hesitation addressed Him in that character!—She was not a true, but a most eminent believer.—What an inducement to display the Bible!

(26.) A Greek! 'This woman is called, Matt. 15: 21. Canaanitish; here a Syrophenician and a Greek. By birth, she was of Syrophenicia; so the country about Tyre and Sidon was denominated; by descent, of Canaan, as most of the Tyrians and Sidonians originally were; and by religion, a Greek.'

CAMPBELL.

'All heathens or idolaters were called Greeks by the Jews; Parthians, Medes, Arabs, Indians, Ethiopians by the same denominations; the Jews and Greeks divided the world.' ROBERTSON.
(27.) Children's bread.] This our Savior said to test the woman's faith. The Jews were the children of the kingdom;—this woman was of the Gentiles, whom the Jews denominated heathen and dogs. See the parallel passage in Matthew.

31 ¶ And again, departing ^a from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the casts of ^b Decapolis.

34 And ^g looking up to heaven, ^h he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, ⁱ Be opened.

35 And ^j straight-ways his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain.

their souls; and particularly, that He would cast forth the unclean spirit, that they may be temples of the Holy Ghost.

2. He said unto her, 'Let the children first be filled': let the Jews have all the miracles wrought for them, that they have occasion for, who are in a particular manner God's chosen people; and let not that which was intended for them, be thrown to those who are not of God's family, and have not that knowledge of Him, and interest in Him, and are vile and profane, and, as dogs, spiteful towards them. Note, Where Christ knows the faith of supplicants to be strong, He sometimes delights to try it. But his saying, Let the children first be filled, intimates that there was mercy in reserve for the Gentiles; for the Jews began already to be surfeited with the gospel of Christ, and some of them had desired Him to depart out of their coasts. The children began to play with their meat, and their loathings would be a feast for the Gentiles. The apostles went by this rule, Let the children first be filled, and if their full souls loathe this honey-comb, Lo, we turn to the Gentiles!

3. She said, 'Yes, Lord, I own it is true that the children's bread ought not to be cast to the dogs'; but they were never denied the crumbs, nay, these belong to them, and they are allowed a place under the table, that they may receive them. I ask not for a loaf, only for a crumb. This she speaks, not as undervaluing the mercy, or making light of it, but magnifying the abundance of miraculous cures with which she heard the Jews were feasted, in comparison with which a single cure was but as a crumb. Gentiles do not come in crowds, as the Jews do; I come alone. Perhaps she heard of Christ's feeding five thousand at once, after which, even when they had gathered up the fragments, there could not but be some crumbs left for the dogs.

4. Christ, thereupon, granted her request. For this saying, Go thy way, thou shalt have what thou camest for, the devil is gone out of thy daughter, v. 29. This encourages us to pray and not faint; to continue instant in prayer; the vision, at the end, shall speak, and not lie. Christ's saying that it was done, did it effectually, as at other times, his saying, Let it be done; for, (v. 30.) she came to her house, depending upon the word of Christ, that her daughter was healed, and so she found it. Note, Christ can conquer Satan at a distance; and it was not only when the demons saw Him, that they yielded to his power, (as ch. 3: 11.) but when they saw Him not, for the Spirit of the Lord is not bound, or bounded. She found her daughter not in any agitation, but quietly laid on the bed, waiting for her mother's return, to rejoice with her, that she was well.

V. 31—37. Our Lord Jesus seldom staid long in a place, for He knew where his work lay, and attended the changes of it. When He had cured the woman of Canaan's daughter, He had done what He had to do in that place, and therefore presently left those parts, and returned to the sea of Galilee, where his usual residence was; yet He did not come directly thither, but through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis, mostly on the other side Jordan; such long journeys did our Lord Jesus take, when He went about doing good.

Here we have a cure that Christ wrought, which is not recorded by any other evangelist.

1. There were those that brought to Him one that was deaf; some think, born deaf, and then dumb of course; others think, that by some disaster he was become deaf; and he had an impediment in his speech. Some think that he was quite dumb; others, that he could not speak but with difficulty, and so scarcely to be understood. He was tongue-tied, so that he was unfit for conversation; he had not the satisfaction either of hearing other people talk, or of telling his own mind. Let us take occasion from this to give thanks to God for preserving to us the sense of hearing, especially that we may be capable of hearing the word of God, and the faculty of speech, especially that we may be capable of speaking God's praise; and let us look with compassion upon those that are deaf or dumb, and treat them with tenderness. They that brought this poor man to Christ, besought Him that He would put his hand upon him, as the prophets did upon those whom they blessed in the name of the Lord. It is not said, They besought Him to cure him, but to put his hand upon him, to take cognizance of his case, and put forth his power to do to him as He pleased.

II. His cure was solemn, and some of the circumstances of it were singular.

1. Christ took him aside from the multitude, v. 33. Ordinarily, he wrought his miracles publicly before all the people, to show that they would bear the strictest scrutiny; but this He did privately, to show that He did not seek his own glory, and to teach us to avoid ostentation. Let us learn of Christ to be humble, and to do good where no eye sees, but his that is all eye.

2. He used more significant actions, in the doing of this cure, than usual. (1.) He put his fingers into his ears, as if He would fetch out that which stopped them. (2.) He spit upon his own finger, and then touched his tongue, as if He would loosen that with which his tongue was tied; these were no causes that could in the least contribute to his cure, but only signs of that power which Christ had in Himself to cure him, for the encouraging of his faith and their's that brought him. The application was all from Himself, it was his own fingers that He put upon his ears, and his own spit that He put upon his tongue; for He alone heals.

3. He looked up to heaven, to give his Father the praise of what He did; for He sought his praise, and as Mediator, acted in dependence on Him, and with an eye to Him. Thus He signified that it was by a power He had as the Lord from heaven, that He did this; for the hearing ear and the seeing eye the Lord has

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—37. While Pharisees are left with decided disapprobation, the Savior manifests his compassion to sinners of the Gentiles; and all, who allow themselves to be unworthy of the crumbs that fall from his table, may confidently call upon Him for the food of his children. Still He goes about to every place, to seek and save the lost: and neither the obscurity of his ministers, nor the opposition of enemies, can prevent the discovery of his glory and grace. In like manner, it is our business to persevere in doing good, privately and in an unobtrusive manner, and 'our labor of love' will not always be hid or misrepresented.—When sinners apply to Christ, in behalf of themselves and others, they may have their faith and humility tried by delays, and be ready to conclude that the blessings are reserved for others; but patient waiting on Christ, by faith and prayer, will certainly prevail; nor shall any have cause to say, they have sought his face in vain. One after another obtains the blessing, and declares the Savior's love to others; and they too seek Him, in their distress. And though we find a great variety in the cases, the reception, and the manner of relief, of those who came to Him, when here; yet, in one way or other, they all obtained help. Thus it still is, in the concerns of our souls: the Savior still opens the ear, and looses the tongue; and when He speaks with divine authority, He opens the understanding and the heart to receive instruction, and the lips to show forth his praise. (Notes, Is. 35: 5—7. John 9: 4—7.) While we admire the grace and power of his works, let us proclaim that 'He hath done all things well; He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.' SCOTT

Verses 32—35.

Commentators seem much perplexed with this miracle. Why did our Savior withdraw the man from the crowd? and why did He use these singular means of cure when He need only to have said, 'I will, be thou restored'? To these questions was thought by Clarke, Doddridge and others unanswerable, it may be replied: our Savior withdrew the man from the multitude, for the same reason that He often charged those whom He healed not to make Him known, viz. to avoid ostentation and all unnecessary excitement. He used the signs, not as necessary to the cure, for the virtue was in Himself—not to impose upon the multitude, as sceptics insinuate, for the multitude were not present, but simply for the benefit of him who was healed. This man was, probably, deaf and dumb. And our Savior by these signs would give the man a true notion of his disorder, and of the power which must restore him. By putting his fingers into his ears, He signified that here was the source of deafness; by touching his tongue with spit, He signified, that here was the source of dumbness; by looking to heaven and sighing, He signified that Almighty Power only could open the ear and loosen the string of his tongue; and by all this, this restored man was impressively taught to glorify God. CHAP. VIII

Jesus miraculously feeds the multitude, 1-9; rebukes the Pharisees a sign, 10-13; warns the disciples against their Asten, and that of Herod; and repairs them for dullness of understanding, 14-21; gives sight to a blind man at Bethsaida, 22-26; approves Peter's confession, predicts his own sufferings, and rebukes Peter for objecting to them, 27-33; and teaches self-denial and a willingness to suffer for his sake, 34-39.

In those days, ^athe multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jesus called his disciples unto him, and saith unto them,

2 I have ^bcompassion on the multitude, because they have now been with me three days, ^cand have nothing to eat:

3 And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, ^dthey will faint by the way; for divers of them came from far.

4 And his disciples answered him, ^eFrom whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?

5 And he asked them, ^fHow many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven.

6 And he commanded the people ^gto sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves, ^hand gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people.

7 And they had a few small ⁱfishes: and he blessed, and commanded to set them also before them.

made. He also hereby directed his patient, who could see, though he could not hear, to look up to heaven for relief. Moses with his stammering tongue is directed to look that way; (Exod. 4:11.) Who hath made man's mouth? Or who maketh the dumb or deaf, or the seeing or blind? Have not I the Lord?

4. He sighed; not as if He found any difficulty in working this miracle, or obtaining power to do it from his Father; but thus He expressed his pity of the miseries of human life, and his sympathy with the afflicted, as One that was Himself touched with the feeling of their infirmities. And as to this man, He sighed, not because He was loth to do him this kindness; but because of the many temptations which he would be exposed to, and the sins he would be in danger of, after the restoring of his speech. He had better be tongue-tied still, unless he have grace to keep his tongue as with a bridle, Ps. 39:1.

5. He said, Be opened. This was nothing that looked like spell or charm, such as they used who had familiar spirits, who peeped and muttered, Isa. 8:19. Christ speaks as One having authority, and power went with the word. Be opened, served both parts of the cure; Let the ears be opened, let the lips be opened, and the effect was, Straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue loosed; and happy he who, as soon as he had his hearing and speech, had the blessed Jesus so near him, to converse with.

Now this cure was, (1.) A proof of Christ's being the Messiah; for it was foretold that by his power the ears of the deaf should be unstopped, and the tongue of the dumb be made to sing, Isa. 35:5, 6. (2.) It was a specimen of the operations of his Gospel upon the minds of men. The great command of the Gospel, and grace of Christ to poor sinners is, Be opened. Grotius applies it thus, that the internal impediments of the mind are removed by the Spirit of Christ, as those bodily impediments were by the word of his power. He opens the heart, as he did Lydia's, and thereby opens the ear to receive the word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praise.

6. He ordered it to be kept private, but it was made public. (1.) It was his humility, that He charged them they should tell no man, v. 36. Most men will proclaim their own goodness, or, at least, desire that others should proclaim it; but Christ, though in no danger of being puffed up, knowing that we are, would set us an example of self-denial, especially in praise and applause. We should take pleasure in doing good, but not in its being known. (2.) It was their zeal, that, though He charged them to say nothing of it, yet they published it, before Christ would have published. But they meant honestly, and therefore it is to be reckoned rather an act of indiscretion than an act of disobedience, v. 37. But they that told it, and they that heard it, were beyond measure astonished: they were exceedingly affected with it, and this was the common verdict, He has done all things well; (v. 37.) whereas there were those that hated and persecuted Him as an evil-doer, they are ready to witness for Him, not only that He has done no evil, but that He has done a great deal of good, and has done it well, modestly and humbly, and without money, and without price, which added to the lustre of his works. He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak; and that is well for them; it is well for their relations, to whom they had been a burden; and therefore they are inexcusable who speak ill of Him.

CHAP. VIII. v. 1-9. Observe,
1. Our Lord Jesus was greatly followed;
The multitude was very great; (v. 1.) notwithstanding standing the arts of scribes and Pharisees to blast his interest, the common people, who had more honesty, and therefore more true wisdom, kept up their high thoughts of Him. We may suppose that this multitude were generally of the meaner sort of people; with such, Christ was familiar; for He humbled himself, as made himself of no reputation, and thus encouraged the meanest to come to Him.

2. Those that followed Him underwent great difficulty. They were with Him three days and had nothing to eat. Never let the Pharisee say, that Christ's disciples fast not. There were those, probably, that brought some food with them; but by this time it was spent, and they were a great way from home; yet they continued with Christ, and did not speak of leaving Him till He spake of dismissing them. Note, True zeal makes nothing of hardships in the way of duty. They that have a full feast for their souls, may be content with slender provisions for their bodies. It was an old saying among the Puritans, Brown bread and the gospel are good fare.

3. As Christ has a compassion for all that are in want, He has a special concern for those that are reduced by their zeal and diligence in attending on Him. Christ said, I have compassion on the multitude. Whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain, the humble Jesus looked upon with tenderness; and thus must we honor all men. But that which He chiefly considers, is, They have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat. Whatever losses we sustain, or hardships we go through, for Christ's sake, and in love to Him, He will take care that they shall be made up to us. They that seek the Lord shall not long want any good thing. Ps. 34:10. Observe with what sympathy Christ saith, (v. 3.) If I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way, for hunger. Christ knows and considers our frame; and He is for the body; if with it we glorify Him, verily we shall be fed. He considered that many of them came from far, and had a great way home. When we see multitudes attending upon the word preached, it is comfortable to think that Christ knows whence they all come, though we do not. I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, Rev. 2:13. Christ would by no means have them go home fasting, for it is not his manner to send those empty away, that in a right manner attend on him.

4. The doubts of Christians sometimes magnify the power of Christ. The disciples could not imagine whence so many men should be satisfied with bread in the wilderness, v. 4. That therefore must needs be wonderful, which the disciples looked upon as impossible.

5. Christ's time to act for the relief of his people, is, when things are brought to the last extremity; when they were ready to faint, Christ provided for them. That He might not invite them to follow him for the loaves, He did not supply them but when they were utterly reduced, and then He sent them away.

6. The bounty of Christ is inexhaustible, and to evidence that, Christ repeated this miracle to show that He is still the same for the succor and supply of his people. His favors are renewed, as our wants and necessities are. In the former miracle, Christ used all the bread which was five loaves, and fed all the guests which were five thousand, and so He did now; though He might have said, If five loaves would feed five thousand, four may feed four thousand; he took all the seven loaves, and fed with them the four thousand; for He would teach us to take things as they are, and accommodate ourselves to them; to use what we have, and make the best of that which is. Here as in the dispensing of the manna, He that ga-

'Had there not been such danger, Christ had not wrought this miracle, that the people might not follow Him for loaves; and having done this, He straightway leaves them, v. 9, that He might avoid their attempts to make Him a king.' Theophylact, quoted by Whitby.

(4.) Bread: 'This among the Hebrews, frequently signifies all and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets.

9 And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and he sent them away.

10 ¶ And straightway he entered into a ship with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha.

11 And the Pharisees came forth and began to question with him, seeking of him a sign from heaven, tempting him.

12 And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign? Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation.

13 And he left them, and entering into the ship again departed to the other side.

14 ¶ Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf.

15 And he charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the heaven of the Pharisees, and of the heaven of Herod.

16 And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread.

17 And when Jesus knew it, he saith unto them, Why reason ye because ye have no bread? perceive ye not yet, neither understand? have ye your heart yet hardened?

18 Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember?

19 When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up?

thered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.

7. In our Father's house, in our Master's house, there is bread enough, and to spare; there is a fulness in Christ, which He communicates to all that passes through his hands; so that from it we receive, and grace for grace, John 1:16. Those need not fear wanting, that have Christ to live upon.

8. It is good for those that follow Christ, to keep together; these followers of Christ continued in a body, four thousand of them together, and Christ fed them all. Christ's sheep must abide by the flock, and go forth by their footsteps, and verily they shall be fed.

V. 10-21. Christ now visits the parts of Dalmanutha, that no corner of the land of Israel might say that they had not had his presence with them. He came thither by ship; (v. 13.) but meeting with occasions of dispute there, and not with opportunities of doing good, He entered into the ship again, (v. 13.) and came back.

I. He refused to gratify the Pharisees, who challenged a sign from heaven. They came forth not to propose questions, that they might learn, but to cross-question, and ensnare Him.

1. They demanded of Him a sign from heaven, as if the signs He gave them on earth, which were more familiar to them, and more capable of being examined, were not sufficient. There was a sign from heaven at his baptism, (Matt. 3:16, 17.) it was public enough; and, if they had attended John's baptism as they ought to have done, they might themselves have seen it. Afterward, when he was nailed to the cross, they prescribed a new sign; Let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe Him; thus obstinate infidelity will still have something to say, though ever so unreasonable. They demanded this sign, tempting Him; not that they might be satisfied, but in hopes that He would not, that they might imagine themselves to have a pretence for their infidelity.

2. He denied them their demand; He sighed deeply in his spirit, (v. 12.) being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, and the little influence that his preaching and miracles had had upon them. Note, The infidelity of those that long enjoy the means of conviction, is a grief to Jesus; it troubles Him, that sinners should stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. (1.) He expostulates with them upon this demand; Why doth this generation seek after a sign; this generation, that is so unworthy to have the Gospel brought to it, and to have any sign accompanying it; that so greedily swallows the tradition of the elders, without the confirmation of any sign at all; this generation, into which, by the calculating of the times prefixed in the Old Testament, they might easily perceive that the coming of the Messiah must fall; that has had such merciful signs given them in the cure of their sick? What an absurdity is it for them to desire a sign! (2.) He refuses to answer their demand; Verily I say unto you, There shall no such sign be given to this generation. When God spake to particular persons, out of his common dispensation, they were encouraged to ask a sign, as Gideon and Ahaz; but when He speaks in general to all, as in the law and gospel, sending each with their own evidence, it is presumption to prescribe other signs. Shall any teach God knowledge? He denied them, and then left them to their strong delusions.

II. He warned his disciples against the heaven of the Pharisees and of Herod.

1. The caution was, Take heed, beware, lest ye embrace the tradition of the elders, which they are so wedded to, lest ye be proud, hypocritical, and ceremonious, like them. Mat thew adds, and of the Sadducees; Mark adds, and of Herod; whence some gather, that Herod and his courtiers were generally Sadducees, that is, deists. The Pharisees demanded a sign from heaven; and Herod was long desirous to see some miracle wrought by Christ, (Luke 23:8.) such as he should prescribe, so that the heaven of both was the same; they were unsatisfied with the signs they had, and would have others of their own devising; 'Take heed of this heaven,' (saith Christ,) 'be convinced by the miracles ye have seen, and covet not to see more.'

2. They misunderstood this caution. At their putting to sea, they had forgotten to take bread, and had not in their ship more than one loaf, v. 14. When therefore Christ bid them beware of the heaven of the Pharisees, they understood it as an intimation not to apply to any of the Pharisees for relief, when they came to the other side, for they had lately been offended at them for eating with unwashed hands. They reasoned among themselves, what should be the meaning of this caution, and concluded, 'It is because we have no bread; He saith this, to reproach us for being so careless as to go to sea, and among strangers, with but one loaf; He doth, in effect, tell us, we must be brought to short allowance, and eat our bread by weight.' They reasoned it, they disputed about it; one said, 'It was owing to you;' and the other said, 'It was owing to you,' that we are so ill provided for this voyage.' Thus distrust of God makes Christ's disciples quarrel among themselves.

3. This argued a disbelief of Christ's power to supply them, notwithstanding their abundant experience. The reproof is given with warmth, for He knew they needed to be thus soundly chidden; 'Perceive ye not yet, neither understand, that which you have had so many demonstrations of? Have ye your hearts yet hardened, so that nothing will make any impression upon them, or bring them to compliance with your Master's designs? Having eyes, see ye not that which is plain before your eyes? Having ears, hear ye not that which you have been so often told? How strangely stupid and senseless! Do ye not remember that but the other day, I brake five loaves among five thousand, and soon after, seven loaves among four thousand? Do ye not remember how many baskets full ye took up of fragments?' They did remember, and they took up twelve baskets full one time, and seven another; 'Why then,' saith He, 'do ye not understand?' As if He that multiplied five loaves, and seven, could not multiply one.' They seemed to suspect that one was not matter enough to work upon; and if that was their thought, it was very senseless, as if it were not all alike to the Lord, to save by many or few, and as easy to make one loaf to feed five thousand as five. It was therefore proper to remind them, not only of the sufficiency, but of the overplus, of the former meals; and justly were they chidden for not understanding what Christ therein designed, and what they from thence might have learned. Note, (1.) The experiences we have had of God's goodness to us in the way of duty, greatly aggravate our distrust of Him, which is therefore provoking to Jesus. (2.) Our not understanding the true intent and meaning of God's favors to us, is equivalent to our not remembering them. (3.) We are therefore overwhelmed with care and distrust, because we do not understand and remember what we have known and seen of the power and goodness of our Lord. It would be a great support to us, to consider the days of old, and we are wanting both to God and ourselves if we do not. (4.) When we thus forget the works of God, we should chide ourselves for it, as Christ doth his disciples here; 'Am I thus without understanding? How is it that my heart is thus hardened?'

V. 22-26. This cure is related only by this evangelist, and there is something singular in the circumstances.

I. Here is a blind man brought to Christ by his friends, with a desire that He would touch him, v. 22. Here appears the faith of those that brought him—they doubted not but that one touch of Christ would recover his sight; but the man himself showed not that earnestness for, or expectation of, a cure that other blind men did. If those that are spiritually blind, do not pray for themselves, yet let their friends and relations pray for them, that Christ would be pleased to touch them.

II. Christ did not bid his friends lead him, but (which bespeaks his condescension) Himself took him by the hand, and led him, to teach us to be as Job was, eyes to the blind, Job 29: 15. Never had blind man such a Leader. He led him out of the town. Had he herein only designed privacy. He might have led him into a house; but He intended hereby to upbraid Bethsaida with the mighty works that had in rain been done in her, (Matt. 11: 21.) and was telling her in effect, she was unworthy to have any more done within her walls. Perhaps Christ took the blind man out of the town, that he might have a larger prospect in the open fields, to try his sight with, than he could have in the close streets.

III. Here is the cure of the blind man, by Him who came into the world to preach the recovering of sight to the blind, (Luke 4: 18.) and to give what he preached. In this cure we may observe, 1. That Christ used a sign; He spat on his eyes, (into them, so some,) and put his hand upon him. He could have cured him, as He did others, with a word, but thus He was pleased to assist his faith which was very weak, and to help him against unbelief. And this spittle signified the eye-salve, wherewith Christ anoints the eyes of those that are spiritually blind, Rev. 3: 18. 2. The cure was wrought gradually, which was not usual in Christ's miracles. He asked him if he saw ought, v. 23. Let him tell what condition his sight was in, for the satisfaction of those about him. And he looked up; so far he recovered his sight, that he could open his eyes, and he said, I see men as trees walking; he could not distinguish men from trees, otherwise than that he could discern them to move. He had some glimmerings of sight, and betwixt him and the sky could perceive a man erect like a tree, but could not discern the form thereof, Job 4: 16. But, 3. It was soon completed; Christ never leaves his work till He can say, It is finished. He put his hands again upon his eyes, to disperse the remaining darkness, and then bade him look up again, and he saw every man clearly, v. 25. Christ took this way, (1.) Because He would not tie himself to a method, but would show with what liberty He acted in all He did. He did not cure by rote, but varied as He thought fit. Providence gains the same end in different ways, that men may attend its motions with implicit faith. (2.) Because it should be to the patient according to his faith; and perhaps this man's faith was at first very weak, but afterward gathered strength; and his cure was accordingly. Not that Christ always went by this rule, but thus He would sometimes put a rebuke upon those who came to Him, deriding. (3.) Thus Christ would show how, and in what method, those are healed by his grace, who by nature are spiritually blind; at first, their knowledge is confused, they see men as trees walking; but, like the light of the morning, it shines more and more to the perfect day, and then they see all things clearly, Prov. 4: 18. Let us inquire, then, if we see ought of those things which faith is the substance and evidence of; and if through grace we see any thing of them, we may hope that we shall see yet more and more, for Jesus Christ will perfect forever those that are sanctified.

IV. The directions Christ gave the man He had cured, not to tell it to any in the town of Bethsaida, nor so much as to go into the town, where, probably, there were some expecting him to come back, who had seen Christ lead him out of the town, but, having been eye-witnesses of so many miracles, had not so much as the curiosity to follow him: let not those be gratified with the sight of him when he was cured, who would not show so much respect to Christ, as to go out of the town to see this cure wrought. Christ doth not forbid him to tell it to others, but he must not tell it to any in the town. Slighting Christ's favors is forfeiting them; and Christ will make those know the worth of their privileges, by the want of them, that would not know them otherwise. Bethsaida, in the day of her visitation, would not know the things that belonged to her peace, and now

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-21. Our Lord sometimes requires his followers to endure hardship in attending Him; but He relieves them before they faint; and we should copy his example, in noticing the wants of those around us, that we may remove them. But his love as much excels ours, as his all-sufficiency exceeds our aid and grace. He will feed his disciples with suitable provision, but they have no reason to expect luxuries; these are generally lavished on the servants of another master.—Yet many professed Christians excuse themselves, on account of poverty, from relieving the distressed, who would think it a hardship to dine with Jesus and his company, on those provisions which He miraculously supplied! The Christian, however, while his soul is feasted with 'hidden manna,' will eat his mean morsel with better relish than unthankful worldly men their royal dainties. (Matt. Rev. 2: 17.) What cause have we to sigh because of those around us, who destroy themselves and others, by their obstinate unbelief, and enmity to the gospel! We have great cause to be humbled and thankful on our own account; for the Lord has continual reason to reprove us also, for our remaining distrust. How is it, that we no more see the glory of his truths, the privileges of his kingdom, the security of his word, the spirituality of his precepts? How is it, that we so often mistake his meaning, disregard his warnings, and distrust his providence? These things arise from the remains of that same leaven, which wholly prevails in the hearts of unbelievers. Then watch against it: and beseech the Lord to remove 'all hardness of heart,' and blindness of understanding, that we may perceive, and remember his precepts, and be thankful for all his kindness.

V. 27-33. We have read a great deal of the doctrine Christ preached, and the miracles He wrought, which were many, and strange. It is now time for us to pause a little, and to consider what these things mean; the wondrous works which Christ then forbade the publishing of, being recorded in these sacred writings, are thereby published to all the world; now what shall we think of them? Is the record of these things designed only for amusement? These things are written, that we may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; (John 20: 31.) and this discourse which Christ had with his disciples, will assist us in making the necessary reflections upon the miracles of Christ, and a right use of them. Three things we are here taught to infer from the miracles Christ wrought.

I. They prove that He is the true Messiah, the Son of God, and Savior of the world: this his disciples, who were the eye-witnesses of those works, here profess their belief of; which cannot but be a satisfaction to us in making the same inference.

1. Christ inquired of them, Who do men say that I am? v. 27. Note, Though it is a small thing for us to be judged of man, yet it may sometimes do us good to know what people say of us, not that we may seek our own glory, but that we may hear of our faults. Christ asked them, not that He might be informed, but that they might observe it themselves, and inform one another.

2. The account they gave Him, was such as plainly intimated the high opinion the people had of Him. Though they came short of the truth, yet they were convinced by his miracles that He was an extraordinary Person, sent from the invisible world with a divine commission. It is probable that they would have acknowledged Him to be the Messiah, if they had not been possessed with a notion that the Messiah must be a temporal Prince, appearing in pomp; yet (whatever the Pharisees said, who were touched by the strictness and spirituality of his doctrine) none of the people said that He was a deceiver, but some said that He was John Baptist, others Elias, others one of the prophets. v. 28. All agreed that He was risen from the dead.

3. They intimated their own abundant satisfaction in Him, having left all to follow Him, which now, after trial, they see no reason to repent; But who say ye that I am? To this they answer, Thou art the Christ, promised, and long expected, v. 29. To be a Christian indeed, is, sincerely to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and to act accordingly. This they must shortly publish and maintain; for the present they must keep it secret, (v. 30.) till the proof was completed, and they were completely qualified to maintain it by the Holy Ghost; and then let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ, Acts 2: 36.

II. These miracles of Christ take off the stiffness of the cross, and assure us that the Christ was, in it, not conquered, but a Conqueror. Now that the disciples are convinced that Jesus is the Christ, they may bear to hear of his sufferings.

1. Christ taught his disciples that He must suffer many things. Though they had got over the error of the Messiah's being a temporal Prince, so far as to believe their Master to be the Messiah, notwithstanding his present meanness, still they retained it, so far as to expect that He would shortly appear in outward grandeur, and restore the kingdom of Israel. To rectify that mistake, Christ here tells them that He must be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, who, they expected, should be brought to own Him; that, instead of being crowned, He must be crucified, and after three days rise again to a heavenly life, and be no more in this world. This He spake openly; did not wrap it up in ambiguous expressions. The disciples might easily understand it, had they not been very much under the power of prejudice: or, it intimates that He spoke it cheerfully, and without any terror, and would have them hear it so: He spake that saying boldly, as one that not only knew He must suffer and die, but was resolved He would, and made it his own act and deed.

2. Peter opposed it; he took Him, and began to rebuke Him. Here Peter showed more love than discretion, a zeal for Christ not according to knowledge. He took hold of Him, as it were to stop and hinder Him, (so some understand it); he fell on his neck, as impatient to hear that his Master should suffer such things; or, he took Him aside privately, and began to rebuke Him. This was not the language of authority, but of the greatest affection; of that jealousy for the welfare of those we love, which is strong as death. Our Lord allowed his disciples to be free with Him, but Peter here took too great a liberty.

3. Christ checked him for his opposition; (v. 33.) He turned about, as one offended, and looked on his disciples, to see if the rest of them were of the same mind with Peter, that, if they were, they might take the reproof to themselves, which He was now about to give to Peter; and He said, Get thee behind me, Satan. Peter little thought of such a sharp rebuke, but perhaps expected as much commendation now for his love, as he had lately had for his faith. Note, Christ sees that amiss in what we say or do, which we ourselves are not aware of, and knows what manner of spirit we are of, when we ourselves do not. Peter spake as one that did not rightly understand, nor had duly considered, the purposes of God. When he saw every day such proofs of the power of Christ, he might conclude that He could not be compelled to suffer; the most potent enemies could not overpower Him whom diseases, deaths, winds, waves, and devils themselves were forced to obey; and when he saw so much of the wisdom of Christ, he might conclude that He would not choose to suffer but for some great and glorious purpose; and therefore he ought to have acquiesced. He looked upon his death only as a martyrdom, like that of the prophets, which he thought might be prevented, if either He would take care not to provoke the chief priests, or to keep out of the way; but he knew not that the thing was necessary for the glory of God, the destruction of Satan, and the salvation of man; that the Captain of our salvation must be made perfect through sufferings, and so bring many sons to glory. Note, The wisdom of man is folly, when it pretends to give measures to the divine counsels. The cross of Christ, the greatest instance of God's power and wisdom, was to some a stumbling-block, and to others foolishness. Peter spake as one that did not rightly understand the nature of Christ's kingdom; he took it to be temporal and human, whereas it is spiritual and divine. Thou savorest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men;—thou mindest not; so the word is rendered, Rom. 8: 5. Peter seemed to mind the things that relate to the lower world, and the life that now is, than those which relate to the upper world, and the life to come. Minding the things of men more than the things of God, our own credit and safety, more than the things of God, and his kingdom, is the root of much sin, and very common among Christ's disciples, and it will appear in times of temptation, when those, in whom the things of men have the ascendant, are in danger of falling off. It is important to consider what generation we appear wise in, Luke 16: 8. It seems policy to shun trouble, but if with that we shun duty, it is fleshly wisdom, (2 Cor. 1: 12,) and will be folly in the end.

Many praise "Christ, who yet rob Him of his true honor." Beza. Charged, &c. (30.) The premature and unreserved avowal of this truth, must, without perpetual miracles, have excited the ill-judging multitude to such measures, as would have given the scribes and priests an occasion against Jesus, and even have rendered the Romans jealous of his popularity. It was therefore highly proper, that He should, in the most pre-emptory manner, forbid the disciples to declare openly that He was the Messiah. Let the people gradually collect it, by comparing his miracles and doctrine with the Scriptures, as they became better acquainted with the true nature of the Messiah's kingdom and salvation.

III. These miracles of Christ should engage us all to follow Him, whatever it costs us, not only as they were confirmations of his mission, but explanations of his design; and the tendency of that grace which He came to bring; plainly intimating, that, by his Spirit, He would do for our diseased, possessed souls, which

He did for the bodies of those who applied to Him. Frequent notice had been taken of the great flocking to Him for help: this is written that we may believe that He is the great physician of souls, and may become his patients; and here He tells us upon what terms we may be admitted; He called all the people to Him, to hear this, who modestly stood at some distance when He was in private conversation with his disciples. This is that which all are concerned to know, and consider, if they expect Christ should heal their souls.

1. They must not be indulgent of the ease of the body; for, (p. 34.) 'Whosoever will come after me for spiritual, as these people for bodily, cures, let him deny himself, live a life of self denial, and contempt of the world; let him not pretend to be his own physician, but renounce his own righteousness and strength, take up his cross, conforming himself to the pattern of a crucified Jesus, and to the will of God in all the afflictions he lies under; and thus let him continue to follow me.' Those that will be Christ's patients must attend on Him, receive instruction and reproof from Him, as those that did followed Him, and must resolve they will never forsake Him.

2. They must not be solicitous for the life of the body, when they cannot keep it without quitting Christ, p. 35. Are we invited by the word of Christ to follow Him? Let us sit down, and count the cost, whether we can prefer our advantages by Christ before life itself, whether we can bear to think of losing our life for Christ's sake, and the Gospel's. When the devil is drawing away disciples after him, he conceals the worst, tells them only of the pleasure, but nothing of the peril, of his service; Ye shall not surely die; but what there is of trouble and danger in the service of Christ, He tells us of before; that we shall suffer, perhaps die, in the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—33. The Lord in general illuminates our minds gradually; and He works by means, which are often no more than signs of his efficacious operation. Thus He sometimes takes a sinner aside from the multitude, gradually removes the darkness from his understanding, and leads him to some indistinct views of spiritual things. This is his own work: He will perfect it, and we should wait his time. Let all who desire this blessing, seek Christ, 'the Light of the world,' in the use of means, and they shall not be disappointed. But while 'the blind see out of obscurity,' the proud, who reject his teaching, are given up to delusion; and even the means of instruction are in judgment withdrawn from them.—The Lord will interrogate his followers on their proficiency; and his real disciples are distinguished, by their honorable thoughts of Him, and large expectations from Him. He will approve of what we are enabled to do; but we continually need to be taught further, to ^aour minds stirred up, concerning his sufferings for us, and the ^adenial which He requires. Our minds are by nature adverse to these humiliating instructions: and even where some true knowledge and grace exist, there often are, much error, and remains of 'the carnal mind.'—As our Lord so sharply re-proved Peter for objecting to his sufferings, which the glory of God and the salvation of his people required; we should be reminded, that those who would set us against self-denial, for the honor of our Lord, and the good of others, 'savor the things that are of men, and not those that are of God.' All people should therefore be called to observe, that they, who would go after Christ to heaven, must deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow Him: and that they only are in the way of eternal happiness, who are willing to venture even their lives, rather than deny Christ, or be ashamed of Him. Did we duly consider the worth of our souls, for which no ransom could be found but the blood of Emmanuel, we should count the whole world contemptible, if the gain of it endangered our salvation; and the loss of life our gain, if laid down for the sake of Christ and the Gospel. Continually think of that season, when He will 'come in the glory of the Father, with his holy angels,' and estimate every earthly object, as we shall, on that important day! (P. O. Matt. 16: 13—25.) SCOTT.

Verases 32—37.

(35.) The Gospel's sake. This is not found in Matthew. He who loses his life for the sake of the true Gospel of Christ, loses it for Christ's sake; but if he dies by adhering to 'another gospel,' the case is far different. It is then of no ordinary importance to determine what is the Gospel of Christ, and what is 'another gospel.' (Note, Gal. 1: 6—10.) If, as some learned men think, the word translated 'soul' (36, 37), should be translated life, it must certainly be the office of the expositor, to show, that the life, or salvation, of the soul is meant; else how can he, who 'loses his life for Christ's sake,' 'save his life'? (Note, John 12: 23—26.)

(37.) What wilt a man give. "What will a man not give?" better expresses the original in English. CAMPBELL.

Verse 38.

That the fear of imprisonment or death should terrify others, as it did Peter, to deny Christ, could not be incredible: but that any should 'be ashamed of Him, whom all angels worship, and in whom the inhabitants of heaven glory, must appear inconceivable; except to those who have a deep knowledge of human nature, and the deceitfulness of the heart. Yet perhaps there is no sin, to which every convert to true Christianity is more powerfully tempted; and no temptation which induces such large numbers to act, habitually, against the conviction of conscience in order to escape the reproach of men, and often of their inferiors. This warning is therefore to all, in every rank and station, nay, even in the church. For a bold avowal of our dependence on Christ, our expectations from Him, and devotedness to Him, in the spirit of Scripture, will not fail to expose us to scorn, and to the imputation of folly or enthusiasm: and the fear lest the Savior and Judge should at last be ashamed of us, is the proper preservative from yielding to this temptation, to those who desire 'to have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at his coming.' (Marg. Ref.—1 John 2: 28.) SCOTT.

Shall be ashamed of me. 'Our Lord hints here at one of the principal reasons of the incredulity of the Jews—they saw nothing in the person of Jesus Christ which corresponded to their pompous notions of the Messiah. If Jesus Christ had come into the world as a mighty and opulent man, clothed with earthly glories and honors, he would have had a multitude of partisans, and most of them hypocrites.' DE A. CLARKE.

transfiguration. A Christ, 1-10. He shows ^{at} John the Baptist is "Elias who was to come," 11-13. He casts out a dumb and deaf spirit, having rebuked the company and the disciples, for their unbelief, 14-29. He foretells his own death and resurrection, 30-32; reproves the ambition of the disciples, 33-37; forbids them to hinder one who can cast out devils in his name, though he followed not with them, 38-41; shows the guilt of obeying weak believers, 42; and warns his learners to part with all occasions of sin, however small, showing the eternal doom of the wicked, especially of apostates, in most awful language, 43-50.

AND he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, "that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not ^{be} taste of death, till they have seen ^{the} kingdom of God come with power.

2 ¶ And ^{after} six days, Jesus taketh with him ^{his} Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into ^{an} high mountain apart by themselves: and he was ^{transfigured} before them.

3 And ^{his} raiment became shining, ^{exceeding} white as snow; so as ^{no} fuller on earth can white them.

4 And there ^{appeared} unto them ^{Elias} with ^{Moses}; and they were talking with Jesus.

5 And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, ^{it is} good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.

6 For ^{he} wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid.

7 And there was ^a cloud that overshadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, saying, ^{This is} my beloved Son; ^{hear} him.

8 And ^{suddenly}, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves.

cause; He represents the discouragements not less but greater, than commonly they prove, that it may appear He deals fairly, and is not afraid that we should know the worst; because the advantages of his service balance the discouragements, if we will set the one over against the other. In short,

(1.) We must not dread the loss of our lives, provide it be in the cause of Christ; v. 35. Whosoever will save his life, by declining Christ, or by disowning and denying Him after he has in profession come to Christ, he shall lose the comfort of his natural life, the root and fountain of his spiritual life, and all his hopes of eternal life. But whosoever shall lose his life, he truly willing to venture it, lay it down, when he cannot keep it without denying Christ, he shall be an unspeakable gainer; for the loss of his life shall be made up to him in a better life. It is looked upon to be some kind of recompense to those who lose their lives in the service of their prince and country, to have their memories honored, and their families provided for; but what is that to the recompense which Christ makes in eternal life to all that die for Him?

(2.) We must dread the loss of our souls, yea, though we should gain the whole world by it; v. 36, 37. For what shall it profit a man if he should gain all wealth, honor, and pleasure, by denying Christ, and lose his own soul? True it is, said Bishop Hooper, the night before he suffered martyrdom, 'life is sweet, and death is bitter, but eternal death is more bitter, and eternal life is more sweet.' As the happiness of heaven, with Christ, is enough to countervail the loss of life itself for Christ, so the gain of all the world, in sin, is not sufficient to countervail the ruin of the soul by sin.

What men do, to save their lives and gain the world, He tells us, (v. 38.) and of what fatal consequences it will be to them; Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed. Something like this we had, Matt. 10: 33. But it is here expressed more fully. Note, [1.] The disadvantage that the cause of Christ labors under in this world, is, that it is to be owned and professed in an adulterous and sinful generation; such the generation of mankind is, gone from God, lying in wickedness; some ages, some places, are more especially adulterous and sinful, as that was in which Christ lived; in such a generation the cause of Christ is opposed, and those that own it are exposed to reproach, and every where ridiculed and spoken against.

[2.] There are many, who, though they cannot but own that the cause of Christ is a righteous cause, are ashamed of it, because of the reproach that attends professing it; they are ashamed of their relation to Christ, and ashamed of the credit they cannot but give to his words; they cannot bear to be frowned upon and despised, and therefore throw off their profession, and go down the stream of a prevailing apostasy. [3.] There is a day coming, when the cause of Christ will appear as illustrious as now it appears contemptible; when the Son of man comes in the glory of his Father with his holy angels, as the brightness of his Father's glory, and the Lord of angels. [4.] Those that are ashamed of Christ in this world where He is despised, He will be ashamed of in that world where He is eternally adored. They shall not share with Him in his glory then, that were not willing to share with Him in his disgrace now.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-13. Here,

1. Christ foretold that the kingdom of God would come, and so as to be seen. The kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up by the destruction of the Jewish polity, which stood in the way of it; this was the restoring of the kingdom of God among men, which had been lost by the woful degeneracy both of Jews and Gentiles.

2. It would come with power, so as to bear down opposition. It came with power, when vengeance was taken on the Jews for crucifying Christ, and when it conquered the idolatry of the Gentile world. 3. It would come while some now present were alive; there are some standing here, that shall not taste of death, till they see it; this generation shall not pass, till all those things be fulfilled. Those that were standing, with Christ should see it, when others could not discern it to be the kingdom of God, for it came not with observation.

II. Six days after Christ had begun to give notice to his disciples of his death, to prevent their offence at that, He gives them this glimpse of his glory, to show that his sufferings were voluntary, and what a virtue the dignity and glory of his person would impart to them.

1. It was on the top of a high mountain, like the converse Moses had with God, which was on the top of Sinai, and his prospect of Canaan from the top of Pisgah. Tradition saith, it was on the top of Tabor that Christ was transfigured; and if so, the scripture was fulfilled, Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name, Ps. 89: 12, 13. Dr. Lightfoot, observing that the last place where we find Christ was in the coasts of Caesarea Philippi, far from Tabor, rather thinks it was a high mountain which Josephus speaks of, near Caesarea.

2. The witnesses of it were Peter, James and John; these were the three that were to bear record on earth, answering to Moses, Elias, and the voice from heaven, the three that were to bear record from above. Christ did not take all the disciples with Him, because the thing was to be kept private. As there are distinguishing favors which are given to disciples, and not to the world, so there are to some disciples, and not to others. All the saints are near to Christ, but some lie in his bosom. James was the first of all the twelve that died for Christ, and John survived them all, to be the last eye-witness of this glory; he bore record, (John i: 14.) We saw his glory; and so did Peter, 2 Pet. 1: 16-18.

3. He was transfigured before them; appeared in another manner than He used to do. This was a change of the accidents, the substance remaining the same, and was a miracle. But transubstantiation, the change of the substance, and the accidents remaining the same, is not a miracle.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. v. 1. (Notes, Matt. 16: 24-23, p. 23.) 'This chiefly refers to the providential appearance of Christ for the destruction of Jerusalem. ... Our Lord's manner of speaking intimates, that most of the company should be dead before the event referred to: yet his ascension happened in a few months after.' Doddridge. Some interpret the passage of the successful preaching of the Gospel after Christ's ascension, and the establishment of his kingdom: but the reason assigned in this quotation seems conclusive, for interpreting it of his glorious appearance, in his providence, to remove the great hindrance to the full settlement of the Christian church, by destroying Jerusalem, and terminating the Jewish Dispensation. Scott.

This verse is connected with the last verse of the former chapter. An allusion is there made to the fact of the Son of man's coming in his glory; here the time is designated. (See Knapp's Nov. Test. Gr. Ed.)

Verse 5.

It is good, &c.] Had it been possible for Peter to have gone up now directly, with Christ, and Moses, and Elias, all his usefulness would have been prevented. (Notes, John 12: 23-26, 15: 12-16.) He lived many years amidst conflict and suffering, and died on a cross: yet tens and hundreds of thousands were saved by his means, to the glory of God by him! And was not this well worth his while? (Notes, Phil. 1: 19-26, 2 Pet. 1: 12-15.)

Scott.

10 And ^v they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another ^v what the rising from the dead should mean.

11 ¶ And they asked him, saying, Why say the scribes that Elias must first come?

cle, but a fraud and imposture, such a work as Christ never wrought. What a great change human bodies are capable of, when God is pleased to put an honor upon them, as He will upon the bodies of the saints, at the resurrection. He was transfigured before them; the change, it is probable, was gradual, from glory to glory, so that the disciples, who had their eye upon Him all the while, had the clearest evidence that this glorious appearance was no other than Jesus, and there was no illusion. John seems to refer to this, (1 John 1:1) when he speaks of the word of life, as that which they had seen with their eyes, and looked upon. His raiment became shining: so that, though, probably, it was sad-colored, if not black, yet it was now exceeding white as snow, beyond what the fuller could whiten it.

4. His companions in this glory were Moses and Elias; (v. 4.) They appeared talking with Him, not to teach Him, but to testify to Him, and to be taught by Him; by which it appears that there is intercourse between glorified saints, ways of talking one with another, which we understand not. Moses and Elias lived at a great distance of time one from another, but in heaven, where the first shall be last, and the last first, all are one in Christ.

5. The great delight that the disciples took, is expressed by Peter; He said, Master, it is good for us to be here, v. 5. Though Christ was transfigured, and was in discourse with Moses and Elias, yet He gave Peter leave to speak to Him, and to be as free with Him as he used to be. Note, Our Lord in his exaltation and glory, doth condescend to his people. Many when they are great, rebuke their friends to keep their distance; but even to the glorified Jesus true believers have access with boldness, and freedom of speech. Even in this heavenly discourse there was room for Peter to put in a word; and that it is Lord, it is good to be here, it is good for us to be here; here let us make tabernacles; let this be our rest forever. ^v Note, Gracious souls reckon it good to be in communion with Christ, good to be in the mount with Him, though a cold and solitary place; it is good to be retired from the world, and alone with Christ: and if it is good to be with Christ transfigured only upon a mountain with Moses and Elias, how good will it be to be with Christ glorified in heaven with all the saints? But Peter forgot what need there was of the presence of Christ, and the preaching of his apostles among the people. At this very time, the other disciples wanted them greatly, v. 14. Note, When it is well with us, we are apt, in the fulness of our enjoyments, to forget the necessities of our brethren; it was a weakness in Peter to prefer private communion with God before public usefulness. Paul is willing to abide in the flesh, rather than depart to glory, (though that be far better,) when he sees it needful for the church, Phil. 1:24, 25. Peter talked of making three tabernacles, for Moses, Elias, and Christ, which was not well contrived; for such a perfect harmony there is between the law, the prophets, and the Gospel, that one tabernacle will hold them all in unity. But he may be excused, for they were all sore afraid.

6. The voice that came from heaven was an attestation of Christ's mediatorship, v. 7. A cloud overshadowed them and sheltered them. Peter had talked of making tabernacles; but while he yet spake of his tabernacles, God created his tabernacle not made with hands. Now out of this cloud (which was but a shade to the excellent glory Peter speaks of, whence this voice came) it was said, This is my beloved Son, hear Him. God owns Him, as his beloved Son, and is ready to accept of us in Him; we must then own and accept Him as our beloved Savior, and give up ourselves to be ruled by Him.

7. The vision, being designed only to introduce this voice, when that was delivered, disappeared; (v. 8.) Suddenly when they had looked round about, as men amazed to see where they were, all was gone, they saw no man any more. Elias and Moses were vanished out of sight, and Jesus only remained with them, and He not transfigured, but as He used to be. Note, Christ doth not leave the soul, when extraordinary joys and comforts leave it. Though more sensible communications may be withdrawn, Christ's disciples shall have his ordinary presence with them always, even to the end of the world, and that is it we must depend upon. Let us thank God for daily bread, and not expect a continual feast on this side heaven.

As they came down from the mount, (1.) Christ charged them to keep this matter private, till He was risen from the dead, which would complete the proof of his divine mission,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. Those who live to behold 'the kingdom of God' set up in all parts of the world, will enjoy a satisfaction with which others have not been favored; but though we shall 'taste of death' before those days arrive; (Note, Heb. 2:5-9, v. 9.) we shall possess a still more exalted felicity, if admitted where Jesus displays far brighter glories, than even on the mount of transfiguration. The pleasures of that divine vision must be unspeakably great; for the glimpses, which we now behold, as 'through a glass darkly,' sometimes so ravish our minds, that we are ready to cry out, 'It is good for us to be here.' (P. O. 1 Cor. 13:8-13.) But we should not expect such peculiar consolations to be abiding, in this state of conflict. We must now learn to believe, and obey an unseen Savior; to 'walk by faith,' and wait in hope. We should seek conformity to Him, and expect ere long to be with Him, and like Him in body and soul, where prophets and apostles, and angels, vie with each other, who shall most honor, and praise his glorious majesty. In this hope, we may cheerfully pass through life and death; though we be often under a cloud, and ready to question, what the meaning of his words and appointments can be: and if we consider the way, in which Jesus and his servants have passed through this world to heaven, we shall be the less discouraged, should we be called to suffer many things, or be 'set at nought,' if so be, we may by any means attain unto eternal life. (Note, Phil. 3:8-11.)—The enemies of Christ always watch their opportunities of perplexing his disciples: their cavils create disquietude, in such as neglect to maintain communion with their Lord: and perverse opponents often attack the unestablished, from a consciousness that they can make no impression on those, who are more fully confirmed. But the Lord will interpose to plead for his friends, and to silence his adversaries: yet many seem zealously to welcome Him and his ministers, who do not cordially obey his Gospel. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

Marg. Ref.—Questioning, &c.] The apostles argued with each other, concerning their Lord's meaning, when He said, 'Till the Son of man be risen from the dead.' (9) Not that they did not believe a future resurrection, or had any peculiar difficulty concerning the common meaning of the words: for they had witnessed some instances of the dead being restored to life: but they were so prepossessed with prejudices against the Messiah's being cut off by death, and so assured that Jesus was the Messiah, that they supposed some figurative sense must be put on his words; for as they erroneously supposed He could not literally die, so He could not literally rise again. (Note, Luke 9:45.) Nothing has more tended to induce false interpretations of Scripture, than a vain imagination that the literal meaning could not be true, because contrary to some notion, which, though no better than the prejudiced conclusion of men, has been regarded as certain truth: and therefore allegorizing (called spiritual interpretation) must be adopted. The grand explanation of an expostor consists, in knowing what ought to be explained literally, and what must be interpreted figuratively. The poets explaining, 'This is my body,' literally, and others allegorizing the parable, or story, of the good Samaritan, will show the attentive and judicious reader the importance of this remark. (Notes, Matt. 26: 26-28. Luke 10: 30-37.)

Verse 12.

Restore, &c.] That is, bring back numbers from ungodliness to the true worship of God; as Elijah had done the Israelites from Baal to JAHOVAH. The thirteenth verse would be more readily understood if translated as follows:—'Elias is indeed come, as it is written of him; and they have done to him whatsoever they listed.' For this is the evident meaning of the words. It was not foretold, that the Messiah's forerunner would suffer martyrdom; and the scribes and priests did not put him to death: but it is plain, that they were well pleased, when he was thus taken off, and the conduct of the nation to so eminent a servant of God, showed what might be expected from them against the Savior whom he preceded. SCOTT.

Elias... cometh first.] 'The various opinions of commentators on this passage are diligently detailed by Wolf and Koehler. "So then Elias cometh and restoreth all things; but how then has it been prophesied that Christ must suffer, and be put to death?" So Euthymius, Gratian, Rosenmuller, and Kuntze. It is as much as to say, "Well, taking for granted what... say." BLOOMFIELD [351]

14 ¶ And when he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and the scribes questioning with them.

15 And straightway all the people, when they beheld him, were greatly amazed, and running to him saluted him.

16 And he asked the scribes, What question ye with them?

17 And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit:

18 And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away; and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out, and they could not.

19 He answered him, and saith, O faithless generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him unto me.

20 And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him, and he fell on the ground, and wallowed, foaming.

21 And he asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child.

22 And oft-times it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him: but if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us.

23 Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth.

24 And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said and then this must be produced with the rest of the evidence, v. 9. And besides, He being now in a state of humiliation, would have nothing publicly taken notice of, that might seem disagreeable to such a state; for to that He would in every thing accommodate Himself. This enjoining of silence to the disciples would likewise be of use to them, to prevent their boasting of the intimacy they were about to be admitted to, that they might not be puffed up with the abundance of the revelations. It is a mortification to a man, to be tied up from telling of his advancements, and may help to hide pride from him.

(2.) The disciples were at a loss what the rising from the dead should mean, they could not form any notion of the Messiah's dying, (Luke 18: 34.) and therefore were willing to think that the rising was figurative; from his present low estate to dignity and dominion. But if so, why say the scribes, that before the appearing of the Messiah in his glory, Elias must first come? Elias was gone, and Moses too. Now that which raised this difficulty was, the scribes taught them to expect the person of Elias, whereas the prophecy intended one in the spirit and power of Elias. Note, The misunderstanding of Scripture is a great prejudice to the entertainment of truth.

(3.) Christ gave them a key to the prophecy concerning Elias; v. 12, 13. 'It is indeed prophesied that Elias will come, and will restore all things, set them to rights; and (though you will not understand it) it is also prophesied of the Son of man, that he must be a reproach of men, and despised of the people; though the scribes do not tell you so, the Scriptures do, and you have as much reason to expect that as the other; but as to Elias, He is come; it is one to whom they have done whatsoever they listed;' which was applicable to John Baptist. Many think, that beside the coming of John Baptist in the spirit of Elias, himself, in his own person is to be expected, with Enoch, before the second appearance of Christ, where the prophecy of Malachi will have a more full accomplishment than it had in John Baptist. But it is a groundless fancy: the true Elias, as well as the true Messiah promised, is come, and we are to look for no other. These words, as it is written of him, refer not to their doing to him whatever they listed, (that comes in a parenthesis,) but only to his coming. He is come, and hath been, and done, according as was written of him.

V. 14—29. Observe here,

1. Christ returns to his disciples, lays aside his robes of glory, and comes to look after his family. Christ's glory above, does not make Him forget the concerns of his church below, which He visits in great humility, v. 14. And He came very seasonably, when the disciples were embarrassed: the scribes, who were enemies both to Him and them, had gained an advantage against them. A child possessed with a devil was brought to them, and they could not cast out the devil, whereupon the scribes insulted over them, and reflected upon their Master, and triumphed. He found the scribes questioning with them, in the hearing of the multitude.

Verses 16—24.

This accords very much with the case of persons afflicted with the epilepsy; and hence some have ventured to assert, that it was no real possession: but does it not better become our ignorance, concerning the real causes of these maladies, to allow that at least the symptoms are aggravated by diabolical agency, than to suppose that Christ, by word and deed, gave the most explicit sanction to a vulgar error, and taught men to ascribe effects to the power of apostate spirits, in which they had no agency? This irreverence to the Word of God, and to the Redeemer's character, is often the effect of pride and determined infidelity, in which Satan has far more influence, than such persons are willing in any thing to allow him. The question, 'How long is it ago, since this

Thus Moses, when he came down from the mount, found the camp of Israel in great disorder: Christ's return was very welcome, no doubt, to the disciples, and unwelcome to the scribes. The people, who perhaps were ready to say, As for this Jesus, we do not know what is become of Him, when they beheld Him coming to them again, were greatly amazed; and running to Him (or bidding Him welcome,) saluted Him. It is easy to give a reason why they should be glad to see Him; but why were they greatly amazed what they beheld Him? Probably, there might remain something unusual in his countenance; as Moses' face shone when he came down from the mount, which made the people afraid to come nigh him, Exod. 34:30. So perhaps there appeared something wonderful in his looks, which amazed them.

II. He asked the scribes, who, He knew, were always vexatious to his disciples, 'What is the quarrel now?' The scribes made no answer; they were confounded at his presence; the disciples made none, for they were comforted, and left all to Him. The father of the child opened the cause, v. 17, 18. His child is possessed with a dumb spirit: he has the falling-sickness, and in his fits is speechless; wheresoever the fit takes him, the spirit throws him into violent convulsions; and, which is grievous and frightful, he foams at the mouth, and gnashes with his teeth, as one in great misery; and though the fits go off, they leave him so weak, that he pines away to a skeleton. This was a constant affliction to a tender father. The disciples cannot give him any relief; 'I desired they would cast him out, as they had done many, and they would willingly have done it, but they could not; and therefore, Master, I have brought him to Thee.'

III. The rebuke He gave to them all; (v. 19.) O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? Dr. Hammond understands this as spoken to the disciples, reproving them for not exerting the power He had given them, and because they did not fast and pray, as He had directed them to do. But Dr. Whitty takes it as a rebuke to the scribes, who gloried in this disappointment that the disciples met with. Them He calls a faithless generation, and speaks as one weary of being with them, and of bearing with them. We never hear Him complaining, 'How long shall I be in this low condition, and suffer that?' But, 'How long shall I be among these faithless people, and suffer them?'

IV. When the child saw Christ, he fell into a fit; The spirit straightway tore him, as if the devil would set Christ at defiance, and keep possession in spite of Him. The child fell on the ground, and wallowed, foaming. The devil raged, because he knew that his time was short, Rev. 12: 12. Christ asked, How long since this came to him? The disease was of long standing; it came to him of a child, (v. 21.) which made the case more sad, and the cure more difficult. We are all by nature, children of disobedience, and in such the evil spirit works, and has done so from our childhood; for foolishness is bound in the heart of a child, and nothing but the grace of Christ can cast it out.

He could scarcely believe that Jesus could cast out this evil spirit; yet he concluded, that He could enable him to believe, and inwardly assist him against unbelief! In effect he said, 'Lord, I do believe, and expect help from Thee alone; but I am not able to exclude all doubting about it: but do thou not help me against my unbelief, and then deliver my child from his calamity.' Where do we ever read of such an address to any prophet or apostle, in the whole Scripture? And who does not perceive, that such a request must have been highly reprehensible, if made to any mere man or creature?

V. The father of the child pleads with Christ for a cure; (v. 22.) Qf-times it has cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him. Note, The devil aims at the ruin of those in whom he rules, and sees whom he may devour. But if Thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us. The leper was confident of Christ's power, but put an if upon it, because his disciples, who cast out devils in his name, had been non-plussed in this case. Christ suffers in his honor by the difficulties and follies of his disciples.

VI. Christ gave this answer; (v. 23.) If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. Here, 1. He checks the weakness of his faith. The sufferer put it upon Christ's power, If Thou canst do any thing, and reflected on the want of power in the disciples; but Christ puts him upon questioning his own faith, and imputes the disappointment to the want of that: If thou canst believe. 2. He encourages his desire; All things will appear possible to him that believeth the almighty power of God; or, 'That shall be done for them that believe, which seemed utterly impossible.' Note, In dealing with Christ, very much is put upon our believing, and very much promised to it. Canst thou believe? Art thou willing to venture thy all in the hands of Christ? To venture all thy spiritual concerns with Him, and all thy temporal concerns for Him? If so, it is not impossible but that, though a great sinner, thou mayest be reconciled; though mean and unworthy, thou mayest get to heaven. If thou canst believe, it is possible that thy hard heart may be softened, thy diseases cured; and that, weak as thou art, thou mayest hold out to the end.

VII. The man hereupon cried out; 'Lord, I believe; I am fully persuaded both of thy power and of thy pity; my cure shall not be prevented by the want of faith: Lord, I believe.' He adds a prayer, for grace to enable him more firmly to rely upon the ability and willingness of Christ; Help Thou my unbelief. Note, 1. Ere those who through grace can say, Lord, I believe, have reason to complain that they cannot so readily apply the word of Christ as they should, nor so cheerfully depend upon it. 2. Those that complain of unbelief, must look up to Christ, and his grace shall be sufficient for them. 'Help mine unbelief; help me to a

VIII. Christ saw the people running together, expecting to see this trial of skill, and therefore kept them in suspense no longer, but rebuked the foul spirit. He said, 'Thou spirit that maketh the child dumb and deaf, but shalt be made to hear thy doom, and not be able to say any thing against it. Come out of him immediately, and enter no more into him. Let him not only be brought out of this fit, but let his fits never return.' Note, Whom Christ cures, He cures effectually. Satan may go out himself, and yet recover possession: but if Christ cast him out, He will keep him out. The unclean spirit grew yet more outrageous, cried, and rent him sore, that he was as one dead; so loath was he to quit his hold, so exasperated at the superior power of Christ, so malicious to the child, and so desirous to kill him. Many said, he is dead. Thus the breaking of Satan's power in the soul, may perhaps be frightful for the present, but opens the door to lasting comfort. The child was perfectly restored; (v. 27.) Jesus took him by the hand, and strongly bore him up; he arose, recovered, and all was well.

IX. The reason He gave to the disciples why they could not cast out this devil. They inquired of Him privately, why they could not, that wherein they were defective might be made up another time, and they might not be again thus publicly shamed; and He told them, (v. 29.) This kind can come forth by nothing but prayer and fasting. Whatever other difference there really might be, none appears between this and other kinds, but that the unclean spirit had had possession of this poor patient from a child, and that strengthened his interest and confirmed his hold. When vicious habits are rooted by long usage, and begin to pierce prescription, like chronic diseases, they are hardly cured. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? The disciples must not think to do their work always with a like ease; some services call them to take more than ordinary pains: but Christ can do that with a word's speaking, which they must prevail to do by prayer and fasting.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14-29. In what varied ways does Satan with his angels attempt to render mankind miserable! Yet his chief success among those who are favored with the Gospel, arises from their unbelief: for if they had a clear apprehension of the power and grace of the Savior, who came to destroy the works of the devil, they would seek and obtain deliverance.—When our relatives are made wretched, or mischievous, through the influence of Satan, we should bring them to Christ, beseeching Him to 'have compassion and help us:' and we may do this for them, when they are incapable of receiving our instructions, or determined to disregard our counsels.—Ministers and Christians may be applied to on such occasions, and their counsels and prayers may be useful; but our dependence must rest on Christ alone; and should they conclude the case to be hopeless, we should still persist in expecting help from his almighty arm. But after all the displays which He has made, and his patient teaching of us, by his word and our own experience, we are prone to form low expectations from Him. Yet the things, which to all others are impossible, are easy with Him.—Even in the case of those, who, from their earliest years have been peculiarly enslaved by Satan, and have contracted various pernicious habits and fatal connections; by means of which, they have, as it were, often been cast into the fire, and into the water, and have repeatedly been brought to the verge of destruction; we have abundant encouragement to expect help from the Savior. He has hitherto bounded the rage of the enemy, and borne with the sinner; and He can easily break the power of the former, and glorify Himself in the salvation of the latter. Our chief danger, in every thing really good for us, arises from unbelief: 'if we can believe, all things are possible to him that believeth;' and as we shall certainly find a difficulty in exercising such unshaken faith in the power and grace of Christ, on many occasions: we should apply to Him, 'as the Author and Finisher of our faith;' to strengthen us against unbelief; that we may not, through our own fault, come short of the blessings which we seek, in behalf of ourselves or others. Satan will be reluctant to be driven out of those who have long been his slaves; and when he cannot destroy the sinner, he will cause him as much trouble as possible: so that when a man is about to experience a most blessed deliverance, he is often more distressed than at any other time; and the beginnings of liberty and life resemble the agonies of death.—Ministers would witness, and be the instruments of more remarkable conversions, if they were stronger in faith, more fervent in prayer, and more entirely mortified to earthly pleasures and pursuits: and should we inquire of Jesus, why we have no more success 'in turning sinners from the power of Satan unto God,' He would probably answer, 'Because of your unbelief; for this effect cannot be produced 'except by fasting and prayer.'

The failure of the disciples in Matthew's account of this transaction.

is attributed to unbelief; and Christ adds, 'if ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say to this mountain, Remove,' &c. and it shall remove, and nothing shall be impossible unto you.' By faith here we understand confidence in God: both as to his power and his readiness. But this, the disciples of Christ could attain only by devout religious exercises and self-denial:—other words, by prayer and fasting. Having been, it would seem, somewhat remiss in these duties, their faith wavered, and their power failed: for which they were reproved by Christ.

31 For he taught his disciples, and said unto them, "The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him; and after that he is killed, he shall rise the third day."

32 But they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask him.

33 ¶ And he came to Capernaum: and being in the house, he asked them, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?"

34 But they held their peace; for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest.

35 And he sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."

36 And he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, 37 Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me.

38 ¶ And John answered him, saying, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in proaching sufferings. He passed through Galilee with more expedition than usual, and would not that any man should know it: (v. 30.) because He had done many works among them in vain, they shall not be invited to see them, and have the benefit of them as they have been. The time of his sufferings drew nigh, and therefore He was willing to be private awhile, and to converse only with his disciples, to prepare them for the approaching trial, v. 31. He said to them, The Son of man is delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God into the hands of men, (v. 31.) and they shall kill Him. Had He been delivered into the hands of devils, and they had worried Him, it had not been so strange; but that men, who have reason, and should have love, should be thus spiteful to the Son of man, who came to redeem and save them, is unaccountable. But still it is observable that when Christ spake of his death, He always spake of his resurrection, which took away the reproach of it from Himself, and should have taken away the grief of it from his disciples. But they understood not that saying, v. 32. The words were plain enough, but they could not be reconciled to the thing, and therefore would suppose them to have some mystical meaning which they did not understand, and they were afraid to ask Him; not because He was difficult of access, or stern, but either because they were loath to know the truth, or because they expected to be chidden for their backwardness to receive it. Many remain ignorant because they are ashamed to inquire.

II. When He came to Capernaum, He asked his disciples what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way, v. 33. He knew very well what the dispute was, but He would know it from them, and would have them to confess their folly in it. Note, 1. We must all expect to be called to an account by our Lord concerning what passes while we are in the way in this state of probation. 2. We must in particular be called to an account about our discourses among ourselves; for by our words we must be justified or condemned. 3. As our other discourses among ourselves by the way, so especially our disputes, will be all called over again, and we shall be called to an account about them. 4. Of all disputes, Christ will be sure to reckon with his disciples for their disputes about precedence; that was the subject of the debate here, who should be the greatest, v. 34. Nothing could be more contrary to the two great laws of Christ's kingdom, which are humility and love, than desiring preferment in the world, and disputing about it. This ill temper He took all occasions to check, both because it arose from a mistaken notion of his kingdom, and because it tended to the debasing and the corrupting of his Gospel, and He foresaw, would be the bane of the church.

Now, (1.) They were willing to cover this fault, (v. 34.) they held their peace. As they would not ask, (v. 32.) because they were ashamed, so here they would not answer, because of their pride. (2.) He was willing to bring them to a better temper; and therefore had a solemn and full discourse with them about this matter. He called the twelve to Him, and told them, [1.] That ambition, and affectation of dignity, instead of gaining them preferment in his kingdom, would but postpone it; If any man aim to be first, he shall be last; he that exalteth himself shall be abased, and men's pride shall bring them low. [2.] There is no preferment to be had under Him, but an opportunity for the more labor and condescension; If any man desire to be first, he must be much the more servicable. He that desires the office of a bishop, desires a good work, for he must, as St. Paul did, labor the more abundantly, and make himself the servant of all. [3.] Those who are most humble and self-denying, do most resemble Christ, and shall be most owned by Him. This He taught them by a sign; He took a child in his arms, that had nothing of pride and ambition in it, and said, Whosoever shall receive one like this child, receives Me. Those of a humble, meek disposition I will own, and encourage every body else to do so too, and will take what is done to them as done to myself, and so will my Father, for he who thus receives Me, receives Me, and it shall be placed to his account, and repaid with interest.

III. He rebukes them; for, while they are striving which of them should be greatest, they will not allow those who follow not with them to be any thing. Observe,

1. John told Him of the restraint they laid upon one from making use of the name of Christ, because he was not of their society. Though they were ashamed to own their contentions for preferment, they seem to boast of this exercise of authority, and expected their Master would not only justify them in it, but commend them for it; and hoped He would not blame them for desiring to be great, when they would thus use their power for the maintaining of their honor. Master, saith John, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, but he followed not us, v. 33. (1.) It was strange that one who was not a professed disciple and follower of Christ should yet have power to cast out devils in his name, for that seemed to be peculiar to those whom He called, ch. 6, 7. Some think that he was a disciple of John, who made use of the name of the Messiah, not knowing that Jesus was He. It should rather seem that he made use of the name of Jesus, believing Him to be the Christ, as the other apostles did. And why might not he receive that power from Christ, whose Spirit, like the wind, blows where it listeth, without such an outward call as the apostles had? And perhaps there were many more such. Christ's grace is not tied to the visible church. (2.) It was strange that one who cast out devils in the name of Christ, did not join himself to the apostles, but should continue to act in separation from them. I know of nothing that could hinder him from following them, unless because he was loath to leave all to follow them; and if so, that was an ill principle. The thing did not look well, and therefore the disciples forbade him to make use of Christ's name as they did, unless he would follow Him as they did. This was like the motion Joshua made concerning Eldad and Medad, that prophesied in the camp, and went not with the rest to the door of the tabernacle; My lord Moses, forbid them; (Num. 11: 33.) for it is a schism. Thus apt are we to imagine that those do not follow Christ at all, who do not follow Him with us, and that those do nothing well, who do not just as we do. But the Lord knows them that are his; and this instance gives us a useful caution, to take heed lest we be carried, by an excess of zeal for the unity of the church, and for that which we are sure is right, to oppose that which yet may tend to the enlargement of the church, and the advancement of its true interests, another way.

2. Jesus said, Forbid him not, nor any that do likewise. This was like the check Moses gave to Joshua; Enviest thou for my sake? Note, That which is good, and doeth good, must not be prohibited, though there be some defect or irregularity in the manner of doing it. Casting out devils, and so destroying Satan's

Verses 33—37.

'If there was to be any primacy among the apostles, why was Christ on this occasion silent respecting it? Or, if He had, in the hearing of the others, conferred it on Peter, what occasion would there have been for the apostles to dispute about it?' Beza. (35.) Servant, etc. 'The precedence among my disciples, all that they are capable of, that of being governors of the church, brings no advantage to him that has it, but to be more the servant of other men; more work and business being the only advantage of that precedence, which shall befall you and your successors.' Hammond. If this were known by all to be the case, or generally believed to be so, the number of candidates for the distinction of being 'successors to the apostles,' would be exceedingly diminished.

Verse 38.

The disciples had just been disputing who should be greatest. Among the most ambitious, as elsewhere appears, were James and John. This answer of John seems to intimate, that the origin of the dispute was in a difference of opinion about the man whom they found casting out devils. He appeals to Christ: 'We, i. e. a part of the disciples, forbid him. Was it not right to exercise this authority?' In the following verses, Christ reproves his forwardness, and corrects his mistake.

thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us.

39 But Jesus said, 'Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me.'

40 For He that is not against us, is on our part.

41 For *who*soever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward.

kingdom, in Christ's name, so owning Him to be sent of God, and giving honor to Him as the Fountain of grace, are good things which ought not to be forbidden to us, merely because they follow not with us. If Christ be preached, Paul therein doth, and will rejoice, though he be eclipsed by it, Phil. 1:18. Two reasons Christ gives why such should not be forbidden. (1.) Because we cannot suppose that any man, who makes use of Christ's name in working miracles, should blaspheme his name, as the scribes and Pharisees did. There were those indeed that did in Christ's name cast out devils, and yet in other respects were workers of iniquity; but they did not speak evil of Christ. (2.) Because those that differed in communion, while they agreed to fight against Satan under the banner of Christ, ought to look upon one another as on the same side. He that is not against us, is on our part. As to the great controversy between Christ and Beelzebub, He had said, He that is not with Me is against Me, Matt. 12:30. He that will not own Christ, owns Satan. But among those that own Christ, though not in the same circumstances, that follow Him, though not with us, we must reckon, that, though these differ from us, they are not against us, and therefore are on our part, and we must not hinder their usefulness.

V. 41—50. I. Christ promiseteth a reward to all that are kind to his disciples; (c. 41.) 'Whoever shall give you a cup of water, when you need it, because ye belong to Christ, shall not lose his reward.' Note. 1. It is the honor of Christians, that they belong to Christ, and are owned by Him; nay, they are members of his body. 2. They who belong to Christ may sometimes be glad of a cup of cold water. 3. The relieving of Christ's poor, is a good deed; He accepts it, and will reward it. 4. What kindness is done to Christ's poor, must be done for his sake, and because they belong to Him; for that is it that puts a value upon it in the sight of God. 5. This is a reason why we must not discourage those who are serving Christ, though they are not in every thing of our mind and way. It comes in here as a reason why those must not be hindered, that cast out devils in Christ's name, though they did not follow Him; for 'it is not only the eminent performances which are done by you that are accepted by Me, but the least degree of sincere faith and Christian performance, proportionable but to the expressing the least kindness; as giving a cup of water to a disciple of mine, for being such, shall be rewarded.' Hammond. I. Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to Him, we ought to reckon services to Him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us.

II. He threatens those that offend his little ones, that wilfully are the occasion of sin or trouble to them, v. 42. Whosoever shall grieve any true Christians, though the weakest, oppose their entrance into the ways of God, or obstruct their progress in those ways, restrain them from doing good, or draw them to commit sin, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea; his punishment will be very great, and the death and ruin of his soul more terrible than such a death and ruin of his body would be. See Matt. 18:6.

III. He warns all his followers to take heed of ruining their own souls. This charity must begin at home; if we must take heed of doing any thing to hinder others from good, much more careful must we be to avoid every thing that will take us off from duty, or lead us to sin; and that which doth so, we must part with, though it be ever so dear to us. Observe,

1. The case supposed, that our own hand, or eye, or foot, offends us; that the corruption we indulge is as dear to us as an eye or hand; or that that which is to us as an eye or a hand, is become a temptation to sin, or occasion of it. Suppose the beloved is become a sin, or the sin a beloved. Suppose we cannot keep that which is dear to us, but it will be a snare; suppose we must part with it, or part with Christ and a good conscience.

2. The duty prescribed in that case; Pluck out the eye, cut off the hand and foot, mortify the darling lust, crucify it. Let the idols that have been delectable, be cast away as detestable; keep at a distance from that which is a temptation, though ever so pleasing. It is necessary that the part which is gangrened should be taken off for the preservation of the whole. We must put ourselves to pain, that we may

Instead of prohibiting those who aided in promoting the common cause, our Lord declared, that He would recompense every one, who gave one of the least among his disciples so much as 'a cup of water, because he belonged to Him'; on the contrary, whosoever injured the least of his disciples, would commit so grievous a crime, and be in danger of a great a punishment, that the most terrible death would be a much lighter evil, than that to which he would expose himself.

WALTE, ed. by Rob.

Verse 43—50.

These verses belong to the sermon on the mount. But Christ, traveling from place to place, doubtless, repeated often the same sentiments, sometimes in the same words. Especially would He do this to his disciples, that He might make them familiar with the principles which must regulate their conduct. In the sermon on the mount, these precepts were general; here they are applied to a particular case, ambition.

(43.) I saw Philip himself, with whom our contest was for rule and dominion, after having lost an eye, having had his hip broken, and being lamed in his hand and his leg, disposed, readily and easily to part with any part of his body, which fortune might choose; so that, with this remainder, he might live in glory and honor.' Demosthenes. 'They do it for a corruptible crown; but we for an incorruptible.' (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.) It is repeatedly said, 'Their worm never dieth,' as well as that 'the fire is never quenched.' (Note, Is. 66:24.) Doubtless, remorse of conscience and keen self-reflection constitute this never-dying worm: so that the expression is alike contrary to the ideas of annihilation, and of final restitution to happiness; for, on either of these suppositions, 'their worm' would die, and their torturing consciences would cease. And as the fire is doubtless, at least, an emblem of the wrath of God, its unquenchableness must denote, that his justice will never be satisfied, nor his anger turned away from those, who are cast into this fire of hell. (Mark 9:43. 16:19. Note, Is. 33:14. Matt. 3:11, 12. 45:41—46. 2 Thes. 2:5—10, tr. 8, 9. 1 Pet. 2:1. 5:8, v. 8.) The sacrifices under the law were commanded to be salted with salt. (Note, Lev. 2:13.) This was primarily an emblem of grace, which renders the sanctified soul meet for the enjoyment of its incorruptible inheritance: but it also represented that 'every sacrifice' to the divine justice 'would be salted with fire,' the very nature of the punishment, or the righteous vengeance of God, will render the heirs of hell incorruptible: so that their misery will be as endless, as the happiness of the righteous. 'Every wicked man shall be seasoned with fire itself, so as to become insconquerable, and shall endure forever to be tormented; and therefore may be said to be "salted with fire," in allusion to that property of salt, which is to preserve from corruption.' Whitby.

(50.) In concluding this subject, our Lord reminded the disciples, that as salt, though valuable in itself to season other bodies, was yet worthless and irrecoverable when it had lost its saltiness; so they would become more vile than others, if they were not truly sanctified: for they would be employed in converting and preserving others, and would have none to season them, should they turn aside. It would therefore be incumbent on them, to watch over their own hearts, to mortify their lusts, and, laying aside ambition, the parent of contention, to live at peace with each other. If teachers themselves to whom is committed the divine word, with which men must be seasoned as with salt, do themselves become insipid, (not savoring of that holy word, in doctrine, spirit, and practice,) what remaineth, but either, that the hearers perish, or that God should send other teachers? Beza.

(44—48.) 'The words are taken from Is. 66:24, where the subject cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched;

46 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.

47 And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire;

48 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.

49 For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt.

50 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltiness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another.

not bring ourselves to ruin; self must be denied, that it may not be destroyed.

3. The necessity of doing this. The flesh must be mortified, that we may enter into life, (v. 43, 45.) into the kingdom of God, v. 47. Though, by abandoning sin, we may, for the present, feel halt and maimed, (it may create us some uneasiness,) yet it is for life; and all that men have they will give for their lives: it is for a kingdom, the kingdom of God, which we cannot otherwise obtain; these halts and maims will be the marks of the Lord Jesus, and scars of honor.

4. The danger of not doing this. The matter is brought to this, that either sin, or we, must die. If we will lay this Delilah in our bosom, it will betray us: if we be ruled by sin, we shall inevitably be ruined by it; if we must keep our two hands, and two eyes, and two feet, we must with them be cast into hell. Our Savior often pressed our duty upon us, from the consideration of the torments of hell, which we run into if we continue in sin. With what an emphasis of terror are those words repeated three times here, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched! The words are quoted from Isa. 66:24. (1.) The reflections and reproaches of the sinner's own conscience are the worm that dieth not; which will cleave to the damned soul as worms to the dead body, and prey upon it, and never leave it till it is quite devoured. Son, remember, will be this worm; and how terribly will it bite with that word, (Prov. 6:12, 23.) How have I hated instruction! The soul that is food to this worm dies not; and the worm is bred in it, and one with it, and neither doth that die. Damned sinners will be to eternity accusing and upbraiding themselves with their own follies, which, how much soever they are now in love with them, will at the last bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder. (2.) The wrath of God fastening upon a guilty conscience, is the fire that is not quenched; it is the wrath of the living and eternal God, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. There are no operations of the Spirit upon the souls of damned sinners, and therefore there is nothing to alter the nature of the fuel, which must remain forever combustible; nor is there any application of the merit of Christ to them, and therefore there is nothing to appease the violence of the fire. Dr. Whitby shows that the eternity of the torments of hell was not only the constant faith of the Christian church, but had been so of the Jewish church. Josephus says, The Pharisees held that the souls of the wicked were to be punished with perpetual punishment; and that there was appointed for them a perpetual prison. And Philo saith, The punishment of the wicked is, to live forever dying, and to be forever in pains and griefs that never cease.

The two last verses are somewhat difficult, and interpreters agree not in the sense of them; for every one in general, or rather every one of them that are cast into hell, shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Therefore have salt in yourselves. [1.] It was appointed by the law of Moses, that every sacrifice should be salted with salt, not to preserve it, (for it was to be immediately consumed,) but because it was the food of God's table, and no flesh is eaten without salt; it was therefore particularly required in the meat-offerings, Lev. 2:13. [2.] The nature of man being corrupt, and as such being called flesh, (Gen. 6:3. Ps. 78:39.) some way or other must be salted, in order to its being a sacrifice to God. [3.] Our chief concern is, to present ourselves living sacrifices to the grace of God, (Rom. 12:1.) and, in order to our acceptableness, we must be salted with salt, our corrupt affections must be subdued, and we have in our souls a savor of grace. Thus the offering up, or sacrificing of the Gentiles, is said to be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost, Rom. 15:16. [4.] Those that have the salt of grace must make it appear that they have it a living principle of grace in their hearts, which works out all corrupt dispositions, and every thing in the soul that tends to putrefaction, and would offend God, or our own consciences. Our speech must be always with grace, seasoned with this salt, that no corrupt communication may proceed out of our mouth. [5.] As this gracious salt will keep our own consciences void of offence, so it will keep our conversation with others, that we may not offend

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30-50. While the Savior teaches most plainly those things which relate to his love, his sufferings and death, his present glory and future coming to judgment; men in general are so blinded by prejudice, that they do not understand his sayings, and by various hindrances are frequently deterred from praying for divine illumination. Even disciples are often more ready to dispute with each other, 'which shall be the greatest,' than with humble simplicity to sit at his feet, and learn the doctrine of the cross, 'by which the world must be crucified to them, and they unto the world;' and we all need repeated rebukes, before we are made willing to seek wisdom by becoming 'little children,' and to aspire after greatness by stooping to 'be the least of all.' Yet disciples of this character are most dear to their Lord, and will be most honored by Him, as his messengers to mankind: and 'whosoever receiveth one of them in Christ's name, receiveth both 'Him and the Father who sent Him.' Pride and bigotry are great hindrances to usefulness: men often think the interests of a party, or the credit of their order, of more importance than the cause of godliness: they are ready, by presumptuous authority, to forbid others 'to cast out devils in the name of Christ,' 'because they follow not with them;' and even to grieve when good is done, if it be not managed according to their notions, and by those who are commissioned and sent forth in their way. Whereas all who love and honor Christ are of one side: 'he that is not against us is on our part;' and if sinners be brought to repent, believe in the Savior, and lead sober, righteous and godly lives, we must perceive that the Lord works by the preacher; and who are we, that we should attempt to silence him? While, therefore, we are encouraged to do good to others 'for his name's sake,' and especially to those who belong to Him, assured that such services shall not lose their reward; let us also favor all who appear to be on his side in this evil world, and be glad to concur with them: and let us dread, worse than death, any thing which can tend to grieve them, or hinder their usefulness.—Instead of acrimony against those, who 'follow not with us,' let us bend all our severity against our own evil propensities; not sparing one of them, though it has been as a hand, a foot, or an eye, unto us; or however painful we may find the mortification of it. Thus we shall be assured of 'entering into life,' and be preserved from the most distant fear of being 'cast into hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.'—It would be infinitely better to undergo all possible pain here, and be forever happy hereafter, than to enjoy all worldly pleasure for a season, and then to be forever miserable! (P. O. Matt. 16:21-28.) If then the difficulty and pain of mortifying every sinful inclination appears very great; if the worldly advantages to be renounced appear very valuable; consider the awful alternative. For eternity is before us: incorruptible in holiness and happiness, or in sin and misery, we must be: either sacrifices to God's justice, to be 'salted with fire,' or willing sacrifices to his honor, by the sanctification of the Spirit through the redemption of Christ. We have the name of Christians: some of us preach, and many others profess the Gospel; we are thus 'the salt of the earth.' If we answer to our character, we shall be useful here and happy forever: but if we remain destitute of the grace of God, our name, or sacred function, will only serve to aggravate our guilt, and increase our condemnation. Then lay aside every carnal and ambitious project and pursuit: 'look diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God;' and follow holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.' (Notes, Heb. 12:14-17.) SCOTT.

CHAP. X.

Jesus teaches in Judea, 1; answers the Pharisees concerning divorce, 2-12; receives and blesses young children, 13-16; instructs and proves the rich young man; shows the danger of affluence; and makes gracious promises to those who forsake worldly objects for his sake, 17-31. He again predicts his own death and resurrection; reproves the ambition of James and John, and the other apostles, 32-45; and gives signs to blind Bartimeus, 46-52.

AND he arose from thence, and cometh into the coasts of Judea, by the farther side of Jordan; and the people resort unto him again: and, as he was wont, he taught them again.

2 ¶ And the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, 'Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?' tempting him.

3 And he answered and said unto them, 'What did Moses command you?'

4 And they said, 'Moses suffered to write a bill of divorce, and to put her away.'

5 And Jesus answered and said unto them, 'For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept:'

6 But from the beginning of the creation, God made them male and female.

7 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife, any of Christ's little ones, but be at peace one with another. [6.] We must not only have this salt of grace, but always retain the relish of it; for if this salt lose its saltiness, if a Christian revolt from his Christianity, and be no longer under the influence of it, what can recover him, or wherein will ye season him? [7.] Those that present not themselves living sacrifices to God's grace, shall be made forever dying sacrifices to his justice, and, since they would not give honor to Him, He will get honor upon them; they would not be salted with the salt of divine grace, could not bear the corrosives that were necessary to eat out the proud flesh; it was to them like cutting off a hand, or plucking out an eye; and therefore in hell they shall be salted with fire; coals of fire shall be scattered upon them, (Ezek 10: 2.) as salt upon the meat, and brimstone, (Job 18: 15.) as fire and brimstone were rained on Sodom; the pleasures they had lived in shall eat their flesh, as it were fire, Jam. 5: 3. The pain of mortifying the flesh now, is no more to be compared with the punishment for not mortifying it, than salting with burning. And since He had said, that the fire of hell shall not be quenched, but it might be objected, that the fuel will not last always, He here intimates, that, by the power of God it shall be made to last always; for those that are cast into hell, will find the fire to have not only the corroding quality of salt, but its preserving quality; whence it is used to signify that which is lasting; a covenant of salt is a perpetual covenant, and Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt, made her a monument of divine vengeance. Now since this will certainly be the doom of those that do not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, let us, knowing the terror of the Lord, be persuaded to do it.

CHAP. X. v. 1-12. Our Lord did not continue long in a place, for the whole land of Canaan was his parish, and therefore He would visit every part of it, and give instruction in the remotest corners. Here we have Him in the coasts of Judea, by the further side of Jordan eastward, as we found Him, not long since, in the utmost borders westward, near Tyre and Sidon. Thus was his circuit like that of the sun, from whose light and heat nothing is hid. Here He is.

(49, 50.) 'Salt among the orientals is a symbol of inviolable friendship; a covenant of salt means a perpetual covenant. It is used tropically for wisdom—salt that has lost its savor, for folly.'

These words, salted with fire, are supposed by Williams, Kuinzel, and others, not to refer to the punishment of the wicked, but to the general subject of Christ's discourse, self-denial. 'And' should be translated as, according to WAHL'S Lex. The meaning then is, as every sacrifice must receive in the fire the purifying virtue of salt, so you must be purified in the fires of self-denial and affliction. Trials are good. But if not allowed to produce their legitimate influence, they will tend to spiritual folly and contention, more than to spiritual wisdom and peace. Therefore, have salt, i. e. spiritual wisdom, in yourselves, and peace, of which also salt is a symbol, with one another.

NOTES

CHAP. X. v. 2-12. (Notes, Matt. 19: 3-12.) 'This seeming difference, (between this account and that in Matthew's gospel,) may be removed by saying, They first asked Him "Why did Moses command you?" And then our Savior asked them, What were the words of Moses in his case? And when they had repeated them, He tells them the reason why Moses gave them this permission.' Whitby. It is here added, 'If a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another,' &c. This case, which often occurred among the Romans, and sometimes even among the Jews, (having been introduced by Salome, sister to Herod the Great, who sent a bill of divorce to her husband, Costobarus; and her example was followed by Herodias and others,) serves to confirm the conclusion, that our Lord intended to put men and women exactly on the same footing in this matter; so that the Christ's constant practice; it was what He used to, and wherever He came, He did as He was wont. In Matthew it is said, He healed them; here it is said, He taught them: his cures were to confirm his doctrine, and to commend it, and his doctrine was to explain his cures and illustrate them. His teaching was healing to souls. He taught them again. Note, Even those whom Christ hath taught, have need to be taught again. Such is the fullness of the Christian doctrine, that there is still more to be learned; and such our forgetfulness that we need to be minded of what we do know.

II. He is disputed with by the Pharisees, who envied the progress of his spiritual arms, and did all they could to oppose it; to perplex Him, and to prejudice the people against Him.

Here is, 1. A question they started concerning divorce; (v. 2.) Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? This was a good question, if it had been put with a humble desire to know the mind of God; but they proposed it, seeking an occasion against Him, and an opportunity to expose Him, which side soever He should take of the question. Ministers must stand upon their guard, lest, under pretence of being advised with, they be ensnared.

2. Christ's reply; (v. 3.) What did Moses command you? This He asked them, to testify his respect to the law of Moses, and to show that He came not to destroy it; and to engage them to an impartial respect for Moses' writings, and to compare one part with another.

3. They own that Moses only suffered, or permitted, a man to write his wife a bill of divorce, and to put her away, Deut. 24: 1. 'If you will do it, you must do it in writing, delivered into her own hand, and so put her away, and never return to her again.'

4. Christ abides by the doctrine He had formerly laid down in this case, (Matt. 5: 32.) That whosoever putteth away his wife, except for fornication, causeth her to commit adultery. And to clear this, He here shows,

(1.) That the reason why Moses, in his law, permitted divorce, was such, as that they ought not to make use of that permission; for it was only for the hardness of their hearts, (v. 5.) lest, if they were not permitted to divorce their wives they should murder them; so that none must put away their wives but such as are willing to own that their hearts were so hard as to need this permission.

(2.) The account which Moses, in this history, gives of the institution of marriage, affords such a reason against divorce, as amounts to a pro-same conduct is in the man adultery against his wife, which in the woman is adultery against her husband. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 5: 31, 32. Luke 16: 16-18. 1 Cor. 7: 1-9.)

(5.) Hardness of heart.] The original word means an obstinate, untractable disposition.

(6-9.) 'Among the ancients, when persons were newly married, they put a yoke upon their necks, or chains upon their arms, to show that they were to be one, closely united, and pulling equally together in all the concerns of life. A fine allegorical representation of the marriage union is found on an antique gem in the collection of the duke of Marlborough: it describes the marriage of Cupid and Psyche. 1. Both are represented as winged, to show the alacrity with which the husband and wife should help, comfort, and support each other: preventing, as much as possible, the expressing of a wish or want on either side, by fulfilling it before it can be expressed. 2. Both are veiled, to show that modesty is an inseparable attendant on pure matrimonial connections. 3. Hymen, or marriage, goes before them with a lighted torch, leading them by a chain, of which each has hold, to show that they are united together, and are bound to each other, and that they are led to this by the pure flame of love, which at the same instant both enlightens and warms them. 4. This chain is not iron or brass, (to intimate that the marriage union is a state of thralldom or slavery,) but it is a chain of pearls, to show that the union is precious, beautiful, and delightful. 5. They hold a dove, the emblem of conjugal fidelity, which they appear to embrace affectionately, to show that they are faithful to each other not merely through duty, but by affection, and that this fidelity contributes to the happiness of their lives. 6. A winged Cupid, or love, is represented as having gone before them, preparing the nuptial feast, to intimate that active affection or warm and cordial love are to them a continual source of comfort and enjoyment. 7. Another Cupid, or genius of love, comes behind, and places on their heads a basket of ripe fruits, to intimate, that such a union will generally be blessed with children, who will be as pleasing to all their senses, as ripe and delicious fruit are to the smell and taste. 8. The genius of love that follows them, has in hibition of it. So that if the question be, What did Moses command? (v. 3.) it must be answered, 'Though by a temporary proviso he allowed divorce to the Jews, yet, by an eternal reason he forbade it to all the children of Adam and Eve, and that is it which we must abide by.'

Moses tells us, [1.] That God made man male and female, one male, and one female; so that Adam could not put away his wife and take another, for there was no other to take, which was an intimation to all his sons, that they must not. [2.] When this male and this female were, by the ordinance of God, joined together in holy marriage, the law was, That a man must leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; (v. 7.) which intimates not only the nearness of the relation, but the perpetuity of it; he shall so cleave to his wife as not to be separated from her. [3.] The result of the relation is, That, though they are two, yet they are one, they are one flesh, v. 8. The union between them is the most intimate that can be, a sacred thing that must not be violated. [4.] God Himself has joined them together; He has not only, as Creator, fitted them to be comforts and helps meet for each other, but He has, in wisdom and goodness, appointed them, who are thus joined together, to live together in love till death. Marriage is not an invention of men, but a divine institution; therefore it is to be religiously observed, and the more, because it is a figure of the mystical union between Christ and his church.

Now, from all this, He infers that men ought not to put their wives asunder, whom God has put so near to them. The bond which God Himself has tied, is not to be lightly untied. They who are for divorcing their wives for every offence, would do well to consider what would become of them, if God should in like manner deal with them. See Isa. 50:1. Jer. 3:1.

5. Christ's discourse with his disciples, in private, about this matter, v. 10, 11. It was an advantage to them, that they had opportunity of personal converse with Christ, not only about gospel-mysteries, but about moral duties, for their further satisfaction. No more is here related of this private conference, than the law Christ laid down in this case—That it is adultery for a man to put away his wife, and marry another; it is adultery against the wife he puts away, it is a wrong to her, and a breach of his contract with her, v. 11. He adds, If a woman shall put away her husband, that is, elope from him, leave him by consent, and be married to another, she commits adultery, (v. 12.) and it will be no excuse at all for her to say, that it was with the consent of her husband. Wisdom, holiness, and love, reigning in the heart, will make those commands easy, which to the carnal mind may be a heavy yoke.

V. 13-16. It is looked upon as the indication of a kind and tender disposition, to take notice of little children, and this was remarkable in our Lord; which is an encouragement not only to little children to apply themselves to Christ when they are very young, but to grow up people, who are conscious to themselves of weakness, and of being, through manifold infirmities, helpless like little children. Here we have,

I. Little children brought to Christ, v. 13. Their parents, or their conductors, brought them to Him, that He should touch them, in token of his commanding a blessing on them. It doth not appear that they needed any bodily cure, nor were they capable of being taught; but it seems, 1. That they had the care of them were mostly concerned about their souls, which ought to be the principal care of all parents; for that is the principal part, and it is well with them if it be well with their souls. 2. They believed that Christ's blessing would do their souls good; and therefore to Him they bring them, that He might touch them, knowing that He could reach their hearts, when nothing their parents could say to them, or do for them, would. We may present our children to Christ, now that He is in heaven, for even thence He can reach them with his blessing, and therein we may use faith upon the fullness and extent of his grace, the kind intimations He hath always given of favor to the seed of the faithful, the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, and the promise to us and to our children, especially that great promise of pouring his Spirit upon our seed, and his blessing upon our offspring, Isa. 44:3.

II. The disciples rebuked them that brought them; as if they had been sure that they knew their Master's mind in this matter, whereas He had lately cautioned them not to despise the little ones.

III. Christ took it very ill that his disciples should keep them off; When He saw it, He was much displeased, v. 14. 'What do you mean? Will you hinder me from doing good to the rising generation, to the lambs of the flock?' Christ is very angry with his own disciples, if they discountenance any in coming to Him themselves, or in bringing their children to Him. He ordered that they should be brought to Him, and nothing said or done to hinder them; suffer little children, as soon as they are capable, to come to me, to offer up their supplications to me, and to receive instructions from me. Little children are welcome betimes to the throne of grace with their hosannas. He owned them as members of his church, as they had been of the Jewish church. He came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and took this occasion to declare that that kingdom admitted little children to be the subjects of it, and gave them a title to the privileges of subjects. Nay, the kingdom of God is to be kept up by such; they must be taken in when they are little children, that they may be secured to bear the name of Christ. There must be something of the temper and disposition of little children found in all that Christ will own and bless. We must receive the kingdom of God as little children; (v. 15.) that is, We must stand affected to Christ and his grace, as little children do to their parents and teachers. We wings shrivelled up, or the feathers all curled, so as to render them utterly unfit for flight, to intimate, that love is to abide with them, and that there is to be no separation in affection. See the plate in BRYANT'S Analysis of Ancient Mythology.

(12.) Josephus affords a double example of this practice. His first wife left him, and he married another. Her he divorced, after having three children by her, and then married a third.

Though this discourse be originally about divorce; yet it seems plainly to evince, that polygamy must be unlawful under the Christian economy. For, from Christ's saying, "He that putteth away his wife, and marries another, committeth adultery against her;" it clearly follows, that he, who having not put her away, marries another, must be guilty of the same crime; seeing he must have at least the same power to marry another, when the first is put away, as when she is not.

Notes, Matt. 19: 13-15. Luke 15: 15-17. Christ's regard to children, not only must have been exceedingly pleasing to the parents, but the memory of this condescension might make lasting impressions on the children themselves; and the sight must be encouraging to other young persons, who might happen to be present. Nicephorus tells, that the celebrated Ignatius, afterwards bishop of Antioch, was one of these infants. Our Lord might reasonably be the more displeased with the disciples, for endeavoring to prevent their being brought; as He has so lately set a child among them, and insisted on the necessity 'of their being made conformable to it.' Doddridge. The language, in this gospel, is more emphatic than that in Matthew; and it must be obvious, that the exhortations and instructions, which might have been addressed both to the parents and the children, and by the parents to their children, as a subsequent improvement of the transaction, must have been in many respects similar to those, which may be grounded on infant baptism, when duly improved. The passage therefore, though not a direct proof, has surely a favorable aspect towards bringing out infant offering to Christ, seeking his blessing on them, and devoting them to his service, in this sacrament; provided it be done intelligently and uprightly.

(15.) 'We must receive the kingdom as little children; we must stand affected to Christ as little children to their parents. Little children are not guileful and deceitful, but plain and simple; they are strangers to artful disguises; they are not obstinate; they rely on the instructions of their parents. Their anger does not last long. So Christians in malice are children.' 1 Cor. 14:20. Here is therefore a fit and lively emblem of the followers of the Lamb.' J. EDWARDS.

'He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.' What Christian parent does not beseech Him thus to embrace his children in the arms of his mercy, to lay his hands on them and bless them? And is not this the language of parents in presenting their children for baptism, if rightly understood and attended to?

must be inquisitive, as children must learn as children, and in learning must believe. The mind of a child is white paper, you may write upon it what you will; such must our minds be to the pen of the Spirit. Children are under government; so must we be. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? We must receive the kingdom of God as the child Samuel did, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Little children depend upon their parents' wisdom, are carried in their arms, go where they send them, and take what they provide; and thus must we receive the kingdom of God, with an humble resignation of ourselves to Christ, and an easy dependence upon Him both for strength and righteousness, for tuition, provision, and a portion. He received the children, and gave them what was desired; (v. 16.) He took them up in his arms, in token of his affectionate concern; put his hands upon them, as was desired, and blessed them. He outdid the desires of the parents; they begged He would touch them, but He did more. He took them in his arms. Now the scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 40: 11.) He shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom. The time was, when Christ Himself was taken up in old Simeon's arms, Luke 2: 28. And now He took up these children, not complaining of the burthen, (as Moses did, when he was bid to carry Israel, that peevish child, in his bosom, as a nursing father bears the child, Num. 11: 12.) but pleased with it. If we in a right manner bring our children to Christ, He will take them up, not only in the arms of his providence, but in the arms of his grace; (as Ezek. 16: 8.) underneath them are the everlasting arms. He put his hands upon them, denoting the bestowing of his Spirit, (for that is the hand of the Lord,) and his setting them apart for Himself. (3.) He blessed them with spiritual blessings. Our children are happy, if they have but the Mediator's blessing for their portion. It is true we do not read that He baptized these children; baptism was not fully settled as the door of admission into the church, till after Christ's resurrection; but He asserted their visible church-membership, and by another sign bestowed those blessings upon them, which are now appointed to be conveyed and conferred by baptism, the seal of the promise, which is to us and to our children.

V. 17-31. Here is,

I. A hopeful meeting between Christ and a young man; such he is said to be, (Matt. 19: 20-22.) and a ruler; (Luke 18: 18.) a person of quality. Some circumstances here are, which we had not in Matthew, which make his address to Christ very promising.

1. He came running to Christ, an indication of his humility; he laid aside the gravity and grandeur of a ruler, when he came to Christ: thus he manifested his earnestness; he ran, as one in haste, longing to be in conversation with Christ. He had now an opportunity of consulting this great Prophet, in the things that belonged to his peace, and he would not lose the opportunity.

2. He came to Him when He was in the way, in the midst of company: he did not insist upon a private conference with Him by night,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. Our Lord has given his ministers an example of being 'instant in season and out of season,' in 'preaching the Word,' whenever or wherever the people are disposed to hear it; notwithstanding the malice of those who 'watch for their halting.'—We should expect to be frequently proved with 'ensnaring questions' from Pharisees and infidels; and we should study to be expert in answering them pertinently, and in 'the meekness of wisdom.' (Notes, Proph. 26: 4, 5. 1 Pet. 3: 13-16.) In general, our appeal must be to the plain testimony of God's Word: yet in applying texts of Scripture to particular cases, ^a accurate attention to the meaning and design of the sacred writer is absolutely necessary: and many distinctions must be noted, between temporary appointments or allowances, 'because of the hardness of men's hearts,' or with reference to peculiar circumstances; and those truths and precepts, which are of universal obligation. Almost all errors in doctrine and practice have been grounded on wrong conclusions from texts, either misinterpreted, or misapplied. But the 'unprejudiced, who love the truths and ways of God, and depend on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, will be conducted through such difficulties, as are insurmountable to those, who 'lean to their own understandings.'—True religion will teach us our duty in every relation of life, and render us comfortable in ourselves, and blessings to each other: so that even those restrictions, which to carnal men appear intolerable, become pleasant to the consistent Christian; and he considers the liberty for which others contend, as the source of confusion and misery.—Those 'whom God hath joined together,' and taught to be helpers and blessings to each other, as having one inseparable interest here, and as being 'heirs together of the grace of life' (Notes, Eph. 5: 22-33. 1 Pet. 3: 1-7.) if they have children, will bring them, by their united prayers, to Jesus, for his salvation; He will be 'much displeased with all,' who would discourage them in so doing; for all men ought to be 'exhorted to seek his blessing on those with whom they are connected.' (P. O. Matt. 19: 1-15.) Even 'little children should be suffered' and directed to go to the Savior, as soon as they are capable of understanding his words: they should be assured that He will regard their lisping petitions; and all his ministers should copy his condescending regard to the lambs of the flock, the young, the newly awakened, the weak believers, the poor, or the discouraged; that they may be his instruments to them in establishment and comfort. (Notes, Is. 40: 9-11.) While we consider the case of children, and remember that 'of such is the kingdom of God;' let us attend to our Lord's declaration, that 'whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein.' No man of distinguished learning, or abilities, can be a subject of the kingdom of grace here, or of the kingdom of glory hereafter, who will not receive instruction in the simple teachable spirit, with which a child learns the elements of knowledge, from its teacher. (Note, Matt. 11: 27.) 'If any man therefore be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise' unto salvation; and, as scarcely any thing militates so much against this submission of the understanding to the Word of God, as the pride of human wisdom; so not many of the wise and learned, any more than of the rich and noble, have hitherto been found among the followers of Christ. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1: 26-31. 3: 18-23.)

SCOTT.

(16.) 'If Christ embraced them, why should not his church? Why not dedicate them to God by baptism? By sprinkling, washing, or immersion? for we need not dispute about the mode: I confess, it appears to me grossly heathenish, to see parents, who profess to believe that Christ loves children, and among them those whose creed does not prevent them from using infant baptism, depriving their children of an ordinance by which no soul can prove that they cannot be profited; and through an unaccountable bigotry or carelessness, withhold from them the privilege of even a nominal dedication to God.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

We must not deceive ourselves as to the force of this example. We must remember that there were certain conditions connected with the blessing here bestowed. In this case, the children were neither present accidentally, nor introduced in compliance with a formal practice; they were brought to Jesus by persons interested in them; in reliance on his power, in faith of the virtue which might proceed from Him, and be a blessing to these children. When a like faith is shown in a like manner, the conduct of our Lord gives reason to suppose that He will not withhold that blessing. Bp. SUMNER.

Verses 17-31.

(Notes, Matt. 19: 16-30. Luke 18: 18-30.) (17.) Good Master. It is said that the Rabbinists affected this title, which shows the peculiar property of our Lord's answer.

SCOTT.
Some understand by this passage, a denial of supreme divinity by Jesus Christ in Himself. But, if He here denies that He is God, He denies that He is good. Now as we know Christ to be good, the passage proves any thing to this point. It proves that He is God. Ed.

In the account of this instructive history, which we find in these of the evangelists, one circumstance is noted by St. Mark alone. Jesus beholding him, loved him. It seems probable therefore, that where he says of the commandments, Master, all these have I observed from my youth, he did not mean to make a self-righteous boast, but to say that he knew the will of God as contained in the law, and that he had directed his life generally according to that law. Otherwise we should hardly be told that Jesus loved him, except as He loves all mankind:—He would hardly have felt a special interest in him. Bp. SUMNER.

One design of this instructive wisdom with which the Scriptures are written, is found in this: that they show us real characters, characters of men of like passions and circumstances with ourselves. We see how these have acted, and the consequences, and we are enabled to judge with more accuracy and effect than would otherwise be possible, whose example is to be imitated and whose avoided. In this history, for instance, we see a man who refused the advice of the Redeemer, and we see others who did not refuse. Which made the choice of wisdom? Had this young man sold all that he had, and divided it among the poor, and become a disciple of Jesus, his relations and friends would surely have wondered at his folly. We, however, looking back, are enabled to form a more just opinion. He chose to retain his earthly treasure, and to refuse the offer of treasure in heaven. This happened eighteen hundred years ago. What is now become of his great possessions? Can they confer happiness on his soul, or prevent his misery? Could he have kept them eighteen hundred years, it might appear something: it is a long period of time, except when con-

19 Thou knowest the commandments, 'Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, 'Defraud not, Honor thy father and mother.

20 And he answered and said unto him, Master, 'all these have I observed from my youth.

21 Then Jesus, beholding him, 'loved him, and said unto him, 'One thing thou lackest: go thy way, 'sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have 'treasure in heaven: and come, 'take up the cross, and follow me.

22 And he was 'sad at that saying, and went away grieved: 'for he had great possessions.

23 And Jesus 'looked round about, and said unto his disciples, 'How hardly shall they that have riches, 'enter into the kingdom of God!

24 And the disciples were 'astounded at his words. But Jesus as Nio Jemus did, though like him he was a ruler, but when he shall find Him without, will embrace that opportunity of advising with Him, and not be ashamed, Cant. 8: 1.

3. He kneeled to Him, in token of the great veneration he had for Him, as a Teacher come from God, and his earnest desire to be taught by Him. He bowed the knee to Jesus, as one that would not only do obedience to Him, but would yield obedience to Him always; he bowed the knee, as one that meant to bow the soul to Him.

4. His address to Him was serious and weighty: Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? Eternal life was an article of his creed, though then denied by the Sadducees; he thinks it a thing possible, that he may inherit eternal life; he asks, What he shall do now, that he may be happy forever! Most men inquire for good to be had in this world, (Ps. 4: 6.) any good; he asks for good to be done in this world, in order to the enjoyment of the greatest good in the other world; not, Who will make us to see good? But, 'Who will make us to do good?' He inquires for happiness in the way of duty. 'This was a very serious question in itself, about eternal things, and his own concern in those things. Note, Then there begins to be some hope of people, when they begin to inquire solicitously, what they shall do to get to heaven. It was proposed to a Person every way fit to answer it, being Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life, the true way to life, to eternal life; who came from heaven, on purpose, first, to lay open for us, and then to lay open to us, the way to heaven. Note, Those who would know what they shall do to be saved, must apply themselves to Christ; it is peculiar to the Christian religion, both to show eternal life, and to show the way. It was proposed with a good design—to be instructed. We find this same question put by a lawyer, not kneeling, but standing up, (Luke 10: 25.) with a bad design, to quarrel with Him; he tempted Him, saying, Master, what shall I do? It is not so much the good words, as the good intention of them, that Christ looks at.

5. Christ encouraged this address, (1.) By assisting his faith, v. 17. He called Him good Master: Christ would have him mean thereby, that he looked upon Him to be God, since there is none good but one, that is God, who is one, and his name one; Zech. 14: 9. Our English word, God, doubtless hath affinity with good: as the Hebrews name God by his power, Elohim, the strong God; so we by his goodness, the good God. (2.) By directing his practice; (v. 19.) Keep the commandments. He mentions the six commandments of the second table, which prescribe our duty to our neighbor; He inverts the order, putting the seventh commandment before the sixth, to intimate that adultery is a sin no less heinous than murder. The fifth commandment is here put last, as that which should especially be remembered and observed, to keep us to all the rest. Instead of the tenth commandment, Thou shalt not covet, our Savior here puts, Defraud not. 'Thou shalt rest contented with thy own, and not seek to increase it by the diminution of other men's.' It is a rule of justice not to advance ourselves by doing injury to any other.

6. The young man bid fair for heaven, having been free from any open violations of the divine commands. Thus far he was able to say in some measure, (v. 20.) Master, all these have I observed from my youth. He thought he had, and his neighbors thought so. Note, Ignorance of the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law, makes people think themselves better than they are. Paul was alive without the law. But when he saw that to be spiritual, he saw himself to be carnal, Rom. 7: 9, 14. However, he that could say he was free from scandalous sin, went further than many in the way to eternal life. But though we know nothing by ourselves yet are we not thereby justified.

7. Christ had a kindness for him: Jesus beholding him, loved him, v. 21. He was pleased to find that he had lived inoffensively, and pleased to see that he was inquisitive how to live better. Christ particularly loves to see young people, and rich people, asking the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward.

II. Here is a sorrowful parting between Christ and this young man.

1. Christ gave him a command of trial, whether he did in sincerity aim at eternal life: he seems to have his heart much upon it, and, if so, he is what he should be; but has he indeed his heart upon it? Bring him to the touchstone. (1.) Can he find in his heart to part with his riches for the service of Christ? He hath a good estate, and now, shortly, at the founding of the Christian church, necessity will require that those who have lands, sell them, and lay the money at the apostles' feet; Acts 4: 34. After a while, tribulation and persecution will arise, because of the word; and he must be forced to sell his estate, or have it taken from him. Let him know the worst now; if he will not come up to these terms, let him quit his pretensions. 'Sell whatsoever thou hast above what is necessary for thy support,' probably he had no family to provide for; let him therefore be a father to the poor, and make them his heirs. Every man, according to his ability, must relieve the poor, and be content, when there is occasion, to straiten himself to do it. Worldly wealth is given us, not only as maintenance to bear our charges through this world, according to our place in it, but as a talent to be used and employed for the glory of our great Master in the world, who hath so ordered it, that the poor we should have always with us as his receivers. (2.) Can he find in his heart to go through the costliest services he may be called to as a disciple of Christ, and depend upon Him for a recompense in heaven? He asks Christ what he shall do, more than he has done, to obtain eternal life; and Christ puts it to him, whether he has indeed that firm belief of, and that high value for, eternal life, that he seems to have. Doth he really believe there is a treasure in heaven sufficient to make up all he can leave, or lose, or lay out for Christ? Is he willing to deal with Christ upon trust? Can he give Him credit for all he is worth; and be willing to bear a present cross, in expectation of a future crown?

2. (v. 22.) He was sad at that saying; was sorry that he could not be a follower of Christ, upon easier terms than leaving all; that he could not lay hold on eternal life, and keep hold of temporal possessions. But, since he could pared with eternity. But we know that he could not have enjoyed them more than twenty or thirty years, the average of human life. Whereas, had he obeyed the invitation of our LORD, whenever he departed, he would have been "with CHRIST;" he would already have been in the enjoyment of happiness unspeakable, and would possess the sure prospect of still greater happiness. Can we doubt what his choice would be now? Suffer then his experience to determine you.

Ep. SUMNER.

(19.) 'The Jews were not accustomed, in ordinary discourse, or in the commonly published books, to recite the precepts of the decalogue in the very words in which they were expressed, but in other words, or in another order. Nay, from Josephus, it appears they scarcely thought it lawful to do so, at least to the Gentiles.' WESTERN.

Defraud not | This is supposed by some expositors to be here substituted instead of the tenth commandment; yet that is far more extensive in its requirement. (Notes, Ex. 20: 17. Rom. 7: 7. In R.) 'Surely all endeavors to defraud show a very covetous mind: In claiming us against the dictates of our consciences, and to the damage of our precious souls to defraud and er of his right. ... The word ...

'signifies also to detain, and keep back a thing when it is due. ...

'And surely they who desire thus to detain that which belongs to others, and they know they much want, must covet to have at that time what is another's. ... He pays less than he ought, who pays not in due time.' WHITBY. (Notes, Ex. 20: 17. 1 Tim. 6: 6-10, et. 3-10.)

(21.) Loved him | There was an amableness in this young ruler, compared with the base conduct of the scribes, Pharisees, and many others, which excited our Lord's compassion; and, as He was like us in all things, sin excepted, we may suppose that He felt that tender regard for him, which pious ministers do for some in their congregations, who appear amiable, but whom they do not consider at present as truly religious. (21.) Take up thy cross. | (Notes, Matt. 16: 24-23, v. 24. Luke 9: 18-27, v. 23.) 'The cross' is some trial or suffering which might be avoided by turning out of the way of duty, but cannot otherwise: as the cross lay in our Lord's path, and He took it up, can it be, and was called to it, not turning aside because of it. (Marg. Ref. v. 24.) Trust in riches | (Marg. Ref. v. 24-Notes, Job 31: 24-38. Ps. 62: 8-10. 1 Tim. 6: 17-19.) The danger consists not in possessing, but confiding in riches; and the difficulty consists in possessing answered again, and saith unto them, 'Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!

25 It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, 'What then can be saved?

27 And Jesus, looking upon them, saith, 'With men it is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible.

28 Then Peter began to say unto him, 'Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee.

29 And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, 'There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's,

30 But he shall receive an hundred-fold now in this time, houses and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecu-not come up to the terms of discipleship, he was so fair as not to pretend to it; He went away grieved. Here appeared the truth of that, (Matt 6: 24.) Ye cannot serve God and mammon; while he held to mammon, he did in effect despise Christ, as all those do who prefer the world before Him. He bids for what he has a mind for in the market, yet goes away grieved, and leaves it, because he cannot have it at his own price. That which ruined this young man was, he had great possessions; thus the prosperity of fools destroys them, and those who spend their days in wealth, are tempted to say to God, Depart from us; or to their hearts, Depart from God.

III. Here is Christ's discourse with his disciples. We are tempted to wish that Christ had mollified that saying which frightened this young man from following Him, and, by any explanation, taken off the harshness of it: but He knew all men's hearts; He would not court him to be his follower, because he was rich, and a ruler; if he will go, let him go. Christ will keep no man against his will; and therefore we do not find that Christ called him back, but took this occasion to instruct his disciples in two things.

1. The difficulty of the salvation of those who have an abundance; because there are few, who have much to leave, that can be persuaded to leave it for Christ, or to lay it out in doing good.

(1.) Christ asserts this here; He looked about upon his disciples, because He would have them all take notice of what He said, that by it they might have their judgments rightly informed, and their mistakes rectified, concerning worldly wealth; How hardly shall they who have riches enter into the kingdom of God! v. 23. They have many temptations to grapple with, and many difficulties to get over, which lie not in the way of the poor. He calls the disciples children, because as such they should be portioned by Him with better things than this young man left Christ to cleave to; and whereas He had said, How hardly will those that have riches get to heaven! here He tells them, that the danger arose not so much from their having riches, as from the trusting to them, expecting protection, and a portion from them; saying to their gold, what they should say only to God, Thou art my hope. Job 31: 24. They that have such a value as this for the wealth of the world, will never be brought to put a right value upon Christ and his grace. They that have ever so much riches, but do not trust in them, that see the vanity of them, and their insufficiency to make a soul happy, have got over the difficulty, and can easily part with them for Christ; but they that have ever so little, if they set their hearts upon that little, it will keep them from Christ. He enforces this assertion with, (v. 25.) It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man that trusts in riches, or inclines to do so, to enter into the kingdom of God. The disproportion here seems so great, (though the more so, the more it answers the intention,) that some have labored to bring the camel and the eye of the needle a little nearer together. [1.] Some imagine there might be some wicket gate, or door, to Jerusalem, commonly known by the name of the needle's eye, for its straitness, through which a camel could not be got, unless he were unloaded and made to kneel. Gen. 24: 11. So a rich man cannot get to heaven, unless he be willing to part with the burthen of his wealth, and stoop to the duties of a humble religion, and so enter in at the strait gate. Others suggest that the word we translate a camel, sometimes signifies a cable rope which, though not to be got through a needle's eye, yet is of greater affinity to it. A rich man, compared with the poor, is as a cable to a single thread, stronger, but not so pliable, and it will not go through the needle's eye, unless untwisted. So the rich man must be loosed from his riches, and then there is some hope of him, that thread by thread he may be got through the eye of the needle, otherwise he is good for nothing but to cast anchor in the earth.

(2.) This truth surprised the disciples; They were astonished out of measure, and said among themselves, Who then can be saved? They knew what were generally the sentiments of the Jewish teachers—that the Spirit of God chooses to reside upon rich men; nay, they knew what abundance of promises there were in the Old Testament, of temporal good things; they knew likewise that all either are rich or poor would be so, and that they who are rich have so much the larger opportunities of doing good, and therefore were amazed to hear that it should be so hard for rich people to go to heaven.

(3.) Christ reconciled them to it, by referring it to the almighty power of God, to help even rich people over the difficulties that lie in the way of their salvation; (v. 23.) He looked upon them, to engage their attention, and said, 'With men it is impossible; rich people cannot by their own skill or resolution get over these difficulties, but the grace of God can do it, for with Him all things are possible. If the righteous scarcely are saved, much more may we say so of the rich; and therefore, when any get to heaven, they must give all the glory to God, who worketh in them both to will and to do.

2. The greatness of the salvation of those that have but a little of this world, and leave it, Christ speaks of, upon occasion of Peter's mentioning that he and the rest of the disciples had left all to follow Him, v. 28. 'You have done well,' saith Christ, 'and it will prove well for yourselves; you shall be abundantly recompensed, and not only you shall be recompensed, who have left but a little, but those that have ever so much, though it were so much as this young man had, yet they shall have much more than an equivalent. (1.) The loss is supposed to be very great; he specifies, [1.] Worldly wealth; houses are here put first, and lands last. If a man quit his house, which should be for his habitation, and his land, which should be for his maintenance, and so make himself a beggar and outcast, this has been the choice of suffering saints; 'Farewell houses and lands, though ever so desirable, though the inheritance of fathers, for the house from heaven, and the inheritance of saints in light, where are many mansions.' [2.] Dear relations, father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters; in these, as much as in any temporal blessing, the comfort of life is bound up; (without these, the world would be a wilderness;) yet, when we must either forsake these, or Christ, we must remember, that we stand in nearer relation to Christ than to any creature; and therefore, to keep in with Him, we must be content to break with all the world, and say to father and mother, as Levi did, I have not known you. The greatest trial of a good man's constancy is, when his love to Christ comes to stand in competition with a love that is lawful, nay, that is his duty. It is easy to such an one to forsake a lust for Christ, for he hath that within him that rises against it; but to forsake a father, a brother, a wife, for Christ, those whom he knows he must love, is hard.

and not confid in them. (30.) With persecutions. Or, notwithstanding persecutions; nay, in the midst of persecutions; for where tribulation abounded, consolation likewise abounded. The comfort of communion with God, as aided greatly by the communion of the saints, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit, seems especially intended. (Marg. Ref. i-n.—Notes. Rom. 5: 3-5. 1 Cor. 3: 18-23. 2 Cor. 1: 7-9. 2 Cor. 6-6.) The promise indeed cannot be understood literally, but as relating to blessings immensely more than equivalent; among which kind and valuable Christian friends may be numbered.

fold is literally fulfilled: for wherever a Christian travels among Christians, the shelter of their houses, and the product of their lands, are at his service as far as they are requisite. With persecutions.] While they meet with nothing but kindness, from true Christians, they will be afflicted by the enemies of God.

Dr. A. CLARKE. 'There may indeed,' observes Bloomfield, modestly, 'appear some difficulty in this passage; but, were it greater, I would not consent to abandon and cut it out, as some have proposed. In such a case, we should rather commend it to the labors of our successors. How many passages are there, of which, two centuries ago, no tolerable account had been given, which now, by the successful labors of many generations of philologists and theologians, have been completely illustrated

V. 17-31. Whatever increases pride, and attachment to the world, must enhance the difficulty of embracing the Gospel. If it were not the determination of God, that 'no flesh shall glory in his presence,' the case of rulers, scribes, and Pharisees would be more hopeful. Many of them will call Jesus 'Good Master'; seem to have serious thoughts about 'eternal life'; and approve, and even profess to obey, several of the commandments; but they do not understand the holiness of the divine character, the spirituality and extent of the law, the evil and desert of sin, their own guilt and depravity, the nature of salvation, or their need of the Redeemer's righteousness, and the regenerating Spirit. A sharp trial often proves even their moral goodness defective, and to be carnal selfishness in a more decent garb: so that self-denying duties no more suit their love of this present world, than the doctrines of grace their self-complacency. They appear to be sorry, that they cannot reconcile the service of God and mammon, obey Christ and keep the world: but they cannot think of leaving an earthly treasure, which they have in possession, for the hope of a heavenly treasure, by 'taking up the cross and following Christ.' All these evils are enhanced by wealth: few can possess riches, without loving them and trusting in them: and it is extremely difficult to break the strong bands, which hold a carnal mind to large possessions. So that Jesus speaks to us, 'as to children,' when he reminds us, 'How hardly shall

And yet he must do so, rather than deny Christ. Thus great is the loss supposed to be; but it is for Christ's sake, that He may be honored, and the Gospel's, that that may be promoted. It is not the suffering; but the cause, that makes the martyr. And therefore, (2.) The advantage will be great. [1.] They shall receive a hundred-fold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters; not in specie, but that which is equivalent. He shall have abundance of comfort while he lives, sufficient to make up all his losses; his relation to Christ, his communion with his saints, and his title to eternal life, shall be to him brethren and sisters, and houses, and all. God's providence gave Job double to what he had had, but suffering Christians shall have a hundred-fold in the comforts of the Spirit, sweetening their creature comforts. But it is added here in Mark, with persecutions. Even when they are gainers by Christ, let them still expect to be sufferers for Him; and not to be out of the each of persecution, till they come to heaven. Nay, The persecutions seem to come in here among the receptions, in this present time; for unto you it is given, not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his name; yet this is not all, [2.] They shall have eternal life in the world to come. If they receive a hundred-fold in this world, one would think they should not be encouraged to expect more. Yet, as if that were a small matter, they shall have life eternal; which is more than ten thousand-fold, ten thousand times told, for all their losses. But because they talked so much, and really more than became them, of leaving all for Christ, He tells them, though they were first called that there should be disciples called after them, that should be preferred before them; as St. Paul, who was one born out of due time, and yet labored more abundantly than all the rest of the apostles, 1 Cor. 15:10. Then the first were last, and the last first.

V. 32-45. Here is,

I. Christ's prediction of his own sufferings; this string he harped much upon, though in the ears of his disciples it sounded harsh and unpleasant.

1. How bold He was; when they were going up to Jerusalem, Jesus went before them, as the Captain of our salvation, now to be made perfect through sufferings, v. 32. Thus He showed Himself forward to go on with his undertaking, even when He came to the hardest part of it. Now that the time was at hand, He said, Lo, I come; so far was He from drawing back, that now, more than ever, He pressed forward. Jesus went before them, and they were amazed. They began now to consider what imminent danger they ran themselves into, when they went to Jerusalem; how very malicious the sanhedrim was against their Master and them; and they were ready to tremble at the thought of it. Therefore, Christ went before them. 'Come,' saith He, 'surely you will venture where your Master ventures.' Note, When we see ourselves entering upon sufferings, it is encouraging to see our Master go before us. Or, He went before them, and therefore they were amazed, they admired to see with what cheerfulness and alacrity He went on, though He knew He was going on to suffer. Note, Christ's courage and constancy in going on with our salvation, are the wonder of all his disciples.

2. His disciples, as they followed, were afraid; for themselves, as being apprehensive of their own danger; and justly might they be ashamed of their being thus afraid. Their Master's courage should have put spirit into them.

3. To silence their fears, He did not go about to make the matter better than it was, or say that He might escape the storm; but told them again, as often before, the things that should happen to Him. He knew the worst, and therefore went on boldly, and He let them know the worst. Come, be not afraid; for, (1.) There is no remedy, the matter is determined. (2.) It is only the Son of man that shall suffer; their time of suffering was not at hand, He will now provide for their security. (3.) He shall rise again; the issue of his sufferings will be glorious to himself, and advantageous to all that are his, v. 33, 34. The method and particulars of Christ's sufferings are more largely foretold here, than in any other of the predictions—that He shall first be delivered up by Judas to the chief priests and the scribes; that they shall condemn Him to death, but not having power to put Him to death, shall deliver Him to the Gentiles, the Roman powers, and they shall mock Him, and scourge Him, and spit upon Him, and kill Him. Christ had a perfect foresight, not only of his own death, but of all the circumstances of it; yet He thus went forth to meet it.

II. The ambitious request of two of his disciples. This story is much the same here as in Matt. 20:20. Only there they are said to have made their request by their mother, here, themselves; she presented their petition, they assented to it.

Note, 1. As, on the one hand, there are some that do not use, so, on the other hand, there are some that abuse, the encouragements Christ has given us in prayer. He hath said, Ask, and it shall be given you; and it is a commendable faith to ask for great things: but it was a culpable presumption in these disciples to make such a boundless demand upon their Master. We would that thou shouldst do for us whatsoever we shall desire. We had much better leave it to Him to do for us what He sees fit, they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven? And instead of expressing our astonishment, or indulging our speculations, let us learn contentment in a low estate: or if a higher be allotted us, let us watch against confidence in riches, and the love of them, or anything that can be purchased with them. (Note, Prov. 30:7-9.) Let us pray to be enabled to part with every earthly object for Christ's sake; and to use all, which we are allowed to keep, in his service, as faithful stewards. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 16:1-12.) and let us be encouraged to pray for the rich especially, and to employ means for their good, remembering, 'that with God all things are possible.'—But, whatever our circumstances be, we shall be called on to prove our sincerity by renouncing some temporal advantages for Christ's sake. The trial may be sharp, but the recollection of having made the sacrifice will afterwards turn unto us for a testimony: and to encourage us in so doing, we are assured of immense compensation even in this present world, as well as of 'eternal life in that to come.' If we have true faith, we shall be satisfied with this security, and expect the promised blessing; and thus well regulated, holy self-love will be reconciled to self-denial, renunciation of worldly objects, and persecutions for Christ's sake. But such trials lay open men's hearts, and thus the 'first become last, and the last first.' (P. O. Matt. 19:16-30. Luke 18:18-43.) Scott.

Verse 32.

'They were amazed.. afraid.' These words seem to refer to a sort of undefinable awe which the apostles began, they scarcely knew [362]

why, to feel for Jesus, the dignity of whose character they now had estimated more and more highly.

Bloomfield.

35 ¶ And ^a James and John, the sons of Zebedee, ^b come unto him, saying, Master, ^c we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire.

36 And he said unto them, ^d What would ye that I should do for you?

37 They said unto him, Grant unto us that we may ^e sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, ^f in thy glory.

38 But Jesus said unto them, ^g Ye know not what ye ask: can ye ^h drink of the cup that I drink of? and be ⁱ baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?

39 And they say unto him, ^k We can. And Jesus said unto them, ^l Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized:

40 But ^m to sit on my right hand and on my left hand is not mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared.

41 And when the ten heard it, ⁿ they began to be much displeased with James and John.

42 But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, ^o Ye know that they which ^p are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and He will do more than we desire, Eph. 3: 20.

2. We must be cautious how we make general promises. Christ would not engage to do for them whatever they desired, but would know from them what it was they did desire; What would ye that I should do for you? He would have them go on with their suit, that they might be made ashamed of it.

3. Many have been led into a snare by false notions of Christ's kingdom, as if it were like the kingdoms of this world. James and John conclude, if Christ rise again, he must be a king, and if a king, his apostles must be peers, and one of these would willingly be—the first peer of the realm, and the other next him, like Joseph or Daniel.

4. Worldly honor is a glittering thing, with which the eyes of Christ's own disciples have many a time been dazzled. Whereas to be good and their great ones exercise authority upon them.

43 But ^q so shall it not be among you: but ^r whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister:

44 And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all.

45 For even the Son of man ^s came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, ^t and to give his life a ransom for many.

47 And when he heard that it was ^w Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, ^x thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

48 And ^y many charged him that he should hold his peace: ^z but he cried the more a great deal, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

49 And Jesus ^{aa} stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, ^{ab} Be of good comfort, rise; he calleth thee.

50 And he, ^{ac} casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus.

51 And Jesus answered and said unto him, ^{ad} What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I might receive my sight.

52 And Jesus said unto him, ^{ae} Go thy way; ^{af} thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately ^{ag} he received his sight, ^{ah} and followed Jesus in the way.

should be more our care, than to have the pre-eminence.

5. Our weakness and short-sightedness appear as much in our prayers, as in any thing. We cannot order our speech, when we speak to God, by reason of darkness, both concerning Him and concerning ourselves. It is folly to prescribe to God, and wisdom to subscribe.

6. It is the will of Christ that we should prepare for sufferings, and leave it to Him to recompense us for them. He needs not be put in mind, as Ahasuerus did, of the services of his people, nor can he forget their work of faith and labor of love. Our care must be, that we may have wisdom and grace to know how to suffer with Him, and then we may trust Him to provide in the best manner how we shall reign with Him, and what the degrees of our glory shall be.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 32—45. Even disciples are often more disposed to be amazed at our Lord's contempt of the world, and patient endurance of poverty, hardship, and death for them; than to consider Him, as having 'left' them an example that they should follow his steps: and though they do follow Him, even when danger approaches; yet they do it fearfully, and with hesitation. When we consider, that Jesus endured every indignity from priests and scribes, who delivered Him up to the insults of Gentiles, as a condemned malefactor; we cannot expect exemption from reproach, however blameless our conduct may be: but the view of his glorious resurrection and exaltation may encourage our hope of a happy event to all our conflicts. It is greatly to be lamented, that 'honor, glory, and immortality' in a future world, and obscurity and persecution here, are ill suited to the desires of most of those who are called Christians: nay, sanctification must be considerably advanced in us, before we shall be reconciled to them. If Jesus were

Verses 42, 43.

'Ambition, leading to spiritual lordship, is one great cause of murmurings and animosities in religious societies, and has proved the ruin of the most flourishing churches. The words translated exercise lordship and authority, mean tyrannize and exercise arbitrary power over. This was certainly true of the governments in our Lord's time, both in the east and west. Every kind of lordship and spiritual domination over the church of Christ, like that exercised by the church at Rome, is destructive and anti-Christian.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

ready to gratify all our desires, it would soon appear, that we were aspiring to eminence among our brethren; and that we were unwilling to taste of his cup, or have any measure of his baptism, if we could avoid it. We should often ask for 'we know not what,' and be effectually ruined by our prayers. But He loves us more wisely than we love ourselves; and He will give us what is good for us, not what we foolishly hanker after.—We are indeed often keen-sighted in discerning, and severe in reproving, the ambition of our brethren; but prone to fall into the same faults in our competitions with them: yet our Master gently rebukes and corrects us, and gradually represses our foolish desires of pre-eminence. He teaches us to leave lordly authority, and the praise of men, to Gentiles and nominal disciples; and to follow Him, in aspiring after true greatness, by self-abasement, and a readiness to labor in any way, however obscure and disregarded, to the glory of God and the good of men. two blind men, who received sight on this occasion; probably the other was excited to apply to Jesus by Bartimeus's example, and was much less known. Both Matthew and Mark record the miracle, as wrought when Jesus 'went out of Jericho'; but Luke says, it took place, 'when he was come nigh to Jericho,' and he afterwards records an event which took place in that city. (Note, Luke 19: 1—10.) He seems, however, only to mean that the miracle was performed when he was near Jericho; for it is not improbable that Jesus staid some days in that neighborhood; and this occurred, as He went 'out of the city during long time, though perhaps He returned thither again.' Or rather, 'He that would be truly great and chief, must do good to all, stoop to the meanest, and labor in the hardest services. Those not only shall be most honored hereafter, but are most honorable now, who are most useful.' To convince them of this, He sets before them his own example; (v. 45.) He takes upon him the form of a servant, comes not to be ministered to, but to minister. (2.) He becomes obedient to death, to its dominion, for He gives his life a ransom for many; did He die for the benefit of people, and shall not we study to live for their benefit?

V. 46-52. This passage of story agrees with that, Matt. 20: 29, &c. Only that there were told of two blind men; here, and Luke 18: 35, only of one; but if there were two, there was one. This one is named here, being a blind beggar that was much talked of; he was called Bartimeus, that is, the son of Timeus; which, some think, signifies the son of a blind man; he was the blind son of a blind father, which made the case the worse, and the cure the more wonderful, and the more proper to typify the spiritual cures wrought by Christ, on those that not only are born blind, but are born of those that are blind.

I. This blind man sat begging. Note, Those who by the providence of God are unable to live by their own labor, and have not any other way of subsisting, are proper objects of charity; particular care ought to be taken of them.

II. He cried out to Jesus for mercy; Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David. Misery is the object of mercy, his own miserable case he commends to the Son of David, of whom it was foretold, that, when He should come, the eyes of the blind should be opened, Isa. 35: 5. In coming to Christ for help, we should have an eye to Him as the promised Messiah, the Trustee of mercy.

ples. They began to be much displeased, to have indignation about James and John, v. 41. They were angry at them for affecting precedence, not because it did so ill become the disciples of Christ, but because each of them hoped to have it himself. When the Cyrenic trampled on Alexander's carpet, saying—Now I tread on Alexander's pride, he was seasonably checked with—But with greater pride of thine own. So these discovered their own ambition, in their displeasure at the ambition of James and John; and Christ took this occasion to warn them against it, and all their successors in the ministry of the Gospel, v. 42, 43. He called them to Him in a familiar way, to give them an example of condescension, when He was reproving their ambition, and to teach them never to keep their disciples at a distance. He shows them,

1. That dominion was generally abused in the world; (v. 42.) They that seem to rule over the Gentiles, with the name and title of rulers, exercise lordship over them; all they study and aim at, is not so much to protect them, and provide for their welfare, as to exercise authority upon them; they will be obeyed, and have their will in every thing. Their care is, what they shall get by their subjects, to support their own grandeur, not what they shall do for them.

2. That therefore it ought not to be admitted into the church; 'I shall not be so among you; those that shall be put under your charge, must be as sheep under the charge of the shepherd, who is to tend and feed them, and be a servant to them; not as horses under the driver, that works and beats them, and gets his pennyworths out of them. He that affects to be chief, thrusts himself into dignity and dominion, he shall be servant of all, he shall be mean and contemptible in the eyes of the wise and good; he that exalteth himself shall be abased.' Or rather, 'He that would be truly great and chief, must do good to all, stoop to the meanest, and labor in the hardest services. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 46-52. Whilst enlightened believers are admonished daily to behold the glory of their Lord, 'till they are changed into his image; let sinners be exhorted to imitate blind Bartimeus.—As long as men are favored with the use of their eyes, how diligent should they be, in searching the Scriptures, and storing their memories with them; that if visited with blindness, they may have something treasured up, on which to meditate, and with which to compare what they hear. And when the Lord deprives any of the use of one sense, how diligent should they be in improving those which they still enjoy! In these respects, this interesting narrative sets before us an instructive and encouraging example.—If the eyes of men's understandings are not opened to behold Christ and the beauty of holiness, they are shut up under a far more dreadful darkness, and from far more delightful prospects and pleasures, in the spiritual world, than any blind man in respect of the natural. But wherever the Gospel is, or the written Word, Jesus is passing by; and this is the sinner's opportunity. Though he cannot at present understand the doctrine of Christ, or see his glory, yet let him as a perishing sinner cry after Him, 'Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.' And if any

III. Christ encouraged him to hope that he should find mercy; for He stood still, and commanded him to be called. We must never reckon it a hindrance to us, to stand still, when it is to do a good work. Those about him, who discouraged him at first, perhaps now signified to him the gracious call of Christ; 'Be of good comfort, rise, He calls thee; and if He call thee, He will cure thee.' Note, The gracious invitations of Christ are encouragements to hope, that if we come to Him, we shall have what we come for. Let the guilty, the empty, the tempted, the hungry, the naked, he of goor comfort, for He calls them to be pardoned, supplied, succored, to be filled, and to be coter to have all done for them which their case calls for.

IV. The poor man, hereupon, made his way to Christ; He cast away his loose vesture garment, every thing that might be in danger of throwing him down, or hinder him in coming to Christ. Those who would come to Jesus, must cast away the garment of their own sufficiency, strip themselves of all conceit, free themselves from every weight, and the sin that, like long garments, doth most easily beset them, Heb. 12: 1.

V. The particular favor he begged, was, that his eyes might be opened; so that he might be able to work for his living, and be no longer a burthen to others. It is very desirable to be in a capacity of earning our bread; and, where God has given men their limbs and senses, it is a shame to make themselves by their foolishness and slothfulness, in effect, blind and lame.

VI. His eyes were opened; (v. 52.) and two things Mark here adds, which intimate, 1. How Christ made a double favor to him, by putting the honor of it upon his faith; 'Thy faith has made thee whole; faith in Christ as the Son of David, and in his pity and power; not thy importunity, but thy faith, setting Christ on work, or rather Christ setting thy faith on work.' Those supplies are most comfortable, that are fetched in by faith. 2. He made it a double favor to himself, when he had received his sight, he followed Jesus by the way. By this he made it appear that he was thoroughly cured, needed none to lead him; and by this he evidenced the sense he had of Christ's kindness, that, when he had his sight, he made this use of it. It is not enough to come to Christ for spiritual healing, but, when we are healed, we must continue to follow Him; that we may do honor to Him, and receive instruction from Him. Those that have spiritual eye-sight, see that beauty in Christ, that will effectually draw them to run after Him.

CHAP. XI. v. 1-11. We have here the public entry of Christ into Jerusalem, four or five days before his death. He came thus remarkably, 1. To show that He was not afraid of his enemies in Jerusalem. He did not steal into the city, as one that durst not show his

5 And certain of them that stood there said unto them, What do ye loosing the colt?

6 And they said unto them even as Jesus had commanded: and they let them go.

7 And they brought the colt to Jesus, ^dand cast their garments on him; and he sat upon him.

8 And many spread their garments in the way; and others ^ecut down branches off the trees, and strewed them in the way.

10 Blessed be ^fthe kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna ^gin the highest.

11 And ^hJesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when he had looked round about upon all things, and now the even-tide was come, ⁱhe went out unto Bethany, with the twelve.

12 ¶ And ^jon the morrow, when they face; they needed not send spies to search for Him, He comes with observation. This would be an encouragement to his disciples that were timorous at the thought of their enemies' rage; let them see how bravely their Master sets all at defiance. 2. To show that He was not cast down at the thoughts of his approaching sufferings. He came, not only publicly, but cheerfully, and with acclamations of joy. Though He was now but taking the field, and girding on the harness, yet, being fully assured of a complete victory, He thus triumphs as though He had it put off.

I. The outside of this triumph was very mean; He rode upon an ass's colt, which made no figure; and being but a colt, whereon never man sat, we may suppose, was rough and ungovernable, and would disturb and disgrace the solemnity. This colt was borrowed. Christ went upon the water in a borrowed boat, ate the passover in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulchre, and here rode on a borrowed ass. Let not Christians scorn to be beholden one to another, and when need is, to borrow. He had no rich trappings; they threw their clothes upon the colt, and so He sat upon him, v. 7. The persons that attended were mean people; and all the show they could make, was, by spreading their garments in the way, and strewing branches of trees in the way, (v. 8.) as at the feast of tabernacles. All these were marks of his humiliation; even when He would be taken notice of, He would be taken notice of for his meanness; and they are instructions to us, not to mind high things, but to condescend to them of low estate. How ill doth it become Christians to take state, when Christ was so far from affecting it!

II. The inside of this triumph was very great; not only as it was the fulfilling of the scripture, (which is not taken notice of here, as in Matthew,) but as there were several rays of Christ's glory shining forth in the midst of all this meanness. 1. Christ showed his knowledge of things distant, and his power over the wills of men, when He sent his disciples for the colt, v. 1-4. By this it appears that He can do every thing, and no thought can be withholden from Him. 2. He showed his dominion over the creatures in riding on a colt that was never broken. The subjection of the inferior part of the creation to man is spoken of, (Ps. 8: 5, 6.) with application to Christ; (Ps. 8: 5, 6. compared with Heb. 2: 8.) for to Him it is owing, that we have any remaining benefit by the grant God made to man, of a sovereignty in this lower world, Gen. 1: 28. And perhaps Christ, in riding the ass's colt, would give a shadow of his power over the spirit of man, who is born as the wild ass's colt, Job 11: 12. 3. The colt was brought from a place where two ways met, (v. 4.) as if Christ would show that He came to direct those into the right way, who had two ways before them, and were in danger of taking the wrong. 4. Christ received the joyful hosannas of the people; that is, both the joy come they gave Him, and their good wishes to the prosperity of his kingdom, v. 9. God put it into the hearts of these people to cry Hosanna, who were not by art and management brought to it, as those were, who afterward cried, Crucify, crucify. Christ reckons Himself honored by the faith and praises of the multitude, and it is God that brings people to do Him this honor, beyond their own inclinations.

WHITBY.

(1.) They welcomed his person; (v. 9.) Blessed is He that cometh, He, so often promised and expected; He comes in the name of the Lord, as God's Ambassador to the world; Blessed be He; let Him have our applauses and best affections; He is a blessed Savior, and brings blessings to us, and blessed be He that sent Him. Let Him be blessed in the name of the Lord, and let all nations and ages call Him Blessed, think and speak honorably of Him.

(2.) They wished well to his interest, v. 10. They believed that, mean a figure as He made. He had a kingdom, which would shortly be set up in the world, that it was the kingdom of their father David, (the father of his country,) the kingdom promised to him and his seed forever; a kingdom that came in the name of the Lord, by a divine authority. Blessed be this kingdom; let it take place, come in power, and let all opposing rule be put down; let it go on conquering, and to conquer. Hosanna to this kingdom; prosperity, happiness attend it. The proper signification of hosanna is that which we find, Rev. 7: 10. Salvation to our God, that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb; success to religion, both natural and revealed. Hosanna in the highest. Praises be to our God, who is in the highest heavens over all, God, blessed forever; or, Let Him be praised by his angels, that are in the highest heavens, let our hosannas be an echo to his.

Christ, thus attended, thus applauded, came into the city, and went directly to the temple. Here was no banquet of wine prepared for his entertainment, nor the least refreshment; but He immediately applied himself to his work, for that was his meat and drink. He went to the temple, that the scripture might be fulfilled; 'The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, without sending any immediate notice before Him; He shall surprise you with a day of visitation, for He shall be like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap,' Mal. 3: 1-3. He came to the temple, and took a view of the present state of it, v. 11. He looked round about upon all things, but as yet said nothing. He saw many disorders there, but kept silence, Ps. 50: 21. Though He intended to suppress them, He would not on a sudden, lest He should seem to have done it rashly; He let things be as they were for this night, intending the next morning to apply Himself to the necessary reformation. We may be confident that God sees all the wickedness that is in the world, though He do not presently reckon for it, nor cast it out. Christ, having made his remarks upon what He saw in the temple, retired in the evening to a friend's house at Bethany, because there He would be more out of the noise of the town, and out of the way of being suspected, as designing to head a faction.

V. 12-26. Here is, I. Christ's cursing of the fruitless fig tree. He had a convenient resting place at Bethany, and therefore thither He went at resting time; but his work lay at Jerusalem, and thither therefore He returned in the morning; and so intent was He upon his work, that He went out from Bethany fasting. Before He was gone far, He was hungry, (v. 12.) for He was subject to all the sinless infirmities of our nature. Finding himself in want of food, He went to a fig tree, at some distance, which being well adorned with green leaves, He hoped to find enriched with fruit. But He found nothing but leaves;

'By this rural triumph our Savior shows, 1st. That He is the King whom God had promised, and, 2d. That his kingdom is not of this world. In such circumstances, it would have seemed ridiculous in a government to have been afraid of Him. Nor, indeed, do we find Pontius Pilate, who was at this time the Roman governor at Jerusalem, in the least disturbed, though the scribes and Pharisees were much vexed. They had however, more money than to bring this little triumph against Him; though their great charge was that He made Himself King. In order to which, this was the greatest show He ever made.'

He hoped to find some fruit, for the time of gathering in figs, though it was near, was not yet; so that it could not be pretended that it had had fruit, but that it was gathered and gone; for the season had not yet arrived. Or, He found none, for indeed it was not a season of figs, it was no good fig year. But this was worse than any other fig tree, for there was not so much as one fig to be found upon it, though it was so full of leaves. However, Christ was willing to make an example of it, not to the trees, but to the men, of that generation, and therefore cursed it with that curse which is the reverse of the first blessing, Be fruitful; He said unto it, Never let any man eat fruit of thee hereafter forever, p. 14. Sweetness and good fruit are, in Jotham's parable, the honor of the fig tree, (Judg. 9: 11.) and its serviceableness therein to man, preferable to being promoted over the trees; now to be deprived of that, was a grievous curse. This was intended to be a type and figure of the doom passed upon the Jewish church, to which He came, seeking fruit, but found none; (Luke 13: 6, 7.) and though it was not, according to the doom in the parable, immediately cut down, yet blindness and hardness befell them, (Rom. 11: 8, 25.) so that they were henceforth good for nothing. The disciples heard what sentence Christ passed on this tree, and took notice of it. Woes from Christ's mouth are to be observed and kept in mind, as well as blessings.

II. His clearing of the temple of the market people, and of those that made it a thoroughfare. We do not find that Christ met with food elsewhere, when He missed it of the fig tree; but the zeal of God's house so ate Him up, that He came, hungry as He was, to Jerusalem, and to the temple, and began to reform those abuses which the day before He had marked out; to show, that, when the Redeemer came to Zion, his errand was, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob, (Rom. 11: 26.) and that He came not, as He was falsely accused, to destroy the temple, but to purify it, and reduce his church to its primitive rectitude.

1. He cast out the buyers and sellers, overthrow the tables of the money-changers, (threw the money to the ground;) and threw down the seats of them that sold doves. This He did at one having authority, as a Son in his own house. The filth of the daughter of Zion is purged away, not by might, nor by power, but by the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning. And He did it without opposition; for what He did was manifested to be right, even in the consciences of those that had got money by it. Note, It may be some encouragement to zealous reformers, that frequently the purging out of corruptions, and the correcting of abuses, prove an easier piece of work than was apprehended. Prudent attempts sometimes prove successful beyond expectation, and there are not those lions found in the way, that were feared.

2. He would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel, any sort of goods or wares, through the temple, or any of the courts of it, because it was the nearer way, and would save them the labor of going about, v. 16. The Jews owned that it was one of the instances of honor due the temple, not to make the court of the Gentiles, a common passage, or to come into it with any burden.

3. He gave a good reason for this; it was written, My house shall be called of all nations. The house of prayer, v. 17. So it is written, Isa. 56: 7. It shall pass among all people under that character. It shall be the house of prayer to all nations; it was so in the first institution of it; when Solomon dedicated it, it was with an eye to the sons of the strangers, 1 Kings 8: 41. And it was prophesied that it should be yet more so. Christ will have the temple, as a type of the gospel church, to be, (1.) A house of prayer. After He had turned out the oxen and doves, which were for sacrifice, He revived the appointment of it as a house of prayer, to teach us, that, when all sacrifices and offerings should be abolished, the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise should continue forever. (2.) That it should be so to all nations; and not to the Jews only; for whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved, though not of the seed of Jacob. It was therefore insufferable for them to make it a den of thieves, which would prejudice those nations

Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 21: 17—20. (13.) The time, &c. It is evident, that the fruit, on common fig-trees, must have been unfit for food at this early season of the year: for though the fig-tree puts forth its blossom before the leaves; yet the fruit must have been very small at the passover, which is said by the Jewish writers to be five months before the time of ripe figs. (Note, Matt. 24: 32—35, v. 32.) It has been said, that our Lord found only leaves, and no fruit of any kind, and therefore this must have been a barren tree: for if no fruit were at this time set, there could be none that year. But this could be no reason, why He should, when hungry, seek fruit of it to eat; as there could have been none fit for use, however fruitful it might promise to be. The following quotation seems to contain the true solution of the difficulty. "Let it be noted, that St. Mark doth not by these words, "for the time of figs was not yet," assign a reason why our Lord found no figs upon the tree; but why he went to this one tree, which had leaves on it, and so was of that kind of figs, which had always leaves; and why He expected to find fruit on that tree, which upon the ordinary fig-trees abounding there, he could not expect, the time of ordinary figs not being yet. For this kind of fig-tree, being ever green with leaves, hath old and new fruit on it together; the fruit of the year past and present, say the Jewish doctors. Accordingly, Julian the apostate, speaking of the fruit of Damascus, saith, some of them were but of a short duration;—only the fig-tree carries its fruit above a year, and it hangs on with the fruit of the following year." Whitby. (Note, Is. 28: 1-4, v. 4.)—The fig-trees, in England, seem in general to be of this kind, though the first kills their leaves; but the case in Judea was different: so that the time of ripe figs, on the ordinary fig-trees, was not come; but fruit might have been expected on this tree because its leaves showed it to be of the other species. SCOTT.

According to Calmet and John, there were in Judea several kinds of the fig-tree, which bore fruit in different seasons according to their kind. This accounts for the fact, that our Savior looked for fruit, so early as five days before the passover, which was never later than April.

En.

Time of figs. Rather fig-time or fig-harvest—i. e. the time of gathering, after which they were not to be expected.

WESTEEN. CAMPBELL.

"The most delicate kind of figs was ripe in Judea at the beginning of summer. The fig-tree opening its leaves, which do not appear till after the fruit, is spoken of, (Matt. 24: 32) as a sign of summer. Since then a kind of fig was thus early—and fruit always preceded the leaves, and since, harvest time not being yet come, the figs could not have been gathered, our Savior might naturally expect to find them on such a tree. The phrase, for the time of figs was not yet—belongs to the first part of the verse, and is given as the reason of the doubt, in finding any thing thereon, expressed by the words, if haply. There is another transposition of the same kind, (Mark 16: 3, 4) both occasioned, probably, by an accidental interlineation in the original, and a mistake of some early transcriber, who did not bring in the interlined clause exactly in its place."

The words "having leaves" seem to denote something peculiar; as if the other trees thereabout had been without leaves, or, at least, had not such leaves as promised figs. These leaves were not the leaves of the present spring, for these were hardly so much as in being yet. Probably, this tree was of the kind which had figs and leaves together, hanging on it for two or three years, before the fruit grew ripe, and kept its leaves both summer and winter. Mark gives the reason why on that mountain which abounded in fig-trees, He saw but one that had such leaves; "because it was not the usual time of figs," otherwise it might have gathered figs from the trees about Him. The tree (supposed) bore figs such a summer, which hung upon the boughs all the following winter; it bore others also the next summer; and those too hung on the boughs all this winter; the third summer it bore a third degree; and this summer brought those of the first bearing to ripeness; so that it was at no time without the fruit of several years. This disappointment of his reasonable expectations our Lord justly punished, as it were, as an emblem of the punishment to be inflicted on the Jews, for their spiritual barrenness and hypocrisy.

LIGHTFOOT.

Notes, Matt. 21: 12—16.—(16.) Would not suffer, &c. This circumstance is not mentioned by Matthew; and it rather favors the supposition, that Christ purged the temple two days successively, and more completely the second day than before.

SCOTT.

(15.) Money-changers. The half-shekel tax was a tax to be paid every year, by every adult Jew, at the temple. The tax must be paid in Jewish coin. The money-changers were persons who took their seats in the temple, on the fifteenth of the month Adar and after, for the purpose of exchanging Roman and Greek coins, for Jewish half-shekels. The object of the money-changers was personal emolument, contrary to the spirit of the law, Deut. 23: 20, 21. It was for this reason that Jesus drove them from the temple.

JAHN.

"The temple of Jerusalem was the great depository of the worship of God; of the true God. "In Jewry was God known: in Salm was his tabernacle." And here the pretence of the worship of God was kept up. Here was a show of leaves, but no fruit. [And nothing could be more injurious to the divine honor.] Suppose a Gentile, who had learnt from the Jewish Scriptures the being and unity of God who "had joined himself to the Lord to serve Him." Suppose him to have visited Jerusalem, for the purpose of fulfilling the duties of his faith: like the chamberlain of the Ethiopian Candace, (Acts 8: 27.) what a disappointment to his feelings, what a contrast to his expectations would be the sight of this temple, in which the sacrifices which were to be offered on the altar had been made a pretext for buying and selling; for placing there the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves. How disgusting and how injurious to his rising faith it would prove, to find that the business of profit and loss was pursued, and the tumult of worldly transactions continued, even

17 And he taught, saying unto them, 'Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations, The house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves.'

18 And the scribes and chief priests heard it, and sought how they might destroy him: for they feared him, because all the people was astonished at his doctrine.

19 And when even was come, he went out of the city.

[Practical Observations.]

20 ¶ And in the morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots.

21 And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Master, behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is withered away!

22 And Jesus answering, saith unto them, 'Have ye faith in God.'

23 For verily I say unto you, That whatsoever shall say unto against it, whom they should have invited to it. When Christ drove out the buyers and sellers at the beginning of his ministry, He only charged them with making the temple a house of merchandise; (John 2:16.) but now He chargeth them with making it a den of thieves, because since then they had twice gone about to stone Him in the temple, (John 8:59. 10:31.) or because the traders there were notorious for cheating, and imposing upon the ignorance and necessity of the country people, which is no better than thievery. Those that suffer worldly thoughts to lodge within them at their devotions, turn the house of prayer into a house of merchandise; but they that make long prayers, for a pretence to devour widows' houses, turn it into a den of thieves.

4. The scribes and the chief priests hated Him, and hated to be reformed by Him; yet they feared Him, lest He should next overthrow their seats, and expel them, being conscious of profaning and abusing their power. They found that He had a great interest, that all the people were astonished at his doctrine, and that every thing He said was an oracle and a law; and what durst He not attempt, or effect, being thus supported? They therefore sought, not how they might make their peace with Him, but how they might destroy Him. A desperate attempt, which, one would think, they themselves could not but fear was fighting against God. But they are not what they do, to support their own power.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-19. We should learn from our Master to meet sufferings, in a good cause, with alacrity; and to be bold in our profession of the truth, in proportion as its enemies grow virulent. The undeniable proofs of his knowledge of all events, and his influence over all hearts, should inspire us with confidence, and excite us to prompt obedience: for we shall find all his words faithful, and he will carry us through all difficulties in his service.—It is a peculiar honor to be instrumental, in any way, to the display of his glory. His kingdom is not of this world; and therefore its appearance is often mean; and its subjects must not affect worldly grandeur, or be ashamed of appearing poor and despicable: but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, are privileges of more value than all earthly honors and riches. These blessings we should seek with a decided preference, and then aim to communicate them to others: and we ought to welcome all those, who come in the name of the Lord, to promote his kingdom, rejoicing greatly in their success.—While we expect the church to be purged from all abuses, that it may no more be reproached as a den of robbers, (P. O. Rev. 18: 9-19.) but be indeed a house of prayer and spiritual worship, to all nations; rulers and teachers should do what they can to promote the scriptural administration of God's ordinances, the sanctification of his holy day, and faithful preaching; and to maintain a decided distinction between things sacred and secular! All who love and preach the truth, should keep from every appearance of turning their ministry into a lucrative trade!—Alas! the chief priests, and elders should so frequently be the most inveterate opposers of reformation; from a mistaken regard to their own reputation, which in fact they thus destroy! Men of this character set themselves against the truth for fear of its getting ground, when they find the people attentive. Thus they enter on a contest, from which they cannot recede with credit, and which they cannot persist without fatal consequences. Or though they should for a time succeed, they must in the end be crushed by the exalted Redeemer. (P. O. Matt. 21: 12-16, 33-46.)

there, where most particularly the thoughts ought to be carried beyond this world, and lifted above it! We cannot then wonder that the zeal of our Lord was excited; that He saw it a fit opportunity to express vehement indignation against all who showed such a proof of the prevalence of this present world in their hearts beyond the love of God. And all we, see, were so struck with the justice of his feelings, as to offer no opposition to Him.

EP. SUMNER.

(17.) 'The court of the Gentiles, as it is expressed in this passage, was particularly destined for the devout of all nations, who acknowledged the true God, though they had not subjected themselves to the Mosaic law. Justly therefore was the temple styled a house of prayer for all nations.'

VERSES 20-26.

The apostles were exhorted to have 'faith in God,' or, 'the faith of God' (margin), that is, a firm confidence in his power and truth, as enabling them to effect those things which they undertook in his name. This was peculiarly applicable to that faith required in working miracles. 'These were generally introduced by some solemn declaration of what was intended, which was in effect a prediction of immediate success. So Peter says, (Acts, 3: 6.) "In the name of Jesus Christ, rise up, and walk;" and (9: 34.) "Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole." And in pronouncing this, the person speaking pawned all his credit as a messenger from God, and consequently all the honor and usefulness of his future life, on the immediate miraculous energy to attend his words, and to be visibly exerted on his uttering them. Hence it is, that such a firm courageous faith is so often urged on those,

'to whom such miraculous powers were given.' Doddridge. This ought not, however, to be considered, as the exclusive meaning of the exhortation, which should also be kept in mind in all our expectations and prayers, grounded on the promises of God, which will certainly be fulfilled to every believer, in the proper meaning of their word in the due season; and this we ought to expect, notwithstanding all difficulties and apparent improbabilities. (Notes, Jam. 1: 5-8. 1 John 5: 14, 15.) Therefore, whatever we desire, according to the will of God, made known by his precepts and promises, we should when we pray for it confidently hope to receive, and go on with our duty as though we had received it.

Scott.

It is obvious that this promise, in its full and literal sense, was confined to the apostles; confined to the time, which required evident and striking miracles as a testimony to the divinity of Him from whom the power proceeded. John, however, writing fifty years afterwards, when the power of working miracles was gradually declining, likewise speaks of the prayer of faith. The limit to which he confines the power, makes the promise applicable to every age. 'This is the confidence which we have in Him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, He heareth us: [and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him.] 1 John 5: 14. Such a measure of wisdom was given to the apostles, that they could not ask except according to the will of God. Succeeding Christians must limit their petitions to "what may be expedient for them."'

27 ¶ And they come again to Jerusalem: and, as he was walking in the temple, there come to him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, fessing people in the world, should be thus abandoned; they could not imagine how that fig tree should so soon wither away; but this comes of rejecting Christ, and being rejected by Him.

28 And say unto him, 'By what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority to do these things?

2. But even this withered tree was fruitful:

(1.) For Christ teacheth them hence to pray in faith; (v. 22.) Have faith in God. They admired the power of Christ's word; saith Christ, 'a lively faith would put as great a power into your prayers, v. 23, 24. Whosoever shall say to this mountain, of Olives, Be removed, and be cast into the sea; if he has but any word of God, general or particular, to build his faith upon, and if he shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith, according to the warrant he has from what God hath said, shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith.' Through the power of God in Christ, the greatest difficulty shall be got over, and the thing shall be effected.

And therefore, (v. 24.) 'What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye shall receive them; nay, believe that ye do receive them, and He that has power to give them saith, Ye shall have them.' Now this is to be applied, [1.] To that faith of miracles which the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel were endued with, which did wonders in things natural, healing the sick, raising the dead, casting out devils; these were, in effect, the removing of mountains. The apostle speaks of a faith which would do that, and yet might be found where holy love was not, 1 Cor. 13: 2. [2.] It may be applied to that miracle of faith, which all true Christians are endued with, which doeth wonders in things spiritual. It justifies us, (Rom. 5: 1.) and so removes mountains of guilt, and casts them into the depths of the sea, never to rise up in judgment against us, Mic. 7: 19. It purifies the heart, (Acts 15: 9.) and so removes mountains of corruption, and makes them plain before the grace of God, Zech. 4: 7. It is by faith that the world is conquered, Satan's fiery darts quenched, a soul is crucified with Christ, and yet lives; by faith we set the Lord always before us, and see Him that is invisible; and this is to remove mountains, for at the presence of the God of Jacob, the mountains were not only moved, but removed, Ps. 114: 6, 7.

(2.) To this is added here that necessary qualification of the prevailing prayer, that we freely forgive those who have been any way injurious to us, and be in charity with all men; (v. 25, 26.) When ye stand praying, forgive. Note, Standing is no improper posture for prayer; it was generally used among the Jews; hence they called their prayers their standings; when they would say how the world was kept up by prayer, they expressed it thus, The world is upheld by standings. But the primitive Christians generally used the more reverent gesture of kneeling, especially on fast days, though not on Lord's days. When we are at prayer, we must remember to pray for others, particularly for our enemies, and those that have wronged us; now we cannot pray sincerely that God would do them good, if we bear malice to them, and wish them ill. If we have injured others, before we pray, we must go and be reconciled to them, Matt. 5: 23. But if they have injured us, we go a nearer way to work, and must immediately from our hearts forgive them. [1.] Because this is a good step towards obtaining the pardon of our own sins: Forgive, that your Father may forgive you; that is, 'that you may be qualified to receive forgiveness, that He may forgive you without injury to his honor, as it would be, if He should suffer those to have such benefit by his mercy, who are so far from being conformable to the pattern of it.' [2.] Because the want of this is a certain bar to the pardon of our sins; 'If ye do not forgive those who have injured you, if ye hate their persons, bear them a grudge, meditate revenge, and speak ill of them, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.' This ought to be remembered in prayer, because one great errand we have to the throne of grace, is, for the pardon of our sins: and it ought to be our daily care, because prayer is a part of our daily work. Our Savior often insists on this, for it was his great design to engage his disciples to love one another.

V. 27-33. We have here Christ examined by the great sanhedrim concerning his authority; for they claimed a power to call prophets to an account concerning their mission. They came to Him when He was walking in the temple, not for his diversion, but teaching the people, first one company and then another. The Peripatetic philosophers were so called from the custom they had of walking when they taught. The piazzas, in the courts of the temple, were fitted for this purpose. The great men were vexed to see Him followed with attention, and therefore came to Him with some solemnity, and arraigned Him at the bar, with this question, By what authority dost Thou these things? v. 28.

I. They designed hereby to embarrass Him. If they could make it out before the people, that He had not a legal mission, though ever so well qualified, and preaching ever so profitably, they would tell the people that they ought not to hear Him. This they made the last refuge of an obstinate unbelief; because they were resolved not to receive his doctrine, they were resolved to find some flaw in his commission, and will conclude it invalid, if it be not ratified in their court. Thus the Papists resolve their controversy with us very much into the mission of our ministers, and if they overthrow that, they think they have gained their point, though we have the Scripture on our side. But this is indeed a question, which all that act either as magistrates or ministers, ought to be furnished with a good answer to, and often put to themselves, By what authority do I these things? For how can men preach except they be sent? Or how can they act with confidence, or hope of success, except they be authorized? Jer. 33: 32.

II. He effectually embarrassed them, with this question, 'What are your thoughts concerning the baptism of John? Was it from heaven, or of men? By what authority did John preach, baptize, and gather disciples? Answer me, v. 30. Deal fairly and ingenuously, and give a categorical answer, one way or the other.' By the resolving of their question into this, our Savior intimates how near akin his doctrine and baptism were to John's; they had the same original, and the same design and tendency—to introduce the gospel-kingdom. Christ might with better grace put this question mercy; and who cannot be spiritually alive at all, if he is not habitually sensible of this. Therefore he must habitually show mercy and feel compassion.'

Verse 33.

This is the dilemma of the Jews. They dared not deny that John was a prophet. But as John was Christ's forerunner, and spake clearly of Him, they could not acknowledge John as a prophet sent from God, without acknowledging Christ to be the Messiah, according to John's testimony: 'for, to use the words of Doddridge, 'the other question naturally requires to be determined first, and when you think proper to decide that, you may easily perceive that the same answer will serve for both.'

CHAP. XII.

The parable of the vineyard let out to wicked husbandmen, 1-12. Jesus answers the Pharisees and Herodians about paying tribute to Cæsar, 13-17; the Sadducees, concerning the resurrection, 18-27; and a Scribe, concerning the first commandment in the law, 28-34. He denounces the Scribes, whose Son the Messiah was to be, 35-37; warns the people against the ostentation and hypocrisy of the Scribes, 38-40; and commends a poor widow, who had cast two mites into the treasury, 41-44.

AND ^a he began to speak unto them by parables. ^bA certain man ^cplanted a vineyard, ^dand set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the wine-^evat, and built a tower, ^fand let it out to husbandmen, ^gand went into a far country.

⁴ And again he sent unto them another servant: and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled.

to them, because they had sent a committee of their own house to examine John, John 1: 19. 'Now,' saith Christ, 'what was the result of your inquiries concerning him?'

They knew what they thought of this question; they could not but think that John Baptist was a man sent of God. But the difficulty was, what they should say to it now. Men that oblige not themselves to speak as they think, (which is a certain rule,) cannot avoid perplexing themselves.

1. If they own the baptism of John to be from heaven, as really it was, they shame themselves; for Christ will presently turn it upon them, Why did ye not then believe him, and receive his baptism? They could not bear that Christ should say this, but they could bear it that their own consciences should say so, because they had an art of stifling them, and because what conscience said, though it might grate them a little, would not shame them; and then they would do well enough, who looked no further than Saul's care, when he was convicted, Honour me now before this people, 1 Sam. 15: 30.

2. If they say, 'It is of men, he was not sent of God,' they expose themselves; the people will be ready to do them mischief, or at least clamor upon them; for all men counted John that he was a prophet indeed, and therefore could not hear him reflected on. Note, There is a carnal fear, to which not only wicked subjects but wicked rulers are liable, which God makes use of to keep the world in some order, and to suppress violence, that it shall not always grow up into a rod of wickedness. Now by this dilemma, (1.) They were confounded, and forced to a dishonorable retreat; to pretend ignorance—We cannot tell, (and that was mortification enough to proud men,) but really to discover the greatest malice and wilfulness. What Christ did by his wisdom, we must labor to do by our well-doing—put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2: 15. (2.) Christ came off with honor, and justified Himself in refusing to give them an answer to their imperious demand; Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. They did not deserve to be told; for it was plain that they contended not for truth, but victory; nor did He need to tell them; for the works which He did, told them plainly that He had authority from God to do what He did; since no man could do those miracles which He did, unless God were with him. Let them wait but three or four days, and his resurrection shall tell them; for by that He will be declared to be the Son of God with power, as by their rejecting of Him, they will be declared to be the enemies of God.

CHAP. XII. v. 1-12. Christ had formerly in parables showed how He designed to set up the gospel church; now He begins in parables to show how He would lay aside the Jewish church, and build upon its ruins. We may observe here,

1. They that enjoy the privileges of the visible church, have a vineyard let out to them, which is capable of great improvement, and from the occupiers of which rent is justly expected. When God showed his word unto Jacob, his statutes and judgments unto Israel, (Ps. 147: 19.) when He set up his temple among them, and his ordinances, then He let out to them the vineyard he had planted; which He hedged, and in which He built a tower, v. 1. Members of the church are God's tenants, and they have both a good landlord and a good bargain, and may live well upon it, if it be not their own fault.

II. Those to whom God lets out his vineyard, He reminds of his just expectations, v. 2. He was not hasty in his demands, for He did not send till the season.

III. It is sad to think what base usage God's faithful ministers have met with, in all ages, from those that have enjoyed the privileges of the church, and have not brought forth fruit answerable. The Old-Testament prophets were persecuted even by those that went under the name of the Old-Testament church. They ¹ wounded them, and sent them empty away; (v. 3.) ² they wounded them, and sent them away shamefully untreated; (v. 4.) nay, at length, they came to such a pitch of wickedness, that ³ they killed them, v. 5.

IV. It was no wonder, if ⁴ those who abused the prophets, abused Christ Himself. God did at length send them his Son, his well-beloved, it was therefore so much the greater kindness to send Him; as in Jacob to send Joseph to his brethren, Gen. 37: 14. And it might be expected, that Him whom their Master loved, they also should respect and love; (v. 6.) 'They will reverence my Son, and in reverence to Him, will pay their dues. But, instead of reverencing Him, because He was the son and heir, they therefore hated Him, v. 7. Because Christ, in calling to repentance, made his demands with more authority than the prophets, they were the more enraged, and determined to put Him to death, that they might engross all church power to themselves, and that all the respect of the people might be paid to them; 'The inheritance shall be ours, we will be lords and bear the sway.' There is an inheritance, which, if they had duly revered the Son, might have been theirs, a heavenly inheritance; but they slighted that, and would have their inheritance in the pomp and power of his world. So they took Him and killed Him; they had not done it yet, but would do it in a little time; they cast Him out of the vineyard, refused to admit his Gospel, but threw it out with disdain and detestation.

V. For such shameful doings, nothing can be expected but a fearful doom; (v. 9.) What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do?

1. He will come and destroy the husbandmen, whom He would have saved. When they only denied the fruit, He did not restrain upon them for the rent, nor dispossess them for non-payment; but when they killed his servants, and his Son, He determined to destroy them; and this was fulfilled when Jerusalem was laid waste, and the Jewish nation extirpated.

2. He will give the vineyard to others. God will be no loser by any. This was fulfilled in the taking in of the Gentiles, and the abundance of fruit which the Gospel brought forth in all the world, Col. 1: 6. Note, If some, from whom we expected well, prove bad, it doth not follow but that others will be better. Christ encour

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20-33. Many professed Christians and ministers are barren fig-trees, covered with leaves, disappointing those who seek fruit from them; and exposing themselves to the doom of being withered, and remaining to all eternity unfruitful under the curse of the Lord! We should fear this sentence far more than death, and rest in no religion which does not render us 'fruitful in good works.' This will be the sure effect of 'faith in God,' if it is vigorous and lively. Thus our attempts to do good may be rendered more successful than we could have imagined, by a divine blessing on our labors of love: and though we may not possess superior abilities, or influence, we may prevent impiety by the efficacy of fervent, constant prayers, they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some.

6 Having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, 'They will reverence my son.'

7 But those husbandmen said among themselves, 'This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours.'

8 And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard.

9 What shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? 'He will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others.'

10 And 'have ye not read this scripture, 'The Stone which the builders rejected is become the Head of the corner?'

11 This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?

12 And they sought to lay hold on him, but feared the people; for they knew that he had spoken the parable against them; and they left him, and went their way.

raged Himself with this in his undertaking; Though Israel be not gathered to Him, but against Him, yet shall I be glorified. (Isa. 49: 5, 6.) as a Light to lighten the Gentiles.

3. Their opposition to Christ's exaltation shall be no obstruction to it; (v. 10, 11.) The stone which the builders rejected is, notwithstanding, highly advanced as the Head-stone, and as the Corner-stone. God will exalt Christ as his King upon his holy hill of Zion, in spite of their project, who would break his bands asunder. And all the world shall own this to be the Lord's doing, in justice to the Jews, and in compassion to the Gentiles. The exaltation of Christ was the Lord's doing, and it is his doing to exalt Him in our hearts, and to set up his throne there; and if it be done, it cannot but be marvellous in our eyes.

The chief priests and scribes, whose conviction was designed by it, knew He spake this parable against them, v. 12. They could not but see their own faces in the glass of it; and, one would think, it showed them their sin so very heinous, and their ruin so certain and great, that it should have frightened them into a compliance with Christ, should have prevailed to bring them to repentance; at least, to make them desist from their malicious purpose against Him; but, instead of that, (1.) They sought to lay hold on Him, and so fulfil what He had just said, v. 8. (2.) Nothing restrained them from it but the awe they stood in of the people; they did not revere Christ, nor fear God, but were afraid, if they should publicly lay hold on Christ, the people would rise, and rescue Him. (3.) They left Him, and went their way; if they could not do hurt to Him, they resolved that He should not do good to them, and therefore they got out of the hearing of his powerful preaching, lest they should be converted and healed. Note, If men's prejudices be not conquered by the truth, they are but confirmed; and if the corruptions of the heart be not subdued by faithful reproofs, they are but exasperated. If the Gospel be not a savor of life unto life, it will be a savor of death unto death.

V. 13-17. When the enemies of Christ, who thirsted for his blood, could not find occasion against Him, from what He said against them, they tried to ensnare Him, by putting questions to Him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12. We are accountable to God for peculiar advantages afforded us, that we may be fruitful in good works. Our Lord, the Proprietor of the vineyard, waits for the fruits till 'the due season'; but He will by no means excuse any who do not render them; and as we in this land are more favored than the Jews of old, our doom will be more dreadful if we are unfruitful. The Scriptures and faithful preachers are demands on us, to render the due revenue of glory to God, by holiness of life; and the coming of the beloved Son, and all his miracles and doctrines, were intended to supply us with motives, and assistance for fruitfulness. But proud men, though the professed worshippers of God, will be exceedingly offended at these truths; and many rulers and teachers, to whom the vineyard has been intrusted, have often been ready to insult, and murder the servants of God, who came to demand the fruits in their Master's name; nay, they have not shown reverence even to his Son, but have acted with decided enmity against Him, for the sake of their own secular interest! Thus have 'the builders rejected the Corner-stone' to their own ruin; and in securing present advantages, have come short of 'the inheritance of the saints in light,' and sunk to misery and despair. Let sinners beware of this spirit: and remember, that if they are offended by the faithful reproofs of ministers, they would have been far more irritated by those of Christ, had they lived when He was on earth; and would have concurred with his crucifiers. If provoked to revile or ridicule their teachers, they would easily be tempted to ill treat them, were the power in their hands; for when this disposition prevails, the more plain and convincing the truth, the greater rage it excites! Let us then regard and profit by the instructions of the servants, as a proof that we really 'revere the beloved Son' of God; and let us seek grace from Him, that we 'may be filled with all the fruits of righteousness which are brought forth by Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God,' that our privileges may be continued to us, and our souls perfected, when wicked professors of Christianity shall be destroyed forever. (P. O. Matt. 21: 33-46. 23:34-39. Luke 20:1-18.)

(Notes, Matt. 22: 15-22. Luke 20: 19-26.) 'Judas of Galilee' (Acts 5: 37.) 'saith Josephus, solicited the people to rebellion, telling them that God was to be their only Prince, and no mortal to be acknowledged such; that a tax paid by them, was a manifest profanation of servitude; and that it was their duty to vindicate their liberty. By which means he raised a great sedition among the Jews, and was 'cause of innumerable mischiefs to the nation. Of this sect it was;

14 And when they were come, they say unto him, 'Master, we know that thou art true, and 'carest for no man; for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: 'Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?

Veres 18—27. (Notes, Matt. 22: 23—33; Luke 20: 27—38.) The circumstances of the case are more particularly related here, than in Matthew: but the concluding words, 'Ye therefore do greatly err,' as a strong protest against the Sadducees, is the most remarkable addition. Where the narrative in Mark seems most entirely a repetition of that in Matthew; comparing them will fully show, that Mark did not copy Matthew. — Indeed the difference of style in the evangelists, is much more conspicuous in the original than in any translation.

(18.) 'The Sadducees took their name from Saduc, who taught that God was not to be served from mercenary principles, from hope of reward or fear of punishment. His followers interpreted this as a denial of the future state. The story which they mention seems to have been a kind of common-place objection, as we meet with it in the old Jewish writers.'

The clear perception and unreserved confession by the scribe, of a "truth so often concealed, appeared to indicate that "honest and good heart" which "having heard the word, keeps it," and might therefore be permitted to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God: might be led onward to a fuller and more complete acquaintance with God through the Son. For it is this knowledge, the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, which brings forth the fruit of life eternal, all the heart, all the mind, all the strength, to unite in love with Him. Love exercised towards ourselves, is of all things the most likely to produce a return of love. We have indeed the strongest reason to love God. He gave this great and wonderful evidence of His love for us, that he "sent

29 And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, "Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord :

30 And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment.

31 And the second is like, namely this, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.

32 And the scribe said unto him, Well, Master, thou hast said the truth : "for there is one God ; and there is none other but He :

33 And to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbor as himself, "is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

34 And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. "And no man after that durst ask him any question.

[Practical Observations.]

35 ¶ And Jesus answered and said, "while he taught in the temple, "How say the

1. That the great commandment which includes all is, the "of loving God with all our hearts ; (1.) Who a this is the commanding principle in the soul, there is a disposition to every other duty. Love is the leading affection of the soul ; the love of God is the leading grace in the renewed soul. (2.) Where this is not, nothing good is done, or done aright, or done long. Loving God with all our heart, will effectually take us off from all rivals with Him in our souls, and will engage us to every thing by which He may be honored, and pleased ; and no commandment will be grievous where this principle has the ascendancy. In Mark, our Savior prefixes to this command the great doctrinal truth upon which it is built ; (v. 29.) Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord ; if we firmly believe this, it will follow, that we shall love Him with all our heart. He is Jehovah, who has all perfection ; He is our God, to whom we stand related and obliged, and therefore we ought to love Him, and set our affections on Him ; He is one Lord, and therefore must be loved with our whole heart ; He has the sole right to us, and therefore ought to have sole possession. If He be one, our hearts must be one with Him, and since there is no God besides, no rival must be admitted with Him upon the throne.

2. The second great commandment is to love our neighbor, as truly and sincerely as ourselves, and in the same instances ; and we must show it by doing as we would be done by. As we must therefore love God better than ourselves, because He is infinitely better than we, and must love Him with all our heart, because He is one Lord, and there is no other like Him ; so we must love our neighbor as ourselves, because He is of the same nature with ourselves ; of one society, that of the world of mankind ; and if a fellow Christian, and of the same sacred society, the obligation is the stronger. Has not one God created us ? Mal. 2: 10. Has not one Christ redeemed us ? Well might Christ say, There is no other commandment greater than these ; for in these, all the law is fulfilled, and if we make conscience of obedience to these, all other obedience will follow of course.

III. The scribe, 1. Commends Christ's decision of this question ; Well, Master, Thou hast said the truth. Christ's assertions needed not the scribe's attestations ; but this scribe, being a man in authority, thought it would put some reputation upon what Christ said, to commend it ; and it shall be brought in evidence against those who persecuted Christ, that even a scribe of their own confessed that He said the truth. We must subscribe to Christ's sayings, and set to our seal that they are true. 2. He comments upon it. Christ had quoted that great doctrine, That the Lord our God is one Lord ; and this he not only assented to, but added, 'There is none other but He ; and therefore we must have no other God.' This excludes all rivals. Christ had laid down that great law, of loving God with all our heart ; and this also He explains—that it is loving Him with the understanding. Our love to God, as it must be an entire, so it must be an intelligent love ; we must love Him out of the whole understanding ; our rational powers and faculties must lead out the affections of our souls toward God. Christ had said, 'To love God and our neighbor is the greatest commandment of all ;' 'Yea,' saith the scribe, 'it is better than all whole-burnt-offerings and sacrifices, more acceptable to God, and will turn to a better account to ourselves.' There were those who held, that the law of sacrifices was the greatest commandment of all ; but this scribe readily agreed with our Savior in this—that the law of love to God and our neighbor is greater than that of sacrifice, even than those whole-burnt-offerings, which were intended purely for the honor of God.

IV. Christ approved of what he said, and encouraged him to proceed. 1. He owned that he understood well, as far as he went. Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, and was the more pleased with it, because He had of late met with so many that answered indiscreetly. He answered as a rational, intelligent man, whose reason was not blinded, whose judgment was not biassed, and whose forethought was not fettered, by the prejudices of other scribes. He answered as one that allowed himself liberty and leisure, and as one that had considered. 2. He owned that he stood fair for a further advance ; 'Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, the kingdom of grace and glory ; thou art in a likely way to be a Christian. For the doctrine of Christ insists most upon these things, and is designed to bring thee to this.' Note, There is hope of those who make a good use of the light they have, that by the grace of God they will be led to clearer discoveries. What became of this scribe we are not told, but would willingly hope that, having been told by Him so much to his satisfaction, what was the great commandment of the law, he proceeded to inquire of Him, or his apostles, what was the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23-34. By pertinent replies to one description of opposers, we may sometimes obtain a more candid hearing from others, who have hitherto been equally estranged from the truth : for we shall find some more teachable than the rest of those to whom they belong. A careful attention to the Scriptures will convince us of the importance of a deep acquaintance with the spirituality, extent, and excellency of the moral law. While, therefore, many are disputing about nice distinctions, or external observances, we should hearken to the sacred Word, which requires us to 'love the Lord our God with all our heart, our soul, and mind, and strength,' and 'to love our neighbor as ourselves.' Did we thus love the Lord, did we thus supremely delight in his excellencies ; did we wholly desire his favor as our felicity ; were we thus filled with gratitude for his goodness to us ; and were we actuated by zeal for his glory, as in reason we ought to be, what spiritual worshippers and devoted servants of God should we be ! in what should we differ from the inhabitants of heaven ? (Note, Ex. 20: 2.) Did we 'love our neighbors as ourselves,' seek their good, and value their happiness equally with our own ; what perfect justice, truth, purity, goodness, compassion, and peace would every where prevail ! (Notes, and P. O. Luke 10: 25-37.) This indeed would be far 'more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.' But because our character and conduct have been, and are, (as far as left to ourselves,) the reverse of this temper and behavior ; therefore we are condemned sinners, need repentance, mercy, and the Savior's righteousness and sacrifice ; we cannot be justified by works of the law, but must be 'saved by grace, through faith,' and 'by the sanctification of his Spirit unto obedience.' Yet, if really interested in this redemption, we shall love these great commandments, as our rule of duty ; and daily mourn because our obedience to them is so defective. A just apprehension of the law, is generally the first step towards a spiritual understanding of the Gospel, and a proper improvement of its truths and though many, who contend for free salvation, might have been ready to reprobate the conviction and confession of this scribe, as self-righteous, we may easily perceive, that our Lord, with perfect wisdom and propriety, allowed him to have 'answered discreetly,' and as a man of reflection. We learn from our Lord's example to commend what is right, and encourage what is hopeful, in those who differ from us, and are ever judged against us.

scribes that Christ is the Son of David?

36 For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool."

37 David therefore himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he then his Son? And the common people heard him gladly.

38 ¶ And he said unto them in his doctrine, "Beware of the scribes," which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the market-places,

39 And the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts;

40 Which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers; these shall receive greater damnation.

41 ¶ And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much.

42 And there came a certain poor widow; and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing.

43 And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury:

44 For all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living.

great commandment of the Gospel. Yet, if he went no further, we are not to think it strange; for there are many who are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither. One would think this should have invited many to consult Him; but it had a contrary effect; No man, after that, durst ask Him any question; every thing He said was spoken with such authority and majesty, that every one stood in awe of Him; those that desired to learn were ashamed, and those that designed to avail, were afraid to ask.

V. 35—40. Here,

1. Christ shows the people how defective the scribes were in their preaching, and how unable to solve the difficulties in the Old Testament, which they undertook to expound. Of this He gives an instance, which is not so fully related here as in Matthew. Christ was teaching in the temple: many things He said which were not written; but notice is taken of this, because it will stir us up to inquire concerning Christ, and to inquire of Him.

1. They told the people that the Messiah was to be the Son of David, (v. 35.) and they were right; He was not only to descend from him, but to fill his throne; (Luke 1: 32.) The Lord God shall give Him the throne of his father David. The Scripture said it often, but the people took it from the scribes; whereas the truths of God should rather be quoted from our Bibles than from our ministers; The waters are sweetest when drawn immediately from their source.

2. Yet they could not tell them how it was proper for David, in the spirit of prophecy, to call Him Lord, Ps. 110: 1. They had taught the people that concerning the Messiah, which would be for the honor of their nation—that He should be a branch of their royal family; but they had not taken care to teach them that which was for the honor of the Messiah Himself—that He should be the Son of God, and, as such, and not otherwise, David's Lord. Thus they held the truth in unrighteousness, and were partial in the Gospel, as well as in the law of the Old Testament. They were able to say it, and prove it—that Christ was to be David's Son; but if any should object, How then doth David himself call Him Lord? they could not avoid the objection. Note, Those are unworthy to sit in Moses' seat, who are not in some measure able to defend the truth when they have preached it, and to convince gainsayers.

Now, to have their ignorance thus exposed, no doubt incensed the scribes against Christ; but the common people heard Him gladly, v. 37. What He preached was affecting; and though it reflected upon the scribes, it was instructive to them; they had never heard such preaching. Probably there was something commanding and charming in his voice and way of delivery, which recommended Him to the common people; for we do not find that any were wrought upon to believe in Him, and to follow Him, but He was to them as a lovely song of one that could play well on an instru-

For the same purpose that our LORD noticed this poor to lose, that He may approve and favor now, and give abundant recompense hereafter. V. 35-44. With a proper view of the holy law, a serious recollection of its awful sanction, and a believing prospect of the day of judgment, we shall be prepared to attend to what the Scriptures declare, concerning the person and offices of Christ; and be led unreservedly to confess Him to be 'our Lord and our God'; as 'the End of the law for righteousness to every one who believeth' (Note, Rom. 10: 1-4.) to obey Him as our exalted Redeemer; and to rejoice that He is seated at the right hand of the Father, to perfect his people's salvation, and to 'put all enemies under his feet.'—If 'the common people hear these things gladly,' while the distinguished in rank and authority oppose them, we may congratulate the former, however despised, and pity the latter, in the midst of their splendor; for what will rich, or long clothing, salutations in public assemblies, or 'chief rooms in synagogues,' however now valued, avail men, when the Judge shall prove their devotion to have been the mask of impiety, and sentence them to receive the greater condemnation? Let us not forget that Jesus still watches the treasury, to observe how much, and from what motives, men contribute to it. He approves of liberality in the rich; who ought to appropriate a far greater proportion of their wealth to works of piety and charity, than they generally, or indeed almost ever do; but it should be in simplicity, works of piety very far go together; where God is honored by our ship, it is proper He should be honored by the relief of his poor; and we often find prayers and alms in conjunction, as Acts 20: 1, 2. It is good to erect public receptacles of charity for directing private hands in giving to the poor; nay, it is good for those who are of ability to have funds of their own, to lay by, as God has prospered them, (1 Cor. 16: 2) that they may have something ready to give when an object of charity offers itself, which is before dedicated to such uses.

II. Jesus Christ had an eye upon it; He sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into it; not grudging either that He had none to cast in, or had not the disposal of that which was cast in, but observing what was cast in. Note, Our Lord Jesus takes notice of what we contribute to pious and charitable uses; whether we give liberally or sparingly; whether cheerfully or with reluctance; nay, He looks at the heart; observes what principles we act upon, and what our views are, in giving, and whether we do it as unto the Lord, or only to be seen of men.

III. He saw many that were rich, cast in much; and it was a good sight to see rich people charitable, to see many so, and to see them cast in much. Note, Those that are rich, ought to give richly; if God give abundantly to us, He expects we should give abundantly to the poor; and it is not enough for those that are rich, to say, that they give as much as others who perhaps have much less of the world, but they must give in proportion to their estates; and if objects of charity do not present themselves, they ought to inquire them out, and to devise liberal things.

IV. There was a poor widow that cast in two mites, which make a farthing; (v. 42.) and Jesus commended her: called his disciples, and bid them take notice of it; (v. 43.) told them that she could ill spare what she gave, she had scarcely enough for herself; it was all she had to live upon that day, and perhaps a great part of what she had earned the day before; and as He knew she did it from a truly charitable disposition, He reckoned it more than all that the rich people threw in; for they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want, v. 44. Many would have been ready to censure this poor widow, and to think she did ill; why should she give to others, when she had little enough for herself? Charity begins at home; or, if she would give it, why did she not bestow it upon some poor body that she knew? What occasion was there for bringing it to the treasury? be disposed of by the chief priests, who, we have reason to fear, were partial in the disposal of it? It is so rare a thing to find any that would not blame this widow, that we cannot expect to find any that will imitate her; and yet our Savior commends her, and therefore we are sure that she did well and wisely. If Christ saith, Well done, no matter who saith otherwise; and we must hence learn, 1. That giving alms, is an excellent thing, and highly pleasing to Jesus; and if we be humble and sincere in it, He will accept it, though in some circumstances there may not be all the discretion in the world. 2. Those that have but a little ought to give alms out of their little. Those that live by their labor, must give to those that need, Eph. 4: 28. 3. It is very good for us to deny ourselves, that we may give more to the poor; to deny ourselves even conveniences, for the sake of charity. We should in many cases pinch ourselves, that we may supply the necessities of others; this is loving our neighbors as ourselves. 4. Public charities should be encouraged, for they bring upon a nation public blessings; and though there may be some mismanagement of them, yet that is not a good reason why we should not give to them. 5. Though we can give but a little in charity, yet if it be according to our ability, and be given with an upright heart, it shall be accepted of Christ, who requires according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not. Two mites shall be brought to account, if given in a right manner, as if it had been two pounds. 6. It is much to the praise of charity, when we give not only to our power, but beyond our power, as the Macedonian churches, whose deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality; 2. Cor. 8: 2, 3. When we provide for others out of our own necessary provision; as the widow of Sarepta for Elijah, and Christ for his five thousand guests, and trust God to provide for us some other way, this is thankworthy.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1-4. I. Many of Christ's disciples idolize things that look great, and have been long looked upon as sacred. They had heard Christ complain of those who had made the temple a den of thieves; and yet, when He quitted it, for the wickedness that remained in it, they count Him to be as much in love as they were, with the stately structure and adorning of it. One of them said to Him.

and not from pride and ostentation. And though their contributions should be encouraged; they ought not to be flattered into an opinion, that they are meritorious, or that they can atone for licentiousness, and prove a substitute for holiness. Nor should the poor on any account be discouraged in their humble endeavors to show 'the sincerity of their love,' as their small oblations, spared from their scanty supply, and from such expenses as are generally deemed needful, are more honorable to God, more evident effects of the power of divine grace, and expressions of patient self-denial and reliance on Providence; as well as, by comparison, a far greater bounty, than the applauded generosity of their superiors. Let then the poor contribute their mite to the relief of the distressed, or to promote the cause of God: and though men may deride or censure them, and those who excite and encourage them to such contributions, the Lord will graciously recompense them. They will not be impoverished by what they lend to Him; and their believing, though feeble efforts to honor Him, and do good to their brethren, will be mentioned with commendation in that day, when the splendid actions of unbelievers will be exposed to deserved contempt, as the result of pride, ostentation, enmity to God, and dislike to his humbling salvation. NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1. 'This temple, called the temple of Herod, in distinction from that of Solomon, and from the second temple, which was Zerubbabel's, was one hundred cubits long, seventy bread and one hundred high. The porch was raised to the height of one hundred cubits, and was extended fifteen cubits, each side of the rest of the building. It was built of white marble exquisitely wrought, and with stones of large dimensions, some of them twenty-five cubits long, eight high and twelve thick. These are the stones to which the disciple refers, "see what manner of stones," &c.

"The appearance of the temple," says Josephus, "was such as to strike the mind and astonish the sight. For it was on every side covered with solid plates of gold, which reflected, when the sun rose upon it, such a strong and dazzling effulgence, that the eye could not sustain its radiance. At a distance, it appeared a huge mountain covered with snow. For where the plates of gold were not, it was extremely white and glistening."

Verse 2.

"The splendid building has forever passed away! According to our Lord's prediction, "that there should not be left one stone upon another," it was completely demolished by the Roman soldiers under Titus, A. D. 70"

CALMET.

5 And Jesus answering them, began to say, ⁶ Take heed lest any man deceive you:

⁶ For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; ⁷ and shall deceive you.

7 And when ye shall hear of wars, and rumors of wars, be ye not troubled: for such things ⁸ must needs be; but the end shall not be yet.

8 For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles: ⁹ these are the beginnings of sorrows.

9 But take heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten: and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for my sake, ¹⁰ for a testimony against them.

10 And the gospel must first be published among all nations.

11 But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye preme-

'Look, Master, what manner of stones, and what buildings are here, v. 1. We never saw the like in Galilee; do not leave this fine place.'

II. Christ does not value external pomp, where there is not real purity; 'Seest thou these great buildings,' (saith Christ,) 'and admirest thou them? I tell thee, The time is at hand when there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down,' v. 2. The sumptuousness of the fabric shall be no security, nor move any compassion in Jesus towards it. He looks with pity upon the ruin of souls, and weeps over them, for on them He has put great value; but we do not find Him look with any pity upon the ruin of a magnificent house, when He is driven out of it by sin. With what little concern doth He say, Not one stone shall be left on another! Much of the strength of the temple lay in the largeness of the stones, and if these be thrown down, no footstep, or remembrance of it will remain. While any part remained standing, there might be some hope of the repair of it; but what hope is there, when not one stone is left upon another?

III. How natural it is to us to desire to know things to come, and the times of them; we are apt to be more inquisitive about that than about our duty. His disciples knew not how to digest this doctrine of the ruin of the temple, which they thought must be their Master's royal palace, and in which they expected their preferment, and posts of honor; and therefore they were in pain till they learned more of Him concerning this matter. As He was returning to Bethany, therefore, He sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple, where He had a full view of it; and there four of them agreed to ask Him privately, what He meant by the destroying of the temple, which they understood no more than they did the predictions of his own death, so inconsistent with their scheme. Probably, though these four proposed the question, yet Christ's discourse, in answer to it, was in the hearing of the rest of the disciples, yet privately, that is, apart from the multitude. Their inquiry is, When shall these things be? They will not seem to question, whether they shall be or no, (for their Master has said that they shall), but are willing to hope it is a great way off. Yet they ask not precisely the day and year, (therein they were modest,) but say, 'Tell us what shall be the sign, when all these things shall be fulfilled?' What presages shall there be of their approach?

V. 6-13. Our Lord replies to their question, not so much to satisfy their curiosity, as to direct their consciences; leaves them still in the dark concerning the times and seasons, which the Father has kept in his own power; but gives them cautions with reference to the events that would now shortly come to pass.

I. They must take heed that they be not deceived by impostors that would now shortly arise; (v. 5, 6.) 'Take heed lest any man deceive you, lest, having found the true Messiah, you lose Him again in the crowd of pretenders, or embrace others in rivalry with Him. Many shall come in my name, (not in the name of Jesus), but saying, I am Christ, and so claiming the dignities to which I only am entitled.' After the Jews had rejected the true Christ, they were imposed upon, by many false Christs, but never before; those false Christs deceived many. Therefore take heed lest they deceive you. Note, When many are deceived, we should look to ourselves.

II. They must take heed that they be not disturbed, at the noise of wars, which they should be alarmed with, v. 7, 8. Sin introduced wars; they come from men's avarice. But at some times the nations are more distracted and wasted with wars than at other times; so I shall be now; Christ was born into the world when there was a general peace, but soon after He went out of the world there were general wars; Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. And what will become of them then who are to preach the gospel to every nation? Amidst the clash of arms, the voice of law is not heard. 'But be not troubled at it.' 1. 'Let it be no surprise to you; such things must needs be, for God has appointed them, in order to accomplish his purposes, and by their wars, God will punish the wickedness of the Jews.' 2. 'Let it be no terror to you; as if your interest were in danger of being overthrown, or your work obstructed; you have no concern in them, and therefore need not be apprehensive of damage.' Note, Those that despise the smiles of the world, may despise its frowns. If we seek not to rise with them that rise in the world, why should we dread falling with them that fall? 3. 'Let it not be looked upon as an omen of the approaching period of the world, for the end is not yet, v. 7. Think not that these wars will bring the world to a period; there are intermediate counsels to be fulfilled, which are to prepare you for the end, but not to hasten it out of due time.' 4. 'Let it not be looked upon, as if God had no more arrows in his quiver, ordained against the persecutors; be not troubled at the wars you shall hear of; they are but the beginnings of sorrows, and therefore, instead of being disturbed at them, you ought to prepare for worse; for there shall also be earthquakes in divers places, which shall bury multitudes in the ruins of their own houses; there shall be famines, by which many of the poor shall perish for want of bread, and troubles and commotions; so that there shall be no peace to him that goes out, or comes in. The world shall be full of troubles, but be not ye troubled; without are fightings, within are fears, but fear not ye their fear.' Note, The disciples of Christ, if it be not their own fault, may enjoy a holy serenity of mind, when all about them is in the greatest disorder.

III. They must take heed that they be not drawn away from their duty by the sufferings they should meet with for Christ's sake. Again, He saith, 'Take heed to yourselves, v. 9. Though you may escape the sword of war, because you interest not yourselves in the public quarrels, yet you will be exposed to the sword of justice more than others, and the part is the content with one another will unite against you. Take heed, therefore, lest you deceive yourselves with the hopes of such a temporal kingdom as you have been dreaming of, when it is through many tribulations that you must enter into the kingdom of God. Take heed lest you needlessly expose yourselves to trouble, and pull it upon your own head. Take heed what you say and do, for you will have many eyes upon you.'

The trouble which they must expect is, (1.) They shall be hated of all men. The thoughts of being hated are grievous to a tender spirit, and the fruits of that hatred must needs be a constant vexation; those that are malicious will be mischievous. It was not for any thing amiss in them, or by them, that they were hated, but for Christ's name's sake, because they were called by his name, preached his name, and wrought miracles in his name. The world hated them, because He loved them.

(2.) Their own relations shall betray them, as

Verse 6.

'Josephus' history of the Jewish war is the best commentary on this chapter. It is a wonderful instance of the care of Providence for the Christian church, it at an eye-witness, of so great credit, should be preserved, to give a collection of important facts illustrative of this noble prophecy in almost every particular.

'According to Josephus, few if any of these signs failed of coming to pass before the dreadful destruction of Jerusalem.'

'There were wars of the Jews among themselves, and of the Romans with the Syrians, Samaritans, and other neighboring nations. There were earthquakes in Apamea, Laodicea and Campania. The famine, in the days of Claudius, is mentioned in Acts 11: 28, as well as recorded in history. (Sueton. Claud. cap. 18; and Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. II. cap. 8.) and many perished by it in Judea.'

'According to the same historian, there were also fearful signs and apparitions, in the air and heavens.'

POOLS. Verse 6. The tumults which were excited by the persecuting Jews against the apostles, and by the seditious, against the Romans, which brought dire calamities on immense numbers, and at length ruin on the nation seem especially intended.

SCOTT. Verses 9-13. (9.) Shall deliver, &c.' 'All this was exactly accomplished: for Peter and John were called before the sanhedrim; (Acts 4: 6-7) dilate; but whatsoever ^u shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, ^v but the Holy Ghost.

12 Now ^a the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death.

13 And ^a ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: ^b but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.

14 ¶ But when ye shall see ^c the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing ^d where it ought not, ^e (let him that readeth understand,) ^f then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains:

15 And ^g let him that is on the house-top not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house:

16 And let him that is in the field, not turn back again for to take up his garment.

17 But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days!

18 And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter.

19 For ⁱ in those days shall be affliction, such whom they were most nearly allied, and on whom they depended for protection; 'They shall betray you, shall inform against you, and be your persecutors.' If a father has a child that is a Christian, he will become void of natural affection, it will be swallowed up in bigotry, and he shall betray his own child to the persecutors, as if he were a worshipper of other gods, Deut. 13: 6.

(3.) Church-rulers shall inflict their censures; 'You shall be delivered up to the great sanhedrim at Jerusalem, and to the inferior courts in other cities, and shall be beaten in the synagogues, with forty stripes at a time, as offenders against the law which was read in the synagogue.' It is no new thing for the church's artillery, through the treachery of its officers, to be turned against its best friends.

(4.) Governors and kings shall use their power against them. Because the Jews have not power to put them to death, they shall incense the Roman powers against them, as they did Herod against James and Peter; and they shall cause you to be put to death, as enemies to the empire.

2. What they shall have to comfort themselves with, in the midst of these great troubles.

(1.) That the work they were called to should be carried on notwithstanding. 'The Gospel shall, for all this, be published among all nations, and, before the destruction of Jerusalem, the sound of it shall go forth into all the earth; not only through the nation of the Jews, but to all the nations of the earth.' It is comfort to those who suffer for the Gospel, that, though they may be crushed, the Gospel cannot; it shall carry the day.

(2.) Their sufferings, instead of obstructing their work, should forward it. 'Your being brought before governors and kings shall be for a testimony to them; shall give you an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to those before whom you are brought as criminals, to whom otherwise you could not have access.' Thus St. Paul's being brought before Felix and Festus, and Agrippa, and Nero, was a testimony to them concerning Christ and his gospel. Or, It shall be for a testimony against them, against both the judges and the persecutors, who pursue those with the utmost rage that are innocent, excellent persons. The Gospel is a testimony to us concerning Christ and heaven; if we receive it, it will be a testimony for us, it will justify and save us; if not, it will be a testimony against us in the great day.

(3.) When brought before kings and governors for Christ's sake, they should have special assistance from heaven, 'Take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak; be not solicitous how to address great men, so as to obtain their favor; your cause is just and glorious, and needs not premeditated harangues; but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, put into your minds, that speak ye, and fear not the success of it, for it is not ye that speak, by the strength of your own wisdom, but the Holy Ghost.' Note, Those whom Christ calls to be advocates for Him, shall be furnished with full instructions; and when we are engaged in the service of Christ, we may depend upon the aids of the Spirit of Christ.

(4.) Heaven at last would make amends for all; 'You will meet with great hardship in your way, but have a good heart, your warfare will be accomplished, your testimony finished, and he that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved.' v. 13. Perseverance gains the crown. The promise is more than a deliverance from evil, it is everlasting blessedness, which shall be an abundant recompense for all their services and sufferings

V. 14—23. The Jews, in rebelling against the Romans, and in persecuting the Christians, were hastening their own ruin upon space, setting both God and man against them; see 1 Thes. 2: 16. That ruin came upon them within less than forty years after this.

It is here foretold concerning it, 1. That the Roman armies should invest Jerusalem, the holy city. These were the abominations of desolation, which the Jews did abominate, and by which they should be made desolate. The country of the enemy is called the land which thou abhorrest, Isa. 7: 16. It was an abomination, because it brought with it nothing but desolation. They had rejected Christ as an abomination, who would have been their Salvation; and now God brought upon them an abomination that would be their desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, (ch. 9: 27.) as that by which this sacrifice and offering should be made to cease. This army stood where it ought not, in and about the holy city, which the heathen ought not to have approached, nor would have been suffered to do, if Jerusalem had not first profaned the crown of their holiness. This the church complains of, Lam. 1: 10. The heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom thou didst command that they should not enter into the congregation; but sin made the breach, and the abomination of desolation broke in, and stood where it ought not. Now, let him that readeth this, understand it, and endeavor to take it right. Prophecies should not be too plain, and yet intelligible to those that search them; and they are best understood by comparing them first with one another, and at last with the event.

2. That when the Roman army should come there would be no safety but by quitting the country, with all possible expedition; it will be in vain to fight, the enemies will be too hard for them; in vain to abscond, the enemies will find them out; and in vain to capitulate, the enemies will give them no quarter; a man cannot have so much as his life given him for a prey, but by fleeing to the mountains out of Judea; and let him take the first alarm. If he be on the house-top, and spies them coming, let him not go down, to take any thing out of the house, losing time, more precious than his best goods, which will but encumber his flight. If he be in the field, and there discover the approach of the enemy, let him get away as he is, and not turn back again, to take up his garment, v. 16. If he can save his life, let him, though he can save nothing else, be thankful to God, that, though cut short, he is not cut off.

3. It would go very hard at that time with mothers; (v. 17.) 'Woe to them that are with child, that dare not go into strange places, nor make haste, as others can. And woe to them that give suck, that know not how either to leave their infants behind them, or to carry them with them.' The time may often be, when the greatest comforts may prove the greatest burthens. It would likewise be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee in the winter, (v. 18.) when the weather was bad, the roads scarcely passable, especially in those mountains to which they must flee. If trouble must come, we may desire and pray that, if it be God's will, the circumstances of it may be so ordered as to mitigate the trouble; and when things are bad, we ought to consider they might have been worse. It is bad to be forced to flee, but worse if in the winter.

4. Throughout all the country of the Jews, there should be such desolation as could not be paralleled in any history; (v. 19.) In these days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of time; that is, of the creation which

24 ¶ But ⁱⁿ those

God created, for time and the creation are of equal date, unto this day, neither shall be to the end of time; such a complication of miseries, and of such continuance. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans was terrible, but this exceeded it. It threatened a universal slaughter of the Jews; so barbarously did they devour one another, and the Romans devour them all, that, if their wars had continued a little longer, no flesh, not one Jew could have been left alive; but in the midst of wrath, God remembered mercy; and, (1) Shortened the days; He let fall this controversy before He had made a full end. As a church and nation, the ruin was complete, but particular persons had their lives given them by the storm's subsiding when it did. (2) For the elect's sake, those days were shortened; many fared the better for the sake of the few that believed in Christ. There was a promise, that a remnant should be saved, (Isa. 10: 22.) and that God would not, for his servants' sakes, destroy them all; (Isa. 65: 8.) these promises must be fulfilled. God's own elect cry day and night to him, and their prayers must be answered, Luke 18: 7.

II. Directions are given to the disciples for the safety of their lives; 'When you see the country invaded, flatter not yourselves that the enemy will retire, or that you may be able to resist them; but, without further delay, flee to the mountains, v. 14. Meddle not with strife that belongs not to you; let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth; go out of the ship when you see it sinking, that you die not the death of the uncircumcised in heart.'

They must provide for the safety of their souls; 'Seducers will be busy at that time; they love to fish in troubled waters, you must then double your guard; if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or Lo, he is there, you know He is in heaven, and will come again, at the end of time, to judge the world; therefore believe them not; having received Christ, be not drawn into the snares of antichrist; for false Christs and false prophets shall arise,' v. 22. When the gospel-kingdom was setting up, Satan mustered all his force, and made use of all his wiles; and God permitted it, for the trial of the sincerity of some, the discovery of the hypocrisy of others, and the confusion of those who rejected Christ. False Christs shall rise, and false prophets shall preach them up; or such as set up for prophets, and undertake to foretell things, and they shall show signs and lying wonders; so early did the mystery of iniquity begin to work, 2 Thess. 2: 7. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; so plausible shall their pretences be, and so industrious to impose upon people, that they shall draw away many that were zealous professors of religion, many that were likely to have persevered; for nothing will be effectual to secure men but that foundation of God which stands immovable. The Lord knows them that are his, who shall be preserved when the faith of some is overthrown, 2 Tim. 2: 19. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; but it is not possible to seduce them; the election shall obtain, whoever are blinded, Rom. 11: 7. But, in consideration hereof, let the disciples be cautious whom they give credit to; (v. 23.) Take ye heed. Christ knew that they were of the elect, who could not be seduced, yet He said to them, Take heed. An assurance of persevering, and cautions against apostasy, consist with each other. Though Christ said to them, Take heed, it doth not therefore follow, that their perseverance was doubtful, for they were kept by the power of God; and though their perseverance was secured, yet it doth not therefore follow, that this caution was needless, because they must be kept in the use of proper means. God will keep them, but they must keep themselves. 'I have foretold you all things; that, being forewarned, you may be fore-armed; I have foretold all things which you needed to have foretold, and therefore take heed of hearkening to such as pretend to be prophets, and to foretell more than I have foretold.' The sufficiency of the Scripture is a good argument against listening to such as pretend to inspiration.

V. 24-27. These verses seem to point at Christ's coming, to judge the world; the disciples, in their question, had confounded the de-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-23. When we behold magnificent cities and stately palaces or temples, we should recollect how soon they will come to nothing, through the sin of man; that we may be reminded, how necessary it is to have a permanent mansion in heaven, and to be prepared for it by sanctification sought in the persevering use of all 'the means of grace.'—If we duly consider how soon all temporal things will pass like a vision, our desires after wealth and prosperity will abate: and we shall be less disquieted, on our own account, when we hear of wars, earthquakes, famines, and other dreadful judgments; however we may be concerned for the sufferers. Such reflections will reconcile us to contempt and persecution: but they will render us also more careful, that 'no man deceive us,' or draw us into error, to prevent our being partakers of Christ, and the blessings of the Gospel. Indeed we cannot profess and adorn his holy doctrine without experiencing the world's hatred and scorn: but, if we be wearied by trivial difficulties, what should we be, if delivered up to councils and rulers, and treated with rage and cruelty; or if betrayed by near relations to death for adherence to the truth? (Note, Jer. 12: 5, 6.)—When the hatred of men, and the fear of hardship cause us to shrink or complain, we should remember, that 'he that continueth unto the end, the same shall be saved;' but 'if any man draw back, the Lord will have no pleasure in him.' We should take comfort under trials for the sake of Jesus, by hoping that our testimony to his truth, and meekness under the cross, may be of use, even to persecutors or revilers; and assuredly our 'night afflictions, and but for a moment, will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' Should any of us be called to appear before princes in so good a cause, we ought not to be anxious about 'what we should speak,' or to 'premeditate,' in a disquieting manner; for, in such extraordinary cases, we may expect that the Spirit of God will teach us to plead the cause of truth with propriety and energy.—The enmity and pride of man's heart, when inflamed by bigotry and furious zeal, produce fatal effects: this should put us upon our guard, and instruct us to pray for the Spirit of wisdom and love to dwell in our hearts, and to mortify our depraved propensities, even in our religious pursuits and controversies.—Indeed, when we consider, that brethren, and even parents and children, are capable of betraying, and murdering each other; and that atrocious abominations are often established even in the very sanctuary. (Notes and P. O. Ez. 8:) we shall see cause to flee without delay to Christ, from our own sins, and those of others, and to renounce every earthly object, to secure the salvation of our souls. We should also deem every thing an evil, and pray against it as such, which tends to retard our course to heaven: for every unbeliever will soon be overtaken with such misery, as has never been witnessed on earth, 'from the beginning of the creation.' (P. O. Matt. 24: 1-28. Luke 21: 1-19.)

Days shortened for the elect's sake. 'Mr. Reading understands this of the preservation of the Christians at Pella, whose safety, he supposes, depended upon the shortening of the siege.'

(20.) The elect's sake, whom he hath chosen. The Christians, who fled out of Judea when these calamities began, cannot here be meant; as the continuance of these desolating judgments on the Jews, had no tendency to extirpate the Christians. That chosen seed, therefore, which was to arise out of the remnant of the Jews, in after ages, is evidently intended. (Notes, Is. 6: 13. 65: 8-10. Matt. 24: 21, 22.)

cy. His rebellion was suppressed, by Adrian, with great slaughter, and occasioned the final expulsion of the Jews from Judea, A. D. 135.'

'Josephus,' after describing some of these sights, (see note Luke 21: 7-11) says, 'For years before the war, one Jesus began at the feast of the tabernacles to cry, "A voice against Jerusalem and the temple, a voice against all the people, Woe, woe unto them!" and he continued crying thus about seven years.' These troubles and sights Tacitus thus epitomizes: 'Armies seemed to meet in the clouds. Weapons were there seen glittering: the temple seemed to be in flame, with fire issuing from the clouds, and a divine voice was heard, that the Deity was 'quitting the place; and a great motion, as of his departing. Whitby Josephus was a Jew, who never embraced Christianity, and Tacitus a learned Gentile, who hated and vilified it.

days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light;

25 And the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.

26 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and glory.

27 And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven.

28 Now learn a parable of the fig tree: When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near:

29 So ye, in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors.

30 Verily I say unto you, All this generation shall not pass, till all these things be done.

31 Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away.

32 But of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man, not the angels which are in heaven, neistruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, (Matt. 24: 3.) as if the temple must needs stand as long as the world stands; this mistake Christ rectifies, and shows that the end of the world in those days, and the day of judgment, shall be after that tribulation, and not co-incidental with it. Let those who live to see the Jewish nation destroyed, take heed of thinking that, because the Son of man doth not visibly come in the clouds then, He will never so come; He will come after that. Here He foretells,

1. The final dissolution of the present frame of the world; even of that part of it which seems least liable to change, the upper, the purer and more refined part; The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall no more give her light; for they shall be quite outshone by the glory of the Son of man, Isa. 24: 23. The stars of heaven, that from the beginning had kept their place and motion, shall fall as leaves; and the powers that are in heaven, the fixed stars, shall be shaken.

2. The visible appearance of the Lord Jesus, to whom the judgment of that day shall be committed; (v. 26.) Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds. Probably He will come over that very place where He sat when He said this; for the clouds are in the lower region of the air. He shall come with great power and glory, such as will be suited to the errand on which He comes. Every eye shall see Him.

3. The gathering together of all the elect to Him; (v. 27.) He shall send his angels, and gather together his elect to meet Him in the air, 1 Thess. 4: 17. They shall be fetched from one end of the world to the other, so that none shall be missing, from the part of the earth most remote from the place where Christ's tribunal shall be set, and shall be brought to the uttermost part of heaven; so sure, swift, easy, shall their conveyance be, that none of them shall miscarry, though brought from the uttermost part of the earth one way, to the uttermost part of the heaven another way. A faithful Israelite shall be carried safely, though from the utmost border of the land of bondage, to the utmost border of the land of promise.

Y. 28—37. The application:
I. 'As to the destruction of Jerusalem, expect it to come very shortly; as when the branch of the fig tree becomes soft, and the leaves sprout forth, ye expect that summer will come shortly, v. 28. When second causes begin to work, ye expect their effects in their proper time. So when ye see the Jewish nation embroiled in wars distracted by false Christs and prophets, and drawing upon them the displeasure of the Romans, especially when ye see them persecuting you for your Master's sake, and so filling up the measure of their iniquity, then say that their ruin is nigh, even at the door, and provide for yourselves accordingly.' The disciples themselves were indeed all of them, except John, taken away from the evil to come, but the next generation, whom they were to train up, would live to see it; and by these instructions which Christ left behind Him would be kept from sharing in it; This generation, now rising up, shall not all die before all these things come to pass, relating to Jerusalem, and they shall begin shortly. As this destruction is near, so it is sure. The decree is gone forth, it is a consumption determined, Dan. 9: 27. Christ doth not speak these things merely to frighten them; they are the declarations of God's fixed purpose; Heaven and earth shall pass away, at the end of time; but my words shall not pass away, (v. 31.) not one of these predictions shall fail of a punctual accomplishment.

II. 'As to the end of the world, do not inquire when it will come, for it is not a question to be asked, for of what day, and that hour, knoweth no man; it is at a great distance, the time is fixed in the counsel of God, but is not revealed either to men on earth, or angels in heaven; the angels shall have timely notice to prepare, and it shall be published to the children of men, with sound of trumpet; but, at present, men and angels are kept in the dark concerning the precise time of it, that they may both attend to their proper services.' But it follows, neither the Son; but is there any thing which the Son is ignorant of? We read indeed of a book which was sealed, till the Lamb opened the seals; but did not He know what was in it, before the seals were opened? Was not He privy to the writing of it? There were those, in the primitive times, who taught from this text, that there were some things that Christ, as man, was ignorant of; and from thence were called Agnostæ; they said, 'It was no more absurd to say so, than to say that his human soul suffered grief and fear;' and many of the (24.) 'The words, those days, refer the events here described in their primary import to the destruction of Jerusalem. Sun shall be darkened.] It was customary with the prophets, and is still with eastern writers, to describe the utter ruin of kingdoms, not only by universal darkness, but also, by such strong figures as those here used. Compare Isa. 13: 10. 34: 4, 10. 60: 20. Jer. 15: 9. Joel 2: 30, 31. 35: 15. Ezek. 32: 7, 8. and Amos 8: 9. Sudden and irresistible destruction is expressed often by God's coming in the clouds. Ps. 18: 9. Isa. 19: 1. and elsewhere; though I think the celestial appearances, described by Josephus, lead us into the exactest interpretation of this text.

(27.) Send his angels.] 'When Jerusalem shall be reduced to ashes, then shall the Son of man send his ministers, of several nations, from the four corners of heaven, so that God shall not want a church, though the ancient Jewish church be cast off. Lightfoot.'

Verse 32.

The Son, &c.] The precise season, either of the day of judgment, or of the destruction of Jerusalem, was no part of the revelation which the incarnate Son of God had received to communicate to his church: it was not revealed to his human nature, by the union of the Holy Spirit. But we cannot understand many things, which relate to the mysterious union of his divine and human nature, and should not further presume to pry into them.—'The Son' is here considered as the 'Prophet sent into the world, to reveal the Father's will; and therefore as 'delivering to the world, not what the Logos knew or taught, but what the Spirit of God revealed to Him. (John 3: 34, 35. 5: 20. 12: 49. 14: 10.) Whitby.—'This He speaks in his human nature, and in his prophetic capacity. This point was not made known to Him by the Spirit, nor was He commissioned to reveal it.' Ep. Porteus. (Note. Rev. 1: 1—4, v. 1, 2.)

SCOTT.
'The union of Divine nature with human, in the person of Messiah, does not involve the communication of omniscience to Christ's human mind, any more than omnipresence to his human body. It seems a reasonable opinion, that the communication of supernatural knowledge to the human mind of Jesus Christ was made, as occasions were seen by Divine wisdom, to require. In various passages, we find things affirmed of the Messiah, which can belong only to his superior nature; it is not then extraordinary, if we find that asserted of Him here, which can attach only to his dependent and limited capacity.' J. P. SMITH.

All the difficulty, in the above passage, seems to arise from a backwardness to admit that Jesus Christ was really a man in all respects except sin, like his brethren, and that in this man dwelt all the Fullness of the GODHEAD. 'If He was a man, then was He frail, dependent, ignorant. He must acquire knowledge, somewhat like other men—grow in wisdom, as well as in stature. It only appears then that there were some things which the INDWELLING GOD did not communicate to the man Christ Jesus. Nor is this more unreasonable than the fact, that the lower nature of man, which he holds in common with the brute, does not take cognizance of all the thoughts and emotions of his higher nature, the indwelling soul.

Ed.

'To preclude the curiosity of men and engage their vigilance, Christ is pleased to tell them that neither man nor angels, nor the Son of man, hath God ordered to know the seasons.'

HAMMOND.

'The turn of the sentence would imply, that that day and hour were actually unknown to the Son. But "He and his Father are one." He was with God in the beginning, and was God.' We cannot, therefore, suppose that He was not partaker of the Father's counsels, either as to the destruction of Jerusalem, or the end of the world. And it is hard to understand, how the Son, coming in the flesh, should divest Himself of knowledge which He possessed as God, in the same way as, confessedly, He divested Himself of immortality. It would be strange, however, if there were not difficulties in a case so mysterious as the union of the divine and human nature in a person of CHRIST.

qualify you for it, for ye know not when the time is; and you are concerned to be ready for that every day, which may come any day.' This He illustrates, in the close, by a parable.

1. Our Master is gone away, and left us something in trust, which we must give account of, v. 34. He is as a man taking a far journey; for He is to be gone a great while, has left his house on earth, and his servants in their orthodox fathers approved of this. Some say that Christ spake this in a way of prudential economy, to divert the disciples from further inquiry: but to this one of the ancients answers, It is not fit to speak too nicely in this matter. 'It is certain (saith Tillotson) that Christ, as God, could not be ignorant of any thing; but the divine wisdom did communicate itself to his human soul according to the divine pleasure, so that his human nature might sometimes not know some things; therefore Christ is said to grow in wisdom, (Luke 2: 52.) which He could not be said to do, if the human nature of Christ did necessarily know all things by virtue of its union with the divinity.' Dr. Lightfoot explains it thus: Christ calls himself the Son, as Messiah. Now the Messiah, as such, was the Father's servant, (Isa. 42: 1.) sent and deputed by Him, and, as such, He refers himself often to his Father's will and command, and owns He did nothing of Himself; (John 5: 19.) in like manner He might be said to know nothing of Himself. The revelation of Jesus Christ was what God gave unto Him, Rev. 1: 1. He thinks, therefore, that we are to distinguish between those perfections which resulted from the union between the divine and human nature, and those which flowed from the anointing of the Spirit; from the former flowed the infinite dignity of his person, and his freedom from sin; but from the latter flowed his power of working miracles, and his foreknowledge of things to come. What therefore (saith he) was to be revealed by Him to his church, He was pleased to take; not from the union of the human nature with the divine, but from the revelation of the Spirit, by which He yet knew not this, but the Father only knows it; that is, God only, the Deity; for (as Tillotson explains it) it is not used here personally, in distinction from the Son and the Holy Ghost, but as the Father is, The Fountain of Deity.

III. 'As to both, your duty is to watch and pray. Therefore the time is kept secret, that you might stand always upon your guard; (v. 33.) Take ye heed of every thing that would indispose you for your Master's coming, and perplex you; watch for his coming, that it may not at any time surprise you, and pray for grace to offices, given authority to some, who are to be overseers, and work to others, who are laborers. They that have authority had work assigned them, for those that have the greatest power have the most business; and to them I whom He gave work. He gave some sort of authority, to do that work. And when He took his last leave, He appointed the porter to be ready to open to Him at his return; and in the mean time to take care to whom he opened his gates not to thieves and robbers, but only to his Master's friends. Thus our Lord when He ascended on high, left something for all his servants to do, expecting they should all do Him service in his absence, and be ready to receive Him at his return. All are appointed to work, and some authorized to rule.

2. We ought to be always upon our watch, in expectation of his return, v. 35: 37. (1.) Our Lord will come, and will come as the Master of the house, to take account of his servants, of their work, and of the improvement they have made. (2.) We know not just at what precise time the Master of the house will come: at even, or nine at night; or it may be at midnight, or at cock-crowing, (at three in the morning,) or, perhaps, not till six. And He has very wisely kept us at uncertainty, that we might be always ready. This is applicable to his coming to us, in particular, at our death, as well as to the general judgment. Our present life is a dark night, compared with the other life; we know not in which watch of the night our Master will come, whether in youth, middle age, or old age; but, as soon as we are born, we begin to die, and therefore, as soon as we are capable of expecting any thing, we must expect death. (3.) Our great care must be, that, whenever our Lord comes, we be not secure in ourselves, off our guard, indulging in ease and sloth, mindless of our work and duty, and thoughtless of our Lord's coming; ready to say, He will not come, and unwary to meet Him. (4.) His coming will be sudden; it will be a great surprise and terror to those that are careless and asleep; it will come upon them as a thief in the night. (5.) It is therefore the duty of all Christ's disciples, to watch; and 'What I say unto you four, (v. 3.) I say unto all the twelve, or rather to you twelve, I say unto all my followers; what I say to you of this generation, I say to all that shall believe in me, through your word, in every age. Watch, expect my second coming, prepare for it, that you may be found in peace, without spot, and blameless.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24-37. In all things we ought to remember the Savior's words: for as sure as the predictions, which related to Jerusalem and the temple, were exactly accomplished, so will all things come to pass, which are written concerning the eternal happiness of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked. Ere long, 'heaven and earth shall pass away,' and all the things which we hold will be dissolved; 'but the words of Christ shall not pass away.' A firm belief of his truth will be our only preservative against seducers, and our sure support under those trials, which occasion the ruin of all, 'but the elect whom God hath chosen.' At length, we shall see 'the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory,' and then his people will be gathered from among the wicked into his kingdom. Instead, therefore, of curiously inquiring into 'the secret things which belong to the Lord,' let us carefully improve the revelation of his will, by 'giving diligence to make our calling and election sure.' (Notes, 2 Pet. 1: 5-11.) We know that the hour of our death cannot be very distant: our Lord, though not present to our sight, beholds our whole conduct, and will shortly come to call us to an account. To some he intrusts authority to preach, to preside in his church, and to be his porters for the admission of proper persons into sacred services and ordinances, and to exclude such as are unfit; and to every one of us He gives his proper work, by attending to which, we may approve ourselves true believers, honor our Lord, and serve our generation. (Note, Phil. 1: 9-11.) Happy therefore is that servant, who continues sober and vigilant in his place, without interfering with that of other men! He will be prepared for the coming of his Lord; he will be found awake, and employed in his station, and his recompense will be secure. But it will be an awful surprise to a professed Christian or minister, should he be found sleeping, self-indulgent and unprepared; yet this may probably be our case, if at any time we relax our vigilance, or neglect our work. (Note, Heb. 4: 1, 2.) He therefore speaks to us all, charging us to 'take heed to ourselves,' our duty, or our ministry, and to watch and pray always, 'lest coming suddenly He find us sleeping.' (P. O. Matt. 24: 29-51. Luke 21: 20-38.)

SCOTT.

Verse 35.

Those who are concerned in admitting members into the Christian church, and especially in the ordination of ministers, and in all appointments respecting them, seem especially intended.—At even, &c.] Nine in the evening, midnight, three in the morning, and sunrise.

SCOTT.

At even, at midnight, &c.] It has been disputed, with reference to several passages of Scripture, whether the evangelists followed the Jewish or Roman computation of time. The Romans had two different computations of their days, and two different denominations for them. The one they called the civil, the other the natural day. The first was the same as ours; the second, which was the vulgar computation, began at six in the morning, and ended at six in the evening. The Jews computed their hours from six in the morning to six in the evening. The night was divided into four watches, as indicated in the text. The first was at even, and continued from six till nine. The second commenced at nine, and ended at twelve, or midnight. The third, or the time of cock-crowing, lasted from twelve to three; the morning watch closed at six. The Jews counted their natural days very differently from us: we reckon from twelve o'clock at night to twelve the next night; they reckoned from one sunset to the next, and all the time between they called a day. Gen. 1: 5. Lev. 23: 32. They also reckoned any part of a day of twenty-four hours, for a whole day. Thus, Aben-ezra, on Lev. 12: 3. speaking of the law for circumcising an infant on the eighth day, says, that if an infant be born but an hour before the first day ended, it was counted for one whole day. Their first hour corresponded with our seven o'clock; their second with our eight, &c. Matt. 20: 1, 12. Acts 11: 15.

CHAP. XIV.

The chief priests and scribes conspire to put Jesus to death, 1, 2. A woman pours precious ointment on his head with the circumstances attending her conduct, 3-9. Judas bargains with the chief priests to betray him, 10-11. The disciples by the direction of Jesus prepare the passover, 12-16. He eats it with them, and points out the traitor, 17-21. He institutes the Lord's supper, 22-25. He foretells that all the disciples would forsake Him, and that Peter would deny Him, 26-31. His agony and prayer in the garden, and his warnings to the disciples, 32-42. He is betrayed, apprehended, and forsaken, 43-52. He is arraigned before Caiaphas, condemned, and treated with cruel indignity, 53-65. Peter thrice denies Him, but repents, 66-72.

AFTER two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread: and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death.

2 But they said, 'Not on the feast-day,' lest there be an uproar of the people.

3 ¶ And being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman, having an alabaster-box of ointment of spike-nard, very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head.

4 And there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, 'Why was this waste of the ointment made?'

5 For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor.' And they murmured against her.

CHAP. XIV. v. 1-11. We have here instances.

1. Of the kindness of Christ's friends, and their provision of respect and honor for Him. Some, even in and about Jerusalem, loved Him, and never thought they could do enough for Him, among whom, though Israel be not gathered, He is, and will be, glorious.

1) One friend was so kind as to invite Him to sup with him; and He was so kind as to accept the invitation, v. 3. Though He had a prospect of death approaching, He did not abandon himself to a melancholy retirement, but conversed with his friends as usual.

2. Another friend was so kind as to anoint his head with very precious ointment, as He sat at meat. This extraordinary respect was paid by a woman that thought nothing too good to do Him honor. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, When the king sits at his table, my spike-nard sendeth forth the smell thereof, Cant. 1: 12. Let us anoint Christ as our Beloved, with affection; and as our Sovereign, with allegiance. Did He pour out his soul unto death for us, and shall we think any box of ointment too precious to pour upon Him? It is observable that she took care to pour it all upon Christ's head: she brake the box; (so we read it; but because it was an alabaster box, not easily broken, nor necessary that it should be broken, to get out the ointment, some read it, she shook the box, or knocked it to the ground, to loosen what was on the sides of it. Christ must be honored with all we have, and we must not keep back any part of the price. Do we give Him the precious ointment of our best affections? Let Him have them all; love Him with all the heart.

Now, (1.) There were those that put a worse construction upon this than it deserved. They called it a waste of the ointment, (v. 4.) because they could not put themselves to such expense to honor Christ; they thought that she was prodigal. Note, As the vile person ought not to be called liberal, nor the churl bountiful; (Isa. 32: 5.) so the liberal and bountiful ought not to be called wasteful. They pretended it might have been sold, and given to the poor, v. 5. A common piety to the temple will not excuse from a particular charity to a poor parent, (ch. 7: 11.) nor a common charity to the poor from a particular act of piety to Jesus. What thy hand finds to do, that is good, do it with thy might.

(2.) Our Lord put a better construction upon it than, for aught that appears, was designed. Probably, she intended no more than to show the great honor she had for Him, and to complete his entertainment. But Christ makes it an act of great faith, as well as great love; (v. 8.) 'She is come aforehand, to anoint my body to the burying, as if she foresaw that my resurrection would prevent it afterward.' This funeral rite was a presage of his death. Christ was filled with the thoughts of his death; every thing was construed with a reference to it; He spake of it upon all occasions. These who are condemned to die, have their coffins and other provision made for their funerals, while yet alive; so Christ accepted this. Christ's death and burial were the lowest steps of his humiliation, and there, though He cheerfully submitted to them, He would have marks of honor attend them, to take off the offence of the cross and intimate how precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saint. Christ never rode in triumph into Jerusalem, but when He came to suffer; nor had his head anointed, but for his burial.

(3.) He transmitted this piety to all ages; Wherever this Gospel shall be preached, it shall be spoken of, for a memorial of her, v. 9. Note, The honor which attends well-doing, balances reproach and contempt. The memory of the just is blessed, and they that had trial of cruel mockings, yet obtained a good report, Heb. 11: 36, 39. This woman got by her box that good name which is better than precious ointment. Those that honor Christ He will honor.

II. Christ's enemies, the chief priests, consulted how they might put Him to death, v. 1, 2. The passover was at hand, and at that feast He must be crucified, that his death and sufferings might be the more public, that all Israel, who came from all parts to the feast, might witness it, and that the Anti-type might answer to the type. Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, and brought us out of the house of bondage, at the same time that the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was commemorated.

Christ's enemies did not think it enough to banish or imprison Him, for they aimed not only to stop his progress, but to be revenged on Him. Not on the feast day, when the people are together; not, lest they should disturb their devotions, but, lest there be an uproar; (v. 2.) and they should rise, and rescue Him. They who desired the praise of men, dreaded nothing more than their displeasure.

1. Judas, one of Christ's family, trained up for the service of his kingdom, went to the chief priests, to tender his service in this affair.

He proposed to betray Christ to them, and

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. v. 3-9. (Notes. Matt. 26: 6-13. Luke 7: 37-39. John 12: 1-3.) 'It appears to me more probable, that Matthew and Mark should have introduced this story a little out of its place: that Lazarus, if he made this feast, (which is not expressly said by John,) should have been the use of Simon's house, as more convenient; and that Mary should have poured this ointment on Christ's head and body, as well as on his feet: than that, within the compass of four days, Christ should have been twice-anointed with so costly a perfume; and that the same fault should be found with the action, and the same value set on the ointment, and the same words used in defence of the woman, and all this in the presence of many of the same persons: all which improbable particulars must be admitted, if the stories be considered as different.' Doddridge. Neither Matthew nor Mark says, that this occurred no more than two days before the passover: they only relate it subsequent to some transactions which took place at that time. It happened when Jesus was in Bethany: this may be explained to mean any evening from his arrival, till the passover; and it was no doubt on the first evening, before He entered Jerusalem riding on the ass's colt.

Alabaster-box.] 'Alabaster is a stone remarkable for its whiteness and smoothness, of which the ancients made vases, flasks, &c. easily wrought, and pellucid, that it is scarcely possible to distinguish these vases from those made of glass.'

Brake.] 'Broke the sealed covering.' Burder. 'Or broke off the narrow neck which was sealed up, to preserve the nard, and denote its gaudiness, as we learn from Pliny.'

(4.) Had indignation.] 'It is indecent, (say the Jerusalem Talmudists,) for a scholar of the wise man to smell of spices.' From this opinion, every where received among them, you may more aptly understand, why the other disciples, as well as Judas, 'who kept the bag,' were indignant. He out of covetousness—they not liking such effeminate niceties as were used in bride chambers, should be used towards their Master. But Christ, taking off the envy of what was done, applies this anointing to his burial, both in his intention, and in the intention of the woman.'

(5.) Sold.] Mary had not bought it on this occasion: but she might have sold it, as perhaps she had done many of those ornaments and luxuries, which she had used before she chose the good part.' (Note, Luke 10: 38-42.) (5.) Three hundred, &c.] About 9 l. 15s. sterling. A denarius was then a day's wages of a laborer even in harvest; (Matt. 20: 2.) and therefore equal in value, though not in weight, to three shillings in England; as it would purchase as many necessities of life. This would therefore appear a large sum. The language, concerning the poor, (7.) 'Whosoever ye will ye may do them good,' and so show your love and gratitude to Me, should be especially noticed. Mary 'did what she could' (8.) v. express her reverence and love to Jesus: to whom she considered herself as under the greatest obligations. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29: 1-20. 2 Cor. 9: 12-15.) But this is totally different from the pretensions of many, 'that they do what they can,' that is, 'to establish their own righteousness,' while they refuse to 'submit to the righteousness of God.' (Note. Rom. 10: 1-4.)

Scott. (3.) Spike-nard.] 'Pure, or liquid nard.' John 12: 3. Not else where. N. T. Cant. 4: 14. Various opinions are held of the meaning of this word: probably, it was derived from a Syriac word, denoting the manner in which the ointment was prepared from the spikes, or small blades of the plant which yielded it. She brake, &c. 5: 4. Matt. 2: 20. John 19: 36. Item, 16: 20. Rev. 2: 27. Some would render the word shook; supposing it improbable, that the alabaster box should be broken: but perhaps the ointment was closed up in the vessel, in such a manner, that it was needful to break the top or cover, in order to get it at.

Scott. Spike-nard.] 'A costly perfume, supposed to have been brought from India. A pound of it was worth forty dollars.' CALMET by Rob.

10 ¶ And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them.

11 And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him.

12 ¶ And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, his disciples said to him, 'Where wilt thou that we go and prepare, that thou mayest eat the passover?'

13 And he sendeth forth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, 'Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him.'

14 And wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the good-man of the house, 'The Master saith, notice when and where they might seize Him, without making an uproar among the people, of which they were afraid. Did he know their counsels? It is probable that he did not, for the debate was held in close cabal. Did they know that he had a mind to serve them? No; they could not imagine that an intimate should be so base; but Satan, who entered into Judas, knew what occasion they had for him, and could guide him to guide them, who were contriving to take Jesus. Note, The spirit that works in the children of disobedience, knows how to bring them to assist one another in a wicked project, and then to harden them with the fancy that Providence favors them.

(2.) That which he proposed to himself was money; he had what he aimed at, when they promised him money. Covetousness was Judas's master-lust, his own iniquity, and that betrayed him to betray his Master; the devil suited his temptation, and conquered him. It is not said, They promised him *pre*ferment, (he was not ambitious of that,) but, They promised him money. See what need we have to double our guard against the sin that most easily besets us. Perhaps it was covetousness that brought him to follow Christ, having a promise that he should be purse-keeper; and now, that there was money to be got on the other side, he was as ready to betray Him as to follow Him. Note, Where men's profession of religion is the serving of a secular interest, the same principle, when the wind turns, will be the bitter root of a vile and scandalous apostasy.

(3.) Having secured the money, he sought how he might seasonably deliver Him up. We should be careful not to ensnare ourselves in sinful engagements. If at any time we be so ensnared, we are to deliver ourselves by a speedy retreat, Prov. 6: 1-5. It is a rule in law, as well as in religion, that an obligation to do an evil thing is null and void; it binds to repentance, not to performance. The way of sin is down hill. What wicked contrivances may have to compass their designs conveniently! But such conveniences will prove mischiefs in the end.

V. 12-31. I. Christ ate the passover with his disciples, the night before He died; the joys and comforts of the ordinance prepared Him for his approaching sorrows, which did not indispose Him for that solemnity. Note, No apprehension of trouble should put us out of frame for holy ordinances.

And she my body to the burying. Allusion is here made probably to the Jews's custom of embalming the dead, or at least depending upon them: aromatic substances, such as myrrh and aloes. Ed. Verses 10, 11.

It is not certain on which day Judas first went to the chief priests; but it is most probable, that it was two days before the passover, when they were consulting how to apprehend Jesus, that they might put him to death. The devil had before this 'put it into his heart'; but it may be supposed, that he hesitated for a time, before he carried his design into execution.

Verses 12-16. (Note, Matt. 26. 17-19.) Nothing could be less the object of natural sagacity and foresight, than the events here mentioned. Had the two disciples come to the place specified, sooner or later than they did, the 'man bearing the pitcher of water' would either not have arrived, or would have been gone. But our Lord knew that the owner of a feast called, The feast of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, v. 12.

2. He gave another proof of his infallible knowledge, as when He sent for the ass on which He rode in triumph; (ch. 11: 6.) 'Go into the city, (for the passover must be eaten in Jerusalem,) and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water, to his master's house; follow him, inquire for his master, and desire him to show you a room.' No doubt, the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rooms fitted up for this occasion, for those that came out of the country to keep the passover, one of those Christ made use of; not a friend's house, nor any house He had formerly frequented, for then He would have said, 'Go where we used to be, and prepare.' Probably, He went where He was not known, that He might be undisturbed. Perhaps He notified it by a sign, to conceal it from Judas, that he might not know it. He came to the place; and by such a sign, to intimate that He will dwell in the clean heart, that is, washed as with pure water. Where He designs to come, purifying water must go before Him; see Isa. 1: 16-18.

3. He ate the passover in an upper room, furnished; it would seem to have been very handsome. Christ was far from affecting any thing stately; on the contrary, He chose that which was homely, sat down on the grass: but when He was to keep a sacred feast, he would do it in a good room. God looks not at outward pomp, but at the expressions of inward reverence for a divine institution, which, it is to be feared, those want, who, to save charges, deny themselves decencies in the worship of God.

4. He ate it with the twelve, his family, to teach those who have the charge of families, not only of children, but of servants, or of scholars, to worship God with them. If Christ came with the twelve, Judas was with them, though contriving to betray his Master; it is plain by what follows, (v. 20.) that he was there: he did not absent himself, lest he should have been suspected; had his seat been empty at this feast, they would have said, as Saul of David, Surely he is not clean, 1 Sam. 20: 26. Hypocrites, though they know it is at their peril, crowd to special ordinances, to keep up their reputation, and palliate their secret wickedness. Christ did not exclude him from the feast; his wickedness was not, as yet, public and scandalous. Christ, giving the keys of the kingdom of heaven to men who judge according to outward appearance, would hereby direct and encourage them, in their admissions to his table, to be satisfied with a justifiable profession, he-certain commodious house in Jerusalem favored Him; He foresaw that at a precise time of the day, he would send his servant for a pitcher of water; that the disciples would meet him just when they entered the city; that by following him they would find out the person whom He intended; and that by mentioning Him, as 'the Master,' or 'the Teacher,' the owner of the house would readily consent to accommodate them in an upper chamber. When the disciples found all these circumstances so exactly accord to the prediction, they could not but be deeply impressed with a conviction of our Lord's knowledge of every event, and his influence over every heart. (Notes, 11: 1-11. 1 Sam. 10: 2-7.) (15.) Furnished, &c.] That is, with table, couches, and all other things suited to the occasion. [See note, p. 363.] Scott.

(14.) The guest-chamber. Luke 2: 7. 22: 11. Probably every household in Jerusalem, who had it in his power, reserved a room in his house for this purpose, for such of his friends as came up thither to eat the passover. He was their host, and this 'guest-chamber' was as it were their 'inn.' An upper room. Luke 22: 12. Not elsewhere in N. T.

Lodgings, says Lightfoot, were free of charge at Jerusalem during the passover. But, says Rosenmuller, it is certain that, at the time of this feast, many Jerusalemites let out to strangers rooms ready prepared. Ed.

II. Christ discoursed with his disciples, as they were eating the passover, probably, according to the custom of the feast, of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of the first-born; and were as they used to be together on this occasion, till Christ told them that which would mix trembling with their joys.

1. They were pleasing themselves with the society of their Master; but He tells them that they must now lose Him; The Son of man is betrayed; and if He be betrayed, the next that you will hear of Him, is, that He is crucified and slain; God hath determined it concerning Him, and He agrees, The Son of man goes, as it is written of Him, v. 21. It was written in the counsels of God, and in the prophecies; not one jot or tittle of either can fall to the ground.

2. They were pleasing themselves with the society one of another, but Christ told them, One of you that eateth with me shall betray me, v. 18. Christ said this, to startle the conscience of Judas, to awaken Him to repent and draw back (for it was not too late) from the brink of the pit. But he, who was most concerned in the warning, was least concerned at it. All the rest were affected. (1.) They began to be sorrowful. As the remembrance of our former falls into sin, so the fear of the like again, often imbibes our spiritual feasts, and our joy. Here were the bitter herbs, with which this passover was taken. (2.) They began to be suspicious of themselves; they said one by one, Is it I? And another said, Is it I? They are to be commended for their charity, that they were more jealous of themselves than of one another. It is the law of charity, to hope the best; (1 Cor. 13: 5, 7.) we assuredly know, and therefore may justly suspect, more evil in ourselves than in our brethren. They are also to be commended for their acquiescence in what Christ said; they trusted more to his words than to their own hearts; and therefore do not say, 'I am sure it is not I'; but, 'Lord, is it I? see if there be such a way of wickedness in us, and discover it to us that we may turn from that way.'

In answer to their inquiry, Christ made them easy; 'It is not you, nor you; it is this that now dips with me in the dish: the adversary is this wicked Judas.' One would think this would have made Judas very uneasy. If he go on in his undertaking, it is upon the sword's point, for woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed; he is forever undone; his sin will soon find him out; and it were better for him that he had never had a being, than such a miserable one as he must have. It is very probable that Judas encouraged himself with this thought, that his Master had often said He must be betrayed; 'And if it must be done, surely God will not find fault with him that doth it, for who has resisted his will?' As the objector argues, Rom. 9: 19. But Christ tells him that this will be no sneller or excuse; The Son of man indeed goes, as it is written of Him, as a lamb to the slaughter; but woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. God's decrees to permit sins, and glorify Himself by them, neither necessitate the sins, nor determine them, nor will they excuse, or mitigate the punishment. Christ was delivered indeed by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; but, notwithstanding, it is with wicked hands that He is crucified and slain, Acts 2: 23.

III. The Lord's supper,

1. Was instituted in the close of a supper, when they were sufficiently fed with the paschal lamb, to show that in the Lord's supper there is no bodily repast intended. It is food for the soul only, and therefore as much as will serve for a sign, is enough. It was at the close of the passover supper, which was then superseded and set aside. The doctrine and duty of the sacrament is illustrated to us by the law of the passover; (Exod. 12.) for the Old-Testament institutions, though they do not bind us, yet instruct us, by the help of a gospel-key. These two ordinances it may be good to compare, and observe how much plainer the institution of the Lord's supper is, than that of the passover. Christ's yoke is easy in comparison with that of the ceremonial law, and his ordinances are more spiritual.

2. It was instituted by the example of Christ, not with the ceremony of a law, as baptism was after Christ's resurrection, (Matt. 28: 19.) but by the practice of our Master himself, because intended for those who are already taken into covenant with Him: but it has the obligation of a law, and was intended to remain in force till his second coming.

3. It was instituted with blessing and giving of thanks; the gifts of common providence are to be so received, (1 Tim. 4: 4, 5.) much more the gifts of special grace. At his other meals, He was wont to bless, and give thanks; (ch. 6: 41. 8: 7.) so remarkably, that He was known by it, Luke 24: 30, 31. And He did the same at this meal.

4. It was to be a memorial of his death; and therefore He brake the bread, to show how it pleased the Lord to bruise Him; and He called the wine, which is the blood of the grape, the blood of the New Testament. The death Christ died was a bloody death, and frequent mention is made of the blood, the precious blood, as the price of our redemption; for the blood is the life, and made atonement for the soul, Lev. 17: 11, 14. The pouring out of the blood was the most sensible indication of the pouring out of his soul, Isa. 53: 12. Blood has a voice; (Gen. 4: 10.) and therefore the blood is so often mentioned, because it was to speak, Heb. 12: 24. It is called the blood of the New Testament; for

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. While numbers combine against Christ both power and subtlety, to run down his truth, and his people; there are a few, generally in inferior stations, who spare no pains to express their love to Him, and to promote his glory. But it is not uncommon for their expressions of zeal and affection to be misunderstood and censured, even by their brethren, as well as by hypocrites and open enemies. We should not therefore be discouraged, if those whom we love should think our labor misapplied; when we are desirous of honoring Christ and promoting his Gospel, and are employed for Him; and on the other hand, we should fear to molest those who express their love in a different manner from us.—Happy is he, of whom in these things the Lord says, 'He did what he could.'—We indeed have not Christ personally present with us, and may have little opportunity of promoting his cause, or ability to do it; but we have 'the poor always with us, and whosoever we will, we may do them good'; and if in this, or in any other way, we show the sincerity of our love and gratitude to Christ,

He will accept our services, and make them known for a memorial of us, when mercenary hypocrites, as well as avowed enemies, shall sink into shame and everlasting contempt. (Notes, Matt. 25: 34-40. P. O. 31-40. 26: 1-13. John 13: 1-9. Notes, 2 Cor. 8: 1-9.) Our Lord knows every circumstance respecting us before it comes to pass; and if we compare our experience with his words, we shall be convinced that He is ordering every thing relative to us, in wisdom and goodness, 'according to the counsel of his own will'; and that the most painful dispensations will in the event conduce to our good.—Whatever we possess is then best employed, and most profitable to us, when most entirely devoted to Him: if we admit Him, He will dwell in our hearts, and we may feast with Him; and when we consecrate our houses to Him, by family worship, and by hospitably entertaining his disciples, He will there also manifest his presence with us and bless us. (P. O. Matt. 26: 14-25.)

It is said to be shed for many, to justify many, (Isa. 43: 12,) to bring many sons to glory, Heb. 2: 10. It was sufficient for many; it has been of use to many; a great multitude which no man could number, had washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; (Rev. 7: 9, 14,) and still it is a fountain opened. How comfortable is this to repenting sinners, that the blood of Christ is shed for many! And if for many, why not for me? If for the chief of sinners, then why not for me?

5. It was to be a ratification of the covenant made with us in Him, and a sign of the conveyance of those benefits to us, which were purchased by his death: and therefore He brake the bread to them, (v. 22,) and said, Take, eat of it: he gave the cup to them, and ordered them to drink of it, v. 23. Apply the doctrine of Christ crucified to yourselves, and let it be meat and drink to your souls, the support and comfort of your spiritual life.

6. It was instituted with an eye to the happiness of heaven, to be a foretaste of that, and thereby to deaden our taste for all the pleasures and delights of sense; v. 25. I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, as it is a bodily refreshment. I have done with it. Let me drink no more of the fruit of the vine, it is dead to those that have been made to drink of the river of God's pleasures; but, Lord, hasten the day, when I shall drink it in the kingdom of God, where it shall be forever new, and in perfection.

7. It was closed with a hymn, v. 26. Though Christ was in the midst of his enemies, yet He did not, for fear of them, omit this sweet duty of singing psalms. Paul and Silas sang, when the prisoners heard them. This was an evangelical song, and gospel times are often spoken of in the Old Testament, as times of rejoicing, and praise is expressed by singing. This was Christ's swan-like song, which He sang just before he entered upon his agony; probably, that which was usually sung, Ps. 114 to 119.

IV. When they had sung the hymn, presently they went out. Our Lord Jesus had his heart so much upon his suffering, that He would not come into the tabernacle of his house, nor go up into his bed, nor give sleep to his eyes, when that work was to be done, Ps. 132: 3, 4. The Israelites were forbidden to go out of their houses that night that they eat the passover, for fear of the sword of the destroying angel, Exod. 12: 22, 23. But because the great Shepherd was to be smitten, He went out to expose Himself to the sword; they evaded the destroyer, but Christ conquered him, and brought destruction to a perpetual end.

1. Christ here foretells that in his sufferings He should be deserted by all his disciples; 'You will all be offended because of me, this night. What I tell you now, is no other than what the Scripture has told you before; I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered.' Christ knew this before, and yet welcomed them at his table; he foresees the falls of his disciples, and yet doth not refuse them. Nor should we be discouraged from coming to the Lord's supper, by the fear of relapsing into sin; but, the greater our danger, the more need we have to fortify ourselves by the conscientious use of ordinances. Christ tells them, that they would be offended in Him, would question whether He were the Messiah or no, when they saw Him overpowered by his enemies. Hitherto, they had continued with Him in his temptations; though they had sometimes offended Him, yet they had not been offended in Him; but now the storm would be so great, that they would slip their anchors, and be in danger of shipwreck. Some trials are more particular; (as Rev. 2: 10. The devil shall cast some of you into prison;) but others are more general, an hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, Rev. 3: 10. The smiting of the shepherd is often the scattering of the sheep: magistrates, ministers, masters of families, if shepherds to those under their charge, when any thing comes amiss to them, the whole flock suffers and is endangered by it.

Christ encourages them with a promise, that they shall return both to their duty and to their comfort; (v. 28.) 'After I am risen, I will gather you in from all the places whither you are scattered, Ezek. 34: 12. I will go before you into Galilee, we shall see each other there.'

2. He foretells that He should be denied particularly by Peter. When they went out to go to the mount of Olives, we may suppose that Judas stole away from them, whereupon the rest began to think highly of themselves, that they stuck to their Master, when Judas quitted him. But Christ tells them, that though they should be kept by his grace from Judas's apostasy, yet they would have no reason to boast of their constancy. Note, Though God keeps us from being as bad as the worst, yet we may well be ashamed to think that we are not better than we are.

(1.) Peter is confident that he should not do so ill as the rest of the disciples; (v. 23.) Though all should be offended, yet will not I. He supposes himself stronger than others, so much as to receive the shock of a temptation, and bear up against it, all alone; I stand, though no body stood by him. It is bread to us, to think well of ourselves, and trust to our own hearts.

(2.) Christ tells him that he will do worse than any of them. They will all desert Him, but he will deny Him; not once, but thrice; 'This day, even this night, before the cock crow thrice, thou wilt deny that ever thou hadst any acquaintance with me, as one ashamed to own me.'

(3.) He stands to his promise; 'If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee: I will adhere to thee, though it cost me my life;' and, no doubt, he thought as he said. Judas said nothing like this, when Christ told him he would betray Him. He sinned by contrivance; Peter by surprise; he devised the wickedness; (Mic. 2: 1.) Peter was overtaken in this fault, Gal. 6: 1. It was ill done to contradict his Master. If he had said, 'Lord, give me grace to keep me from denying thee, lead me not into this temptation, deliver me from this evil,' it might have been prevented: but they were all thus confident; they who said, Lord, is it I? now said, It shall never be I. Being acquitted from their fear of betraying Christ, they were now secure. But he that thinks he stands, must learn to take heed lest he fall; and he that girdeth on the harness, must not boast as though he had put it off.

V. 32-42. Christ, entering upon his sufferings, begins with the sorest of all the sufferings of his soul. This agony in soul was the wormwood and the gall; and thereby it appeared that no sorrow was forced upon Him; it was freely admitted.

was named Gethsemane: and he saith to his disciples, Sit ye here, while I shall pray.

33 And he taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy;

34 And saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch.

35 And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him.

36 And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; take away this cup from me: nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt.

37 And he cometh, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? couldest not thou watch one hour?

38 Watch ye, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation: the spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak.

39 And again he

I. He retired for prayer; He had lately prayed with them; (John 17.) now He goes to his Father upon an errand peculiar to Himself. Note, Our praying with our families will not excuse our neglect of secret worship. Jacob first sent over all that he had, and was left alone, and then there wrestled a man with him, (Gen. 32: 23, 24.) though he had been at prayer before, (p. 9.) it is likely, with his family.

II. Even into that retirement He took with Him Peter and James and John, (p. 33.) to witness this part of his humiliation; and though great spirits care not how few know their agonies, He was not ashamed that they should see. These three had boasted of their ability and willingness to suffer with Him; (ch. 10: 39.) and therefore Christ takes them to see the bloody baptism and the bitter cup, to convince them that they knew not what they said. They who are most confident, should be first tried, that they may be made sensible of their weakness.

III. He began to be sore amazed—a word very significant; it bespeaks something like that horror of great darkness which fell upon Abraham, (Gen. 15: 12.) or something worse. The terrors of God set themselves in array against Him, and He allowed himself the intense contemplation of them. Never was sorrow like unto his; never such experience as He had had from eternity of divine favors, and therefore never any could have such a sense as He had of divine deserts. Yet there was not the least irregularity in this commotion; his affections rose not tumultuously, but as they were called up, for He had no corrupt nature. If water have a sediment when shaken, it grows muddy; so with our affections; but pure water in a clean glass, though stirred, continues clear; and so it was with Christ. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it probable that the devil did now appear to our Savior in a visible shape, to terrify and drive Him from his hope in God, to make Him curse God, and die, and to deter Him from prosecuting his undertaking; whatever hindered Him from that, He looked upon as coming from Satan, Matt. 16: 23. When the devil had tempted Him in the wilderness, it is said, He departed from Him for a season, (Luke 4: 3.) intending another struggle with Him; finding that he could not flatter Him into sin, he would try to affright Him into it, and make void his design.

IV. He said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful. He was made sin for us, and therefore was thus sorrowful: He fully knew the malignity of the sins He was to suffer for; and having the highest degrees of love to God, who was offended, and of love to man, who was endangered by them, now that those were before Him, no marvel that his soul was exceeding sorrowful. He was made to serve with our sins, and wearied with our iniquities. He was made a Curse for us; the curses of the law were transferred to Him as our Surety. When his soul was thus exceeding sorrowful, He did, as it were, yield to them, and lie down under the load, until by his death He had satisfied for sin, and forever abolished the curse. He now tasted death, which is not an expression, as if He did but taste it; He drank up even the dregs of the cup; but it did not go down quickly and at once: He tasted all the bitterness of it. This was that fear which the apostle speaks of,

(Heb. 5: 7.) a natural fear of pain and death which it is natural to human nature to startle at.

Christ's sufferings and sorrows for us should (1.) imbitter our sins. Can we ever entertain a thought of sin, when we see what impression sin (though but imputed) made up: the Lord Jesus? Shall that sit light upon our souls, which sat so heavy upon his? Was Christ, in such an agony for our sins, and shall we never be in an agony about them? How should we look upon Him whom we have pierced, and mourn, and be in bitterness! It becomes us to be exceeding sorrowful for sin, because Christ was so, and never to make a mock at it. If Christ thus suffered for sin, let us arm ourselves with the same mind.

(2.) To sweeten our sorrows if our souls be exceeding sorrowful, through affliction, let us remember that our Master was so before us, and the disciple is not greater than his Lord. Why should we affect to drive away sorrow, when Christ for our sakes submitted to it, and thereby not only took out the sting, but put virtue into it, and made it profitable, (for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better,) nay, and sweet, and comfortable. Paul was sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. If we be exceeding sorrowful, it is but unto death; that will be the period of all our sorrows, if Christ be ours; when I e eyes are closed, all tears are wiped away from them.

V. He ordered his disciples to keep with Him, not because He needed help, but because He would have them look upon Him, and receive instruction; He said to them, Tarry ye here, and watch. He had said to the other disciples nothing but, Sit ye here; (p. 32.) but these three He bids to tarry and watch, as expecting more from them than from the rest.

VI. He fell on the ground, and prayed. It was but a little before this, that in prayer He lifted up his eyes; (John 17: 1.) but here, being in an agony, He fell upon his face, accommodating himself to his present humiliation, and teaching us thus to abase ourselves before God; it becomes us to be low, when we come into the presence of the Most High. As Man, He deprecates his sufferings, that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from Him; p. 35. 'Let man's salvation be, if possible, accomplished without it.' The Syriac word Abba is here retained, which signifies, Father, to intimate what an emphasis our Lord Jesus, in his sorrows, laid upon it. With an eye to this, Paul retains this word, putting it into the mouths of all that have the Spirit of adoption; they are taught to cry, Abba, Father, Rom. 8: 15. Gal. 4: 6. Father, all things are possible to Thee. Note, Even that which we cannot expect, we ought yet to believe that God is able to do; and when we submit to his will, and refer ourselves to his wisdom, it must be with a believing acknowledgment that all things are possible to Him. As Mediator, Christ acquiesced in the will of God. 'Nevertheless, not what I will, but what Thou wilt. I know the matter is settled, and cannot be altered; I must suffer and die, I hid it welcome.'

VII. His disciples dropped asleep while He was at prayer, p. 37, 38. He comes to look after them, since they did not look after Him;

Verses 32—36.

Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 26: 36—39. Luke 22: 39—46.—(36.) And He said, &c. 'O Father, I know that all things are possible to thee Almighty power. When I consult with human infirmity, I could in vain wish the removal of this bitter passion: but these weak volitions are not now for me; I willingly submit my human will to thy divine will and pleasure.' Bp. Hall.—(Note, John 12: 23—33.) 'Christ suffering for us, in that flesh which He took upon Him for our sakes, the horrible terrors of the curse of Gal, receiveth the cup at his Father's hand, which He, being just, doth straightway drink off for the unjust.' Beza.

'We are taught by this affecting passage, that a season of special emergency from danger foreseen, or approaching trial, is a fit season for special prayer. Few occasions in our Savior's life are more suited for our comfort or imitation. Here we contemplate Him in his human nature, exercising no divine power:—for "how then should the Scripture be fulfilled?" We see Him, as man, contending against the foreknowledge of bitter suffering, against all that our nature most shrinks from: and we see Him, not supported, as many of his disciples have since been in similar trials, by a strength beyond their own, but left, as it appears, to experience all the bitterness of unmitigated anguish. No doubt, for a purpose: that we, for whose instruction it is recorded, may be convinced of the reality of that misery which awaits unrepented unpardoned sin. The prayer which He utters is of all things most calculated to convince us of that reality.' Bp. Swinock.

(38.) Abba. A Syriac word signifying Father, but in a way of peculiar affection and confidence. (Notes, Rom. 8: 14—17, v. 15. Gal. 4: 5—7, v. 6.)

(37.) Says to Peter.—'Whom He especially addresses, since he had a short time before, with every asseveration, strongly declared, that he would willingly encounter all calamities, nay, even death itself, with Jesus.'

Observe, too, He calls him not Peter, i. e. rock, (constant,) but Simon. L. BRUGENS

Verses 37, 38.

(Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 26: 40, 41.) 'Thou that didst ever now express so much kindness and constancy to me (31) art thou able to do so much less? In this state of agony, which I expressed to you, that I was in, (34.) couldst thou be so little concerned, as to fall asleep when I stayed so little while from you?' Hammond. Sec.

went away, and prayed, and spake the same words.

40 And when he returned, he found them asleep again; (for their eyes were heavy;) 'neither wist they what to answer him.'

41 And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, 'Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough,' 'the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hand of sinners.'

42 Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand.

[Practical Observations.]

43 ¶ And immediately, while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders.

44 And he that betrayed him had given them a token, saying, 'Whosoever I shall and finds them asleep, so little affected were they with his sorrows and prayers. This was a presage of their deserting Him; and an aggravation of it was, He had so lately commended them for continuing with Him in his temptations, though they had not been without their faults. Was He so willing to make the best of them, and they so indifferent in approving themselves to Him? They had lately promised not to be offended in Him; and yet mind Him so little? He particularly upbraided Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? Thou that didst so positively promise thou wouldst not deny me, dost thou slight me thus? From thee I expected better things. Couldst thou not watch one hour? He did not require him to watch all night with Him, only for one hour. It aggravates our faintness in Christ's service, that He doth not over-task nor weary us with it, Isa. 43: 23. He puts upon us no other burden than to hold fast till He comes; (Rev. 2: 24, 25.) and behold, He comes quickly, Rev. 3: 11.

Whom Christ loves He rebukes when they do amiss, so those whom He rebukes He counsels and comforts. It was wise and faithful advice. Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation, v. 38. It was bad to sleep when Christ was in his agony, but they were entering into further temptation, and if they did not stir up themselves, and fetch in grace and strength from God by prayer, they would do worse; and so they did, when they all forsook Him, and fled. It was a kind and tender excuse that Christ made for them, 'The spirit truly is willing; I know it is ready; you would willingly keep awake, but you cannot.' This may be taken as a reason for that exhortation, 'Watch and pray; because, though the spirit is willing, (you have sincerely resolved never to be offended in me,) yet the flesh is weak, and if you do not watch and pray, and use the means of perseverance, you may be overcome, notwithstanding.' The consideration of the weakness and infirmity of our flesh should engage and quicken us to prayer and watchfulness, when we are entering into temptation.

VIII. He repeated his address to his Father; (v. 39.) He went again, and prayed, saying the same word, or matter, or business; He spake to the same purport the third time. This teaches us, that men ought always to pray, and not faint, Luke 18: 1. Though answers to prayer do not come quickly, we must renew our requests, and continue instant in prayer; for the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie, Hab. 2: 3. Paul, when buffeted by a messenger of Satan, besought the Lord thrice, as Christ did, before He obtained an answer, 2 Cor. 12: 8. A little before this, when Christ, in trouble of soul, prayed, Father, glorify thy name, He had an immediate answer, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again; but now He comes a second and third time, for God's answer to prayer, comes sooner or later, according to his will, that we may be kept depending.

IX. He repeated his visits to his disciples; a specimen of his continued care for his church, even when it is half asleep, and not concerned for itself, while He ever lives making intercession with his Father in heaven. See how, as became a Mediator, He passes and repasses between both. He came the second time to his disciples, and found them asleep again, v. 40. See how the infirmities of Christ's disciples return, notwithstanding their resolutions, and overpower them, notwithstanding their resistance. What clogs these bodies are to our souls! We should long for that state in which they shall be no more an encumbrance. This second time He spake to them as before, but they resist not what to answer Him; they were ashamed and had no excuse. Or, they were so overpowered, that, like men between sleeping and waking, they knew not where they were or what they said. But the third time, they were bid to sleep if they would; (v. 41.) Sleep on now, and take your rest. I have now no more occasion for your watching. It is enough; 'You have had warning enough to keep awake, and would not take it, and now you shall see what little reason you have to be secure.' I discharge you from any further attendance; so some understood it; 'Now the hour is come, in which I knew you would all forsake me; take your course;' as He said to Judas, What thou doest, do quickly. The Son of man is now betrayed into the hands of sinners, the chief priests and elders; those worst of sinners, because they made a profession of sanctity. 'Come, rise up. Let us go and meet the enemy, for lo, he that betrayeth me, is at hand, and I must not now think of escape.' When we see trouble at the door, we should get ready for it.

V. 43-52 The enemies of our Lord had long aimed to take Him; but He had escaped

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-42. While we consider the Lord Jesus, ('the paschal Lamb, sacrificed for us;' who has given his body to be broken, and his blood to be shed, that we might live by faith in his name,) attending on divine institutions which bring sin to remembrance; that He might 'fulfil all righteousness;' let us learn, in copying his example, to beware of hypocrisy, and to fear being counted intruders, or detected as traitors. We must 'take heed and beware of covetousness,' and be diligent in self-examination; not trusting our own hearts, but still inquiring, when we read of hypocrites and apostates, 'Lord, is it I?'—more ready to suspect ourselves than our brethren. Let us thus 'examine ourselves,' and then, as frequently as opportunity is afforded us, 'eat of that bread, and drink of that cup,' the appointed symbols of the body and blood of Christ, given to purchase the blessings of the new covenant for our souls. Thus we shall be led to recollect our guilt and danger, our hope and obligations, and our profession of faith, and love our Redeemer and his flock: thus we shall receive renewed pledges of his love, have our affections enlivened, our strength increased for his service: thus we shall anticipate the hour, when we shall drink of the fruit of our living Vine with Him, forever new in the kingdom of our Father: and thus we shall also be prepared for bearing our cross, for drinking of the cup of tribulation, and for tasting death in our passage to glory. (P. O. Matt. 26: 26-35.) The good Shepherd indeed passed through his sufferings, without one false step; but even the principal of it is followers have often been offended and scattered, by the comparatively small measure of afflictions allotted to them; and this has been exactly proportioned to the degree, in which they have confided in resolutions made in their own strength. Did we properly contemplate the scene in Gethsemane; did we duly consider the amazement and anguish of the great Redeemer, when 'his soul was sorrowful even unto death,' through the load of our guilt which He willingly sustained; did we advert to 'his strong crying and tears,' (Note, Heb. 5: 7-10, v. 7.) and to the victorious resignation of his heart, when He said, 'Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt:' these reflections would fill our minds with such convictions concerning the evil of sin, the awful justice of God, the love of the Savior, the vanity of the world, the impotency of men's malice, and the advantageous and helpless condition of our souls, as would render us humble, and steadfast, in the hour of trial, and excite us to watch and pray, lest we be borne down by temptation, or fall under the wrath of God. But, alas! while unbelievers entirely disregard this interesting and affecting subject, even believers are apt to contemplate it in a drowsy manner; and, instead of being 'ready to die with Christ,' they are often unprepared to 'watch with Him one hour!' Thus, after repeated warnings, through their own negligence they 'enter into temptation;' and then, through the weakness of the flesh, they fall into sin, notwithstanding the readiness of the spirit, in their better moments. (Notes, Rom. 7: 15-21. P. O. 15-25.) Let us not attempt to excuse such disobedience and ingratitude; should Jesus call us to account for it, we should not know what to answer Him: and though He will not cast off the true believer for these offences, He will yet sharply rebuke and chasten him and bring him to condemn himself on account of them. (P. O. Matt. 26: 36-46. Luke 22: 35-46.)

and only cut off the ear. It is easier to fight for Christ than to die for Him; but Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people's lives, but by laying down their own, Rev. 12: 11.

VI. Christ argues with them that had seized Him, and shows them the absurdity of their proceedings. 1. That they came against Him, as against a thief, whereas He was innocent of any crime; He taught daily in the temple, and if He had any wicked design, there it would have been discovered; nay, these officers of the chief priests, being retainers to the temple, may be supposed to have heard his sermon there; and had He not taught them excellent doctrine, his enemies themselves being judges.

2. Were not all the words of his mouth in righteousness? Was there any thing forward or perverse in them? Prov. 8: 8. By his fruits He was known to be a good Tree; why then did they come out against Him as a thief? 2. They came to take Him privately, whereas He was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple. He was none of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, John 3: 20. Their masters might meet Him any day in the temple, where He was ready to answer all charges; and there they might do as they pleased with Him, for the priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it; but to come upon Him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. This was to do as David's enemy, that sat in the lurking places of the villages, to murder the innocent, Ps. 10: 8. But this was not all. 3. They came with swords and staves, is if He had been in arms against the good sent, and must have the military raised to reduce Him. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they did this to secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed, because they feared the people; but thus were they in great fear, where no fear was, Ps. 53: 6. By coming also with swords and staves to take Him, they represented Him to the people (who are apt to take impressions this way) as a dangerous man, and so endeavored to incense them against Him, and make them cry out, Crucify him, crucify him, having no other way to gain their point.

III. Judas betrayed him with a kiss; Christ allowed his disciples to kiss his cheek at their return, when they had been any time absent. He called him Master, Master, as if he would be more respectful than ever. It is enough to put one forever out of conceit with being called of men Rabbi, Rabbi, (Matt. 23: 7.) since it was with this compliment that Christ was betrayed. He bid them take Him, and lead him away safely. Some think that he spake this ironically, knowing that they could not secure Him unless He pleased, that this Samson could break their bands asunder as threads of tow, and make his escape, and then he should get the money, and Christ the honor, and no harm done; and I should think so too, but that Satan was entered into him, so that the worst and most malicious intention of this action is not too black to be supposed. Nay, he had often heard his Master say, that being betrayed, He should be crucified, and had no reason to think otherwise.

IV. They made Him their prisoner, laid on Him rude and violent hands, and took Him into custody; triumphing that they had done that which had been often before attempted in vain. V. Peter, in defence of his Master, wounded one of the assailants, being for the present mindful of his promise, to venture his life with his Master. He was one of them that stood by, of them that were with Him, (so the word signifies, in the Greek;) he drew a sword, it is likely, to cut off the head, but missed his blow, and only cut off the ear. It is easier to fight for Christ than to die for Him; but Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people's lives, but by laying down their own, Rev. 12: 11.

VI. Christ argues with them that had seized Him, and shows them the absurdity of their proceedings. 1. That they came against Him, as against a thief, whereas He was innocent of any crime; He taught daily in the temple, and if He had any wicked design, there it would have been discovered; nay, these officers of the chief priests, being retainers to the temple, may be supposed to have heard his sermon there; and had He not taught them excellent doctrine, his enemies themselves being judges.

2. Were not all the words of his mouth in righteousness? Was there any thing forward or perverse in them? Prov. 8: 8. By his fruits He was known to be a good Tree; why then did they come out against Him as a thief? 2. They came to take Him privately, whereas He was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple. He was none of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, John 3: 20. Their masters might meet Him any day in the temple, where He was ready to answer all charges; and there they might do as they pleased with Him, for the priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it; but to come upon Him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. This was to do as David's enemy, that sat in the lurking places of the villages, to murder the innocent, Ps. 10: 8. But this was not all. 3. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they did this to secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed, because they feared the people; but thus were they in great fear, where no fear was, Ps. 53: 6. By coming also with swords and staves to take Him, they represented Him to the people (who are apt to take impressions this way) as a dangerous man, and so endeavored to incense them against Him, and make them cry out, Crucify him, crucify him, having no other way to gain their point.

VII. He reconciled himself to this ignominious treatment, by referring to the predictions of the Messiah. I am hardly used, but I submit, for the Scriptures must be fulfilled, v. 49. What a regard Christ has had to the Scriptures! He would bear any thing rather than that the least jot or tittle of the Word of God should fall to the ground; and as He had an eye to them in his sufferings, so He has in his glory; for what is Christ doing in the government of the world, but fulfilling the Scriptures? The Old Testament we must search for Christ, the true Treasure hid in that field: as the history of the New Testament expounds the prophecies of the Old, so the prophecies of the Old Testament illustrate the history of the New.

VIII. All Christ's disciples, hereupon, forsook Him, and fled. They were very confident that they should adhere to Him; but even good men know not what they will do, till they are tried. If it was such a comfort to Him, as He had lately intimated, that they had hitherto continued with Him, in his trials, (Luke 22: 23.) what a grief it was to Him, that they deserted Him now in the greatest, when they might have done Him some service—when He was abused, to protect Him, and when accused, to witness for Him. Let not those that suffer for Christ, think it strange, if they be thus deserted, and if all the herd such as the wounded deer; they are not better than their Master, nor can expect to escape. Yet many commentators think that Judas expected that He would do so on this occasion, and in despair went and hanged himself.

(48-50.) And Jesus. &c.] 'As men had knowingly and willingly deserted their Creator, become traitors against Him, and robbed Him of his glory: so Christ willingly making satisfaction for the unjust, being deserted by his disciples, and betrayed by one whom He had admitted to the most familiar acquaintance with Him, is apprehended like a robber; that the punishment might answer to the sin; and we, the real traitors, deserters, and sacrilegious robbers, might be rescued from the snare of the devil.' It is probable, though not certain, that this young man was one of our Lord's followers. (Marg. Ref. c.) SCOTT.

(51.) Though this incident recorded by Mark may not seem of great moment, it is, in my opinion, one of those circumstances we call picturesque, which though in a manner unconnected with the story, enlivens the narrative and adds to its credibility. It must have been late in the night, with some young man, whose house lay near the garden, roused from sleep by the noise, sprang up, and stimulated by curiosity, threw around him the cloth in which he had been sleeping, and ran after the crowd. This is such an incident as is very likely to have happened, but more unlikely to have been invented.

CAMPBELL.

'D. Kimchi defines the original word rendered "linen cloth" as a "night garment" of linen, which is put next the skin. These sorts of garments are much in use amongst the eastern nations, especially in the summer and at night time. Very similar to them are the ample and flowing cloaks worn at the present day by the Moors and Arabs, called by them Hykes. Shaw, Pocock, &c.'

BLOOMFIELD.

The mention of these trivial occurrences (observes Le Clerc) confirms the truth of the history. The evangelists write without any selection of those events which might prejudice readers in favor of Jesus Christ, or without almost any praise bestowed on Him. They represent things as they are, in the colors of truth, and as they appeared to them at the time, or came to their knowledge.

Young men.] 'Roman soldiers.' Though the transaction was conducted with such extreme violence, the apostles had been permitted to escape, through the secret influence of Jesus over the minds of those who apprehended Him! (Note, John 18: 4-9.) SCOTT.

53 ¶ And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled all the chief priests, and the elders, and the scribes.

54 And Peter followed him afar off, even into the palace of the high priest: and he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire.

55 And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus, to put him to death; and found none.

56 For many bare false witness against him; but their witness agreed not together.

57 And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him, saying,

58 We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands.

59 But neither so did their witness agree together.

60 And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?

61 But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?

62 And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

63 Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses?

64 Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.

be better used either by enemies or friends. When Paul was in peril, none stood by him, but all men forsook him, 2 Tim. 4: 16.

IX. The noise disturbed the neighborhood, and some were brought into danger by the riot, v. 51, 52. This passage of story we have not in any other evangelist. 1. Such a multitude, armed, and coming with so much fury, in the dead of the night, and in a quiet village, could not but produce a great stir; this alarmed a young man, who perhaps thought there was some tumult in the city, some uproar among the people, and was in such haste to inform himself, that he threw a sheet about him, and ran among the thickest of them with this question, What is here? Having, no doubt, heard much of Jesus, he continued to follow Him, desirous to hear what He would say, and see what He would do. Some think, that his having no other garment than this linen cloth, intimates that he was one of those Jews who made a greater profession of piety than their neighbors, in token of which, among other instances of austerity they used no clothes but one linen garment, which was thin and cold. But this probably was not his constant wear. 2. Christ's own disciples had run away from Him; but this young man, having no concern for Him, thought he might securely attend Him, especially being so far from being armed, that he was not so much as clothed; but the young men, the Roman soldiers, laid hold of him. Perhaps they were vexed that they had suffered the disciples to run away, and, they being out of their reach, they resolved to seize the first they could lay their hands on; though this young man was perhaps one of the strictest sect of the Jews, the Roman soldiers made no conscience of abusing him, upon this occasion. Finding himself in danger, he left the linen cloth by which they had caught hold of him, and fled away naked. This passage is recorded, to show what a barbarous crew this was, that was sent to seize Christ, and what a narrow escape the disciples had of falling into their hands, out of which nothing could have kept them, but their Master's care; If ye seek me, let these go their way, John 18: 8. It also intimates that there is no hold of those who are led by curiosity only, and not by faith and conscience, to follow Christ.

V. 53—65. We have here Christ's arraignment, trial, and condemnation, before the great sanhedrim, of which the high priest was president, or judge; the same Caiaphas that had lately adjudged it expedient he should be put to death, guilty or not guilty, (John 11: 50.) and who therefore might justly be excepted against as partial.

I. Christ is hurried away to his palace (it is called), such state did he live in. And there, though in the dead of the night, all the chief priests and elders and scribes, were assembled, ready to receive the prey.

II. Peter followed at a distance, such a degree of cowardice was his late courage dwindled into, v. 54. But when he came to the high priest's palace, he went, and sat with the servants, that he might not be suspected to belong to Christ. The high priest's fire-side was no proper place, nor his servants proper company, for Peter, but it was his entrance into a temptation.

III. Great diligence was used to procure false witnesses against Christ. They had seized Him as a malefactor, and now they had Him, they had no indictment against Him, no crime to lay to his charge, but they sought for witnesses with insinuating questions, offered bribes to some, if they would accuse Him, and endeavored to frighten others, if they would not, v. 55, 56. The chief priests and elders were by the law intrusted with the prosecuting and punishing of false witnesses; (Deut. 19: 16.) yet those were now ringleaders in a crime that tends to the overthrow of justice. It is time to cry, Help, Lord, when the physicians of a land are its troublers, and those that should be the preservers of peace and equity, are the corrupters of both.

IV. He was at length charged with words spoken some years ago, which, as they were represented, seemed to threaten the temple, which they had made an idol of; (v. 57: 58.) but the witnesses to this matter did not agree, (v. 59.) for one swore that He said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days; (so it is in Matthew;) the other swore that He said, I will destroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build, not it, but another made without hands; now these two differ much from each other; their testimony was not equal to the charge of a capital crime; they did not accuse Him of that upon which a sentence of death might be founded; by the utmost stretch of their law.

V. He was urged to be his own accuser; (v. 60.) The high priest stood up in a heat, and said, Answerest thou nothing? This he said under pretence of justice and fair dealing, but really with a design to ensnare Him, that they might accuse Him, Luke 11: 53, 54, 20: 20. We may well imagine with what an air of haughtiness this proud high priest brought Jesus to this question; 'Come you, the prisoner at the bar, you hear what is sworn against you: what have you now to say for yourself?' Pleased to think that He seemed silent, who had so often silenced those that picked quarrels with Him. Still Christ answered nothing, that He might set us an example of patience under calumnies and false accusations; when we are reviled, let us not revile again, 1 Pet. 2: 22. And, of prudence, when a man shall be made an offender for a word, (Isa. 59: 21.) and our defence made our offence; it is an evil time indeed when the prudent shall keep silence, (lest they make bad worse,) and commit their cause to Him that judgeth righteously. But,

VI. When He was asked whether He was the Christ, He confessed, and denied not, that He was, v. 61, 62. He asked, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? that is, the Son of God? for, the Jews, when they named God, generally added, blessed for ever; and thence the Blessed is the title of God, a peculiar title, and applied to Christ, Rom. 9: 5. For the proof of his being the Son of God, He binds them over to his second coming; 'Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power; that Son of man that now appears so mean, whom you see and trample upon, (Isa. 53: 2, 3,) you shall shortly see and tremble before.' One would think that such a word as this, which our Lord seems to have spoken with a grandeur and majesty not agreeable to his present appearance, (for through the thickest cloud of his humiliation rays of glory still darted forth,) should have startled the court, and at least, in the opinion of some of them, should have amounted to an arrest of judgment, and that they should have stayed process till they had considered further of it; when Paul at the bar reasoned of the judgment to come, the judge trembled, and adjourned the trial, Acts 24: 25. But 66 ¶ And as Peter was beneath in the palace, there cometh one of the maids of the high priest:

67 And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth.

68 But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest, And he went out into the porch, and the cock crew.

69 And a maid saw him again, and began to say to them that stood by, This is one of them.

70 And he denied it again. And a little after, they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto.

71 But he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak.

these chief priests were so miserably blinded with malice and rage, that, like the horse rushing into the battle, they mocked at fear, and were not affrighted, neither believed they that it was the sound of the trumpet, Job 39: 22, 23. And see Job 15: 25, 26.

VII. The high priest, upon this confession of him, convicted Him as a Blasphemer; (v. 63.) He rent his clothes. Some think that the word signifies his pontifical vestments, which, for the greater state, he had put on, though in the night, upon this occasion. As before, in his enmity to Christ, he said he knew not what, (John 11: 51, 62,) so now he did he knew not what. If Saul's rending of Samuel's mantle was made to signify the rending of the kingdom from him, (1 Sam. 15: 27, 28,) much more did Caiaphas's rending of his own clothes signify the rending of the priesthood from him, as the rending of the vail, at Christ's death, signified the throwing of all open. Christ's clothes, even when He was crucified, were kept entire, and not rent; for, when the Levitical priesthood was rent in pieces and done away, this Man, because he continues ever, has an unchangeable priesthood.

VIII. They agreed that He was a blasphemer, and, as such, guilty of a capital crime, v. 64. The question seemed to be put fairly, What think ye? But it was really prejudged, for the high priest had said, Ye have heard the blasphemy; he gave judgment first, who, as president of the court, ought to have voted last. So they all condemned Him to be guilty of death; what friends He had in the great sanhedrim did not appear, it is probable that they had not notice.

IX. They set themselves to abuse Him, and, as the Philistines with Samson, to make sport with him, v. 65. It would seem that some of the priests that had condemned Him, so far forgot the dignity, as well as duty, of their place,

(70.) 'The Galileans spoke a corrupt dialect of Syria, confusing and changing many of the letters and words. This may have arisen from their being much in communication with other nations. Probably it led to Peter's detection. Lightfoot gives several instances of the confusion produced by their pronunciation. When a certain Galilean asked, Whose is Immah? (this lamb), he pronounced it so, that the hearers did not know whether he meant an ass, wine, wool or lamb. A Galilean woman meaning to say, Come and I will feed you with milk, confounded the letters of the words, so that they signified, My neighbor a lion shall eat you.'

(72.) Cock crew.] 'To reconcile this with the Jewish tradition, that all the cocks were removed out of Jerusalem, at the passover, some read, instead of cock crew, the watchmen proclaimed the hour of the night. But this seems so unnatural an interpretation, that, rather than admit it, one would question the truth of the Jewish tradition; or conclude, that, if the custom did prevail, some cock was accidentally left behind, or had returned unobserved to this place. The hurry of such a night might have occasioned much greater neglects than this supposes.'

DODDRIDGE.

When he thought thereon.] Some refer the original expression to the vehemence, with which Peter rushed forth from the palace, when he heard the cock crew the second time.

Scott.

And when he thought thereon.] There is a dispute about the meaning of the original word thus translated, upon which Markland, as the following useful remark: 'It is a desirable thing to know the precise meaning of every passage and word in the Scriptures. But where that cannot be as in this place and many others, we must be contented with this reflection, that the knowledge of such places is never absolutely necessary to us upon any account, except that of curiosity; for which I do not know of any provision that is made in the Christian religion.'

Ed.

'Watchfulness would have led Peter to foresee and provide against the very situation in which he was now placed. Jesus had forewarned them all, that He "must suffer many things and be set at naught." Peter should have meditated on this; have prepared his mind for acting on such an emergency; should have meditated on the proofs of power, and of truth, and of divinity which he had seen; enough surely to convince him, that nothing could be done against Jesus which was not permitted from above. And, like his divine Master, he should have strengthened himself by PRAYER against this predicted season; have sought a supply of grace suited to its difficulty; that knowing these things, he should act as if he knew them. Thus when he was questioned, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth, the reply might have been suggested to him,—all this which seems to you proof that Jesus of Nazareth is a deceiver, is proof that He is indeed a prophet, yea, "that prophet which should come into the world." For He foretold us this, (chap. 10: 33, 34.) In this manner both Peter himself and the rest of the apostles did act afterwards, when they were threatened and strengthened by the HOLY SPIRIT. Threatened and assailed by these same rulers, they made a solemn appeal to God. (Acts 4: 29.) We are told that the transgressions of the people of God are recorded "for our example." And the practical lesson to be derived from Peter's unfaithfulness, is, that we strengthen ourselves by all the means which Scripture supplies, against the hour of temptation.'

Jesus is bound, and delivered, unto Pilate, and when accused before him, and interrogated by him, He remains silent, &c.—5. Pilate, induced by the priests and people, releases Barabbas, and delivers Jesus to be crucified, 6—15. The soldiers crown Him with thorns, and cruelly mock Him; and then lead Him away to the place of crucifixion, 16—24. He is crucified between two thieves, and reviled by the people and the priests, 25—32. The sun is darkened; and Jesus, calling on God, expires, 33—37. The veil of the temple is rent; and the centurion confesses Him to be the Son of God, 38, 39. Certain women are spectators of his crucifixion, 40, 41. One of the women, who is named Pilate for thy body, which, having obtained, is honorably interred, 42—47.

AND a straightway in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council, and bound Jesus, and carried him away, and delivered him to Pilate.

2 And Pilate asked him, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answering, said unto him, Thou sayest it.

3 And the chief priests accused him of many things; but he answered nothing.

4 And Pilate asked him again, saying, Answerest thou nothing? behold how many things they witness against thee.

dren of base men, Job 30:8. Yet, all things considered, the temptation could not be called formidable; it was only a maid that casually cast her eye upon him, and, for aught that appears, without design of giving him any trouble, said, Thou art one of them, to which he needed not to have made any reply, or might have said, 'And if I be, I hope that is no treason.'

4. The sin was very great; he denied Christ before men, at a time when he ought to have confessed Him, and to have appeared in court a witness for Him. Christ had often given notice to his disciples of his sufferings; yet, when they came, they were to Peter as great a surprise and terror, as if he had never heard of them before. He had often told them that they must suffer for Him, must take up their cross, and follow Him; and yet Peter is so terribly afraid of suffering, upon the very first alarm of it, that he will lie, and swear, to avoid it. When Christ was admired and flocked after, he could readily own Him; but now, that He is deserted and despised, he is ashamed of Him, and will own no relation to Him.

5. His repentance was very speedy. He repeated his denial thrice, and the third was worst of all, for then he cursed and swore, to confirm his denial; and that third blow, which, one would think, should have stunned him, and knocked him down, startled him, and roused him up. Then the cock crew the second time, which put him in mind of his Master's warning: by recollecting that, he was made sensible of his sin; and when he thought thereon, he wept. Some observe that this evangelist, who wrote, as some have thought, by St. Peter's direction, speaks as fully of Peter's sin as any of them, but more briefly of his sorrow, which Peter, in modesty, would not have to be magnified, and because he thought he could never sorrow enough for so great a sin. His repentance here is thus expressed: He added to weep; the more he thought of it, the more he wept; threw himself down, and wept; he covered his face, and wept; so some; cast his garment about his head, that he might not be seen to weep; he cast his eyes upon his Master, who turned, and looked upon him. Or, as we understand it, fixing his mind upon it, he wept. It is not a transient thought of that which is humbling, that will suffice; we must dwell upon it. This word may mean his throwing confusion into his own face; he did as the publican that smote his breast, in sorrow for sin; and this amounts to his weeping bitterly.

CHAP. XV. v. 1—14. I. The great sanhedrim for the effectual prosecution of Jesus, met early in the morning, to find out ways and means to get Him put to death; they lost no time, lest there should be an uproar among the people. The unwearied industry of wicked people in doing evil, should shame our backwardness in that which is good. They that war against Christ and his soul, are up early; How long then wilt thou sleep, O sluggard?

II. They delivered Him a Prisoner to Pilate. Sacrifices must be bound with cords, Ps. 118:27. Christ was bound, to make hands easy to us, and enable us, as Paul and Silas, to sing in bonds. It is good for us often to remember the bonds of the Lord Jesus, who was bound for us. They led Him through Jerusalem, to expose Him to contempt, who, in the temple, but 9 day or two before, was venerated; and we may well imagine how He looked after such a night's usage; buffeted, spit upon, and abused. Their delivering Him to the Roman power, was a type of the ruin of their church, which hereby they brought upon themselves; it signified that the promise, covenant, and the oracles of God, and the visible church-state, which were the glory of Israel, and had been so long in their possession, should now be delivered up to the Gentiles. By delivering up the King, they do, in effect, deliver up the kingdom of God, which is therefore, as it were, by their own consent, taken from them, and given to another nation. If they had delivered up Christ, to gratify the desires of the Romans, or to satisfy any jealousies concerning Him, it had been another matter; but they voluntarily betrayed Israel's Crown, to them that were Israel's yoke.

III. Pilate interrogates; (v. 2.) 'Art thou the king of the Jews? Dost thou pretend to be that Messiah whom the Jews expect as a temporal prince?'—'Yea,' saith Christ, 'it is as thou sayest. I am that Messiah, but not as they expect.' He rules and protects his Israel, who are Jews by the circumcision of the Spirit, and will restrain and punish carnal Jews, who continue in unbelief.

IV. The chief priests forgot the dignity of their place, turned informers, and in person accused Christ of many things, (v. 3.) and witnessed against Him, v. 4. Many of the Old-Testament prophets charge the priests of their times with great wickedness, in which well did they prophesy of their priests; see Ezek. 22:26. Hos. 5:1, 6:9. Mic. 3:11. Zeph. 3:4. Mal. 1:6, 2:8. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans is said to be for the iniquity

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 43—72. Faulty disciples and hypocrites essentially differ. These often prove traitors, and join the enemies of Christ. Having long carried on a trade of iniquity, under the mask of piety, and amid the means of grace, they grow callous in sin, and treat religious concerns with unfeeling familiarity; they conceal their crimes by attending on ordinances, and, while they call Christ Lord, and express great affection for Him, betray Him into the hands of his enemies. They hasten their own destruction; 'it would have been better for had they never been born.'—While the enemies of Christ, actuated by the most outrageous malice, seem to have their way, they are under secret restraints, and can only fulfil the Scriptures: not can they move any faster or further, or touch one person more than the Lord permits them. (Note, Ps. 76:10.) The most enormous wickedness has commonly been committed under the forms of law and justice, and varnished over by a semblance of piety; and while rulers have been ringleaders in perjury, oppression and murder, they have often perplexed themselves in devising how to regulate their conduct by statute, and with the appearance of impartiality! When we contemplate the whole body of the rulers and teachers of God's professed people, combined against his Son, determined, at any rate, to condemn Him to death; when we view Him given up by them as a malefactor, to such insults and cruelties, as the vilest murderer would have been exempted from; we have the clearest demonstration of man's extreme enmity to God, and of God's unspeakable love to man. In the conduct of our Lord, we see the brightest pattern of meekness, fortitude, and compassion to sinners, that creation ever witnessed: we perceive likewise the desert of sin, the worth of our souls, the foundation of our hope, and the nature of our Christian calling; which is to do good with unwearied perseverance, and to endure evil after the example of our gracious Savior. (Note and P. O. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) Thus may we look forward with comfort to the time when we 'shall see the Son of man, sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven;' and hope to be numbered with his glorified saints; when all his enemies will be driven away into everlasting destruction.—But when we hear Peter, after his promises, repeatedly denying his Lord, with oaths and curses, we may well tremble to reflect on the weakness and depravity even of believers; we may take occasion to admire the mercy and patience of God; he excited to thankfulness, that we have not yet been left utterly to forsake Him; and confess with shame our manifold instances of partial unfaithfulness. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall;' and let him that has fallen think of these things, and return to the Lord with weeping and supplication, with deep repentance and faith; still hoping to receive forgiveness, to be restored to 'the joy of God's salvation,' and established by his free Spirit. (Notes, and P. O. Ps. 61:5—13. Matt. 26:47—75.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. v. 1—5. The events of this chapter are explained more fully in Matt. 27.

(1.) The meetings of the Jewish sanhedrim could not be held till morning, as the courts of the temple were shut at night. Nor was it lawful, to put any man to death on the passover. So the council of Jews, fearing the people too much to retain our Lord in prison, and not daring to proceed with the execution, delivered Him to Pilate, on charge of sedition, that He might be put to death immediately, and according to the Roman custom. Townsend.

(2.) The observation of Theophylact is this: The Jews delivered up our Lord to the Romans; and they, for that sin, were themselves given up into the hands of the Romans. Whately.—Christ being publicly bound before an earthly judge, not for his own sins, as it appears on 5 But Jesus yet answered nothing; so that Pilate marvelled.

6 ¶ Now ^{at that} feast he released unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they desired.

7 And there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection.

8 And the multitude, crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them.

9 But Pilate answered them, saying, 'Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews?'

10 For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him ^{for} envy.

11 But ^{the} chief priests moved the people, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them.

12 And Pilate answered and said again unto them, 'What will ye then that I shall do unto him ^{whom} ye call the King of the Jews?'

13 And they cried out again, Crucify him.

14 Then Pilate said unto them, 'Why, what evil hath he done?' And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him.

15 And so Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified.

of the priests that shed the blood of the just, Lam. 4:13. Note, Wicked priests are generally the worst of men. The better any thing is, the worse it is when corrupted. Lay-persecutors have been generally found more compassionate than ecclesiastics. These priests were very eager and noisy; but Christ answered nothing, v. 3. When Pilate urged Him to clear Himself, and was desirous He should, (v. 4.) He stood mute, (v. 5.) which Pilate thought strange. He gave Pilate a direct answer, (v. 2,) but could not answer the persecutors and witnesses, because the things they alleged were notoriously false, and He knew Pilate himself was convinced they were so. Note, As Christ spake to admiration, so He kept silence to admiration.

V. It was the custom of the feast to grace it with the release of a prisoner. The people expected and demanded that Pilate should do as he had ever done to them, (v. 8.) it was an ill usage; but they would have it kept up. Pilate perceived that the chief priests delivered Jesus for envy, because his reputation among the people eclipsed their's, v. 10. The eagerness of the persecutors and the slenderness of the proofs, showed that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, not any thing mischievous or scandalous, but something meritorious and glorious, that they were provoked at. Therefore, hearing how much He was the favorite of the crowd, he appealed from the priests to the people, thinking that they would be proud of rescuing Him out of the priests' hands. He proposed an expedient for their doing it without uproar; let them demand Him to be released, and Pilate will readily do it, and reply to the priests, that the people insisted upon his release. There was indeed another prisoner, one Barabbas, that would have some votes; but he questioned not but Jesus would succeed.

VI. The unanimous clamors of the people were to have Christ put to death; and by crucifixion. It surprised Pilate, when he found the people so much under the influence of the priests, that they all desired that Barabbas might be released, v. 11. Pilate opposed it; 'What will ye that I shall do to Him whom ye call the King of the Jews? Would not ye have Him released too?' v. 12. No, they say, Crucify Him. The priests put that in their mouths; when Pilate objected, Why, what evil has He done? (a very material question in such a case,) they do not pretend to answer it, but cried out the more exceedingly, as they were more and more instigated by the priests, Crucify Him, crucify Him. Now the priests, who were very busy among the mob, to keep up the cry, promised themselves that it would influence Pilate two ways to condemn Him. 1. J. might incline him to believe Christ guilty, when there was so general an outcry against Him. 'Surely,' might Pilate think, 'He must needs be a bad man, whom all the world is weary of.' He would now conclude that he had been misinformed, when he was told what an interest He had in the people. But the priests had so hurried on the prosecution that we may suppose that Christ's friends, who would have opposed this cry, were absent, and knew nothing of the matter. Note, It is but the common artifice of Satan, to give all ill name to Christ and his religion, and so to put them down. When once this sect, as they called it, comes to be every where spoken against, though without cause, then that is looked upon as cause enough to condemn it. But let us judge of persons and things by their merits, and the standard of God's Word, and not prejudice by common fame.—Though Pilate was not so weak as to be governed by their opinion, to believe Him guilty, yet he was so wicked as to be swayed by their outrage, though he believed Him innocent, induced incertainties by reasons of state, and the wisdom of this world. Our Lord Jesus dying as a Sacrifice for the sins of many, fell a sacrifice to the rage of many.

V. 15-21. I. Pilate, to gratify the Jews' malice, delivered Christ to be crucified, v. 15. Willing to content the people, and keep them quiet, he released Barabbas, the scandal and plague of their nation, and delivered Jesus to be crucified, their Glory and Blessing. Though he had scourged Him before, hoping that would content them, and not designing to crucify Him, yet he went on to that; for no wonder that he who could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent, (Luke 23:16.) could by degrees persuade himself to crucify Him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death, a death without blood no remission, Heb. 9:22. 'Thy blood is the life; (Gen. 9:4.) it is the vehicle of the animal spirits, which connect the soul and body, so that the exhausting of the blood is the exhausting of the life. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. Blood made atonement for the soul, (Lev. 17:11.) and therefore in every sacrifice of propitiation special order was given for pouring out and sprinkling the blood before the Lord. Now, that Christ might answer all these types, He shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death; the pains were exquisite, for death made its assaults upon the vitals by the exterior parts, which are quickest of sense. Christ died, so as that He might feel himself die, because He was to be both the Priest and the Sacrifice; so that He might be active in dying, because He was to make his soul an offering for sin. Cicero calls crucifixion, a most tremendous punishment; Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shameful death, the death of slaves, and the vilest malefactors; so it was accounted among the Romans. The cross and the shame are put together. God having been injured in his honor by the sin of man, it is in his honor that Christ makes Him satisfaction, not only by denying Himself the honors due his divine nature, but by submitting to the greatest ignominy. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish law; (Deut. 21:23.) He that is hanged is accursed of God, under a particular mark of God's displeasure. It was the death that Saul's sons were put to when the guilt of their father's bloody house was to be expiated, 2 Sam. 21:6. Haman and his sons were hanged, Esth. 7:10. 9:13. We do not read of any of the prophets of the Old Testament that were hanged; but now that Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach of that kind of death is rolled away, so that it ought not to hinder the comfort of those who die innocently or penitently, nor diminish, but rather add to, the glory of those who die for Christ.

II. Pilate, to gratify his Roman soldiers, delivered Him to them, to be abused and spitefully treated, while they were preparing for the execution. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused Jesus, as a King, just as, in the high priest's hall, his servants had abused Him as a Prophet and Savior. 1. Do kings wear robes of purple or scarlet? They clothed Him with

(5.) Yet answered nothing.] He answered nothing further than what was implied in the words, 'Thou sayest it.' (3.) (Note, 1 Tim. 6:13-16, v. 13.)

Verboes 6-10.

Besides the notoriously bad character of Barabbas, as a robber, he had been guilty of the very crime of which the scribes and priests falsely accused Jesus; having joined in or headed an insurrection against the Romans, which had committed murder in the attempt. Yet this man was preferred before the holy and beneficent Savior! The demand, that a criminal of this kind should be released, might have given great offence to Pilate, had he not perceived the malice by which the priests and rulers were actuated.

(7.) Had made insurrection with him. Who had committed murder, &c.] The insurgents had committed murder, in which Barabbas was either the principal or an accomplice. Scott.

16 And 'the soldiers led him away into the hall called "Pretorium"; and they call together the whole band.

17 And *they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head;

18 And began to salute him, "Hail, King of the Jews!"

19 And *they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, *and bowing their knees, worshipped him.

20 And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, *and led him out to crucify him.

21 And *they compel one Simon *a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander *and Rufus, 'to bear his cross.

22 And they bring him unto the place "Golgotha," which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull.

purple. This abuse done to Christ in his apparel should be an intimation to Christians, not to make the putting on of apparel their adorning, 1 Pet. 3: 4. Shall a purple or scarlet robe be matter of pride to a Christian, which was matter of shame to Christ? 2. Do kings wear crowns? They platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head. A crown of straw, or rushes, would have been banter enough; but this was pain also. He wore the crown of thorns which we have deserved, that we might wear the crown of glory which He merited. Let us be taught by these thorns, as Gideon taught the men of Succoth, to hate sin, and to love Jesus Christ, who is here a Lily among thorns. If we be at any time afflicted with a thorn in the flesh, let it be our comfort, that our great High Priest is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. 3. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects, O king, live forever? That also is mimicked: 'Hail king of the Jews; Prince, and people, good enough for one another.' 4. Kings' sceptres are marks of dominion, as the crown is of dignity; to resemble that, they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of Jesus, who regard not either the precept of his Word, or the threatenings of his wrath, do, in effect, put a reed in his hand; nay, and, as these here, smite Him on the head with it, such indignity they do Him. 5. Subjects, when they swear allegiance, were wont to kiss their sovereign; and this they offered to do, but, instead of that, spit upon Him. 6. Kings used to be addressed upon the knee; and this also they brought into the jest, they bowed the knee, and worshipped Him; this they did in scorn, to make themselves and one another laugh. We were by sin become liable to everlasting shame and contempt, to deliver us from which, our Lord submitted to this shame and contempt for us. He was thus mocked, not in his own clothes, but in another's, to signify that He suffered not for his own sin; the crime was ours, the shame his. Those who pretend subjection to Christ, but at the same time give themselves up to the service of the world and the flesh, do, in effect, bow the knee to Him in mockery, and abuse Him with, Hail, King of the Jews, when they say, We have no king but Caesar. Those that bow the knee to Christ, but do not bow the soul, that draw nigh to Him with their mouths, and honor Him with their lips, but their hearts are far from Him, put the same affront upon Him that these did.

III. The soldiers, at the hour appointed, led Him away from Pilate's judgment-hall to the place of execution, (v. 20.) as a sheep to the slaughter; He was led forth with the workers of iniquity, though He did no sin. But lest his death under the load of his cross, which He was to carry, should prevent further cruelties, they compelled one Simon of Cyrene to carry his cross. He passed by, coming out of the country or out of the fields, not thinking of any such matter. Note, We must not think it strange, if crosses come upon us suddenly. The cross was a troublesome, unwieldy load; but he that carried it a few minutes, had the honor to have his name upon record in the book of God, though otherwise an obscure person; so that, wherever this gospel is preached, there shall this be told for a memorial of Him: in like manner, though no cross, for the present, be joyous, but grievous, yet afterward it yields a crown of glory to them that are exercised thereby.

V. 22-31. I. The place where He was crucified was called Golgotha—the place of a skull, some think, because of the heads of malefactors that were there cut off; it was the common place of execution, for He was in all respects numbered with the transgressors. I know not how to credit it, but divers ancients mention as a current tradition, that in this place our first father Adam was buried, and think it highly congruous that there Christ should be crucified; for as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive. Something more credible is the tradition, that this mount Calvary was that mountain in the land of Moriah, (and in the land of Moriah it certainly was, for so the country about Jerusalem was called,) on which Isaac was to be offered; and the ram was offered instead of him; and then Abraham had an eye to this day of Christ, when he called the place Jehovah-jireh—The Lord will provide, expecting that so it would be seen in the mount of the Lord.

II. The time when He was crucified was the third hour, v. 25. He was brought before Pilate about the sixth hour, (John 19: 14.) according to the Roman way of reckoning, that is, at six o'clock in the morning; and then, at the third hour, according to the Jews' way of reckoning, that is, about nine in the morning, or soon after, they nailed Him to the cross. Dr. Lightfoot thinks the third hour is here mentioned, to intimate an aggravation of the wickedness of the priests, that they were here prosecuting Christ to death, when they ought to have been attending the service of the temple, and offering the peace-offerings; it being the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, when there was to be a holy convocation. At that very time, when they should have been presiding in the public devotions, they were venting their malice against Jesus; yet these were the men that seemed so zealous for the temple, and condemned Christ for speaking against it. Note, There are many who pretend to be for the church, who care not how seldom they go to church.

III. They added several things to the ignominy of the cross:

1. It being the custom to give wine to persons that were to be put to death, they mingled

Pretorium. 'A name given in the gospels to the house in which the Roman governor of Jerusalem dwelt, and sat in his judicial capacity.'

(19.) 'Worshipped.' Note, Esth. 3: 2.—Adoration, in the strictest meaning of the word, was paid to many of the Roman emperors; and no doubt the soldiers mocked our Lord's claim to regal authority by the semblance of it.—(20.) And when, &c.] Before the soldiers had taken off the purple robe, and put on Jesus his own clothing, Pilate brought Him forth to the people and priests, saying, 'Behold the man.' (Note, John 19: 1-7.)

(21.) 'The condemned criminal, among the Romans, was compelled to bear his cross, or the transverse beam, and on his way was urged forward and treated with every species of wanton cruelty. Our Lord was so exhausted, that they compelled Simon to assist Him. Luke, writing to the Gentiles of Asia, who probably knew the man, calls him Simon. Mark writing to the Romans, calls him Simon the father of Rufus, who appears to have been a member of that church. See Rom. 16: 13.'

(22.) Golgotha. 'A small hill on a greater hill, or mount, northwest of Jerusalem; so called from its form or because criminals were executed there.'

(23.) Wine. &c.] This 'wine mingled with myrrh' is said to have been prepared by certain honorable women at Jerusalem, who used to send it to such criminals as were led forth to execution.—'Christ, being about to drink off the most bitter cup of his Father's wrath against our sins, refused this solace; being so mindful of his Father's command, as to be unmindful of Himself, and only solicitous at once to expiate our sins, even to his latest breath.' Beza. (Note, Matt. 26: 29.)

(23.) 'It was customary to give the sufferer a stupefying potion; this was offered our Lord, but being ready to suffer to the utmost, He refused any thing which would have caused an unnatural suspension or oblivion.'

(25.) 'The third, &c.] Or about nine o'clock in the morning.—The rulers must have been very active to have gone through so much business, and surmounted so many difficulties, by that hour. Indeed in John's gospel, we read of 'the sixth hour;' but this is generally allowed, either to be an error of the transcribers, or to admit of another interpretation; and Christ is commonly supposed to have been nailed to the cross about nine o'clock in the forenoon. (Note, John 19: 13-18, v. 14.)—'The darkness began at the sixth hour, which yet began not, till after our Lord had hung on the cross some considerable time: till after the soldiers had divided the garments, the Jews had mocked Him, and bid Him come down from the cross; and the discourse had passed between the two thieves among themselves, and between the speaking thief and our Lord.' his with bitter myrrh, He tasted it, but would not drink it,—admitting the bitterness, but not the benefit.

2. The garments of those that were crucified, being the executioner's fee, the soldiers cast lots (p. 24.) for them: so making themselves merry with his misery, and sitting at their sport while He was in pain.

3. They set a superscription over his head, by which they intended to reproach Him, but really did Him both justice and honor, The King of the Jews, v. 26. Here was no crime alleged, but his sovereignty owned. Perhaps Pilate meant to cast disgrace upon Christ as a baffled King, or upon the Jews, who by their importunity had forced him, against his conscience, to condemn Christ, as a people that deserved no better a King than He seemed to be:
however, God intended it to be the proclaiming even of Christ upon the cross, the King of Israel; though Pilate knew not what he wrote, any more than Caiaphas what he said, John 11:
51. Christ crucified is King of his spiritual Israel; and even when He hung on the cross,
He was like a king, conquering his and his people's enemies, and triumphing over them, Col. 2:15. Now He was writing his laws in his own blood, and preparing his favors for his subjects. Whenever we look unto Christ crucified, we must remember the inscription over his head, that He is a King, and give up ourselves to be his subjects, as Israelites indeed.

4. They crucified two thieves with Him, one on his right hand, the other on his left, and Him in the midst as the worst of the three; (p. 27.)
so great a degree of dishonor did they hereby intend Him. And no doubt, it gave Him disturbance too. Some that have been imprisoned in the common jails, for the testimony of Jesus, have complained of the company of swearing prisoners, more than of any other grievance of their prison. In the midst of such our Lord was crucified; while He lived He associated with sinners to do them good; and when He died, He was for the same purpose joined with them, for He came into the world, and went on of it, to save sinners, even the chief. But this evangelist takes particular notice of the fulfilling of the Scriptures in it, v. 28. In that famous prediction of Christ's sufferings, (Isa. 53.

12.) it was foretold that He should be numbered with the transgressors, because He was made sin for us.

5. The spectators, the generality of them, in stead of condoling with Him, added insult.
Never was there such barbarous inhumanity toward the vilest malefactor: but thus the devil showed the utmost rage against Him, and thus
He submitted to the greatest dishonors.

(1.) Even they that passed by, that were no way concerned, railed on Him, v. 29. If their hearts were so hardened, that their compassions were not moved with such a spectacle, yet they should have thought it enough to have their curiosity gratified; but, as if they were devils in human shape, they taunted Him, with the utmost detestation and indignation, and shot thick at Him their arrows, even bitter words. The chief priests no doubt, put these sarcasms into their mouths. Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself, and come down from the cross. They triumph as if now, that they had got Him to the cross, there were no danger of his destroying the temple; whereas the temple of which He spake He was now destroying, and did within three days build it up; and the temple of which they spake,
He did by men, that were his sword, destroy no many years after. When secure sinners think the danger is over, it is then most ready to seize them: the day of the Lord comes as a thief upon those that deny his coming, and say, Where is the promise of it? much more upon those that deny his coming, and say, Let Him make speed, and hasten his work.

(2.) Even the chief priests, who should have

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—26. The sufferings of our Redeemer are an inexhaustible source of instruction to the believer: a subject, of which, in his best hours, he cannot be weary. The consideration, that no one was ever so hated, or so treated by men of every rank, or religion, (his own disciples alone excepted,) as the only perfectly excellent person, who has appeared on earth, leads the mind into such views of human depravity and enmity to God, as, being applied to himself, by recollecting that such are we all by nature, tends exceedingly to humiliation before God; while a view of his love, in delivering up his Son to this death, making his soul a sacrifice for the sins of daring rebels and enemies, must cause the heart to overflow with admiration and grateful joy. To believe that such an atonement was necessary, in order that God might honorably pardon sinners, cannot fail to give the mind the deepest impression of his justice and holiness, the excellency of the law and the evil of sin; and it must at the same time destroy all expectations of being saved in any other way; for, 'if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain.' The contemplation of men, however otherwise distinguished, all condemned, and exposed to everlasting misery, except as Jesus thus opened the gate of life and salvation to believers, must fill our minds with compassion for all around us, and lead us to look upon the most prosperous sinners, with a mixture of solemn awe and commiseration: at the same time it directly tends to crucify us to the world; to reconcile us to its scorn and hatred; to mortify us to its interests and pleasures; to heal the diseases of our souls, which break forth in envy and eager competition; and to render us contented in obscurity. (Note, Gal. 6: 11—14.) But with what earnestness will the man, who firmly believes these truths, seek an interest in this great salvation! With what gratitude will he receive the assurance, or even the dawning hope, of forgiveness and eternal life, as purchased for him by the sufferings of the Son of God! And with what 'godly sorrow, will he mourn over those sins, which he now looks on as having 'crucified the Lord of glory!' Hence that attention to this 'one thing needful,' which subordinates all other interests and employments: hence that devoted obedience to Christ, which neither danger nor suffering can move: hence that abhorrence of sin, which renders it the great burden and distress of a believer's life, and which induces him to use every means to weaken and destroy all evil out of his heart: hence that affection to all who love and resemble Christ; that desire to recommend Him, and that delight of speaking or reading of Him; and hence that love to enemies, patience under afflictions, and that meekness under injuries, which distinguish the character of consistent Christians from that of all other men. The same views of Christ crucified, gradually reconcile the believer to the thoughts of death, in order that he may behold, and praise as he ought, that Savior, who was pierced to save him from the wrath to come.—Frequently meditate on the scenes which have so blessed an efficacy in producing these affections, and in forming the character into a conformity to Jesus, and a meet-ness for heaven: especially adopt this method, when tempted to impatience under trials, or peevishness under contempt; or when anxious or discontented about worldly things, or disposed to hanker after sinful indulgences.

(26.) The superscription of his accusation.' By the Romans, the title of the crimes for which criminals were condemned, were
